The progress made in the Reformation in England, brought over many foreign Protestants, amongst whom were several German Anabaptists; of which the council receiving intelligence, and having conceived a very bad opinion of them, as well with regard to their religious as to their political principles, from the outrages, murders, and rebellions, committed by their leader John of Leyden, and his followers, in Germany; and from their fantastical and unintelligible mode of conversing about religion, which they turned entirely into allegories; archbishop Cranmer and others were commissioned to search for, examine, and try these people. The commissioners were particularly enjoined to reclaim them if possible; to impose penance on them; and to give them absolution: or if these criminals continued obstinate, to excommunicate and imprison them, and to deliver them over to the secular arm: and in the execution of this charge, they were not bound to observe the ordinary methods of trial; the forms of law were dispensed with; and if any statutes happened to interfere with the powers in the commission, they were over-ruled and abrogated by the council. Some tradesmen in London were brought before these commissioners, and were accused of maintaining, among other opinions, that a man regenerate could not sin, and that, though the outward man might offend, the inward was incapable of all guilt. They were prevailed on to abjure, and were dismissed. On this occasion also, Joan Bocher, commonly called Joan of Kent; who, when brought before those persons to be examined was so pertinacious, that she was pronounced an obstinate heretic, was sentenced to be burned, and was delivered over to the secular arm to be executed. Her doctrine was, "That Christ was not truly incarnate of the Virgin, whose flesh, being the outward man, was sinfully begotten, and born in sin; and consequently, he could take none of it: but the Word, by the consent of the inward man of the Virgin, was made flesh." This act of cruelty was by no means becoming the Christian temper of a Reformed bishop, who condemned the like persecutions by the Papists. The young king, however, though in such tender years, seems to have had more sense than all his counsellors and preceptors; and he long refused to sign the warrant for her execution. Cranmer was employed to persuade him to compliance; and he said that there was a great difference between errors in other points of divinity and those which were in direct contradiction to the Apostles' creed: these latter were impieties against God, which the prince, being God's deputy, ought to repress; in like manner as inferior magistrates were bound to punish offences against the king's person. After a great deal of conversation, Edward, overcome by importunity, at last submitted, though with tears in his eyes; and he told Cranmer, that if any wrong were done, the guilt should lie entirely on his head. The primate then made another effort to reclaim the woman from her errors, but finding her still persist in maintaining her erroneous opinions, he at last gave her over to the executioner, and she was committed to the flames.

Some time after the execution of Joan Bocher, a Dutchman, whose name was Van Paris, was accused of holding and professing the doctrines of Arius, and having obstinately maintained his opinions, he was condemned to the flames. This man suffered with so much satisfaction, that he even hugged and caressed the faggots which were destined to consume him (r).

By these rigorous methods of proceeding, the whole nation was speedily brought to a conformity, seeming or real, with the new doctrine and the new liturgy. The lady Mary alone, who was half sister to Edward, and who after his death ascended the throne, continued to adhere to the mass, and refused to admit the established modes of worship. When pressed and menaced on this head, she applied to the emperor; who, using his interest with sir Philip Hobby, the English ambassador, procured her a temporary connivance from the council.

There is no abuse so great in civil society, as not to be attended with a variety of beneficial consequences; and in the beginnings of reformation, the loss of these advantages is always sensibly felt, while the benefit resulting from the change is the slow effect of time, and is seldom perceived by the bulk of a nation. Scarcely any institution can be imagined less favourable in the main to the interests of mankind than that of monks and friers; yet was it followed by many good effects, which having ceased by the suppression of monasteries, were much regretted by the people of England. The monks, always residing in their convents in the centre of their estates, spent their money in the provinces and among their tenants, afforded a ready market for commodities, were a sure resource to the poor and indigent; and though their hospitality and charity gave but too much encouragement to idleness, and hindered the increase of public riches, yet did it provide to many a relief from the extreme pressures of want and necessity. It may also be remarked, that as the friers were limited by the rules of their institution to a certain mode of living, they had not equal motives for extortion with other men; and they were acknowledged to have been in England, as they still are in Roman catholic countries, the best and most indulgent landlords. The abbots and priors were permitted to grant leases at an under-value, and to receive in return a large present from the tenant; in the same manner as is still practised by the bishops and colleges. But when the abbey lands were distributed among the principal nobility and courtiers, they fell under a different management: the rents of farmers were raised, while the tenants found not the same facility in disposing of the produce; the money was often spent in the capital; and the farmers, living at a distance, were exposed to oppression from their new masters, or to the still greater rapacity of the stewards.

The grievances of the common people were at that time heightened by other causes. The arts of manufacture were more advanced in other countries than in England; and even in England these arts had made greater progress than the knowledge of agriculture; a profession which, requires great reflection and experience. A great demand arose for wool both abroad and at home: pasturage was found more profitable than unskilful tillage; whole estates were inclosed: the tenants, regarded as an useless burden, were expelled their habitations: even the cottagers, deprived of the commons on which they formerly fed their cattle, were reduced to misery; and a decay of people, as well as a diminution of the former plenty, was (r) These executions, as might naturally be supposed, disgusted many pious Christians, and gave the Papists cause to retort upon the Reformers the spirit of persecution, for which they themselves had been so much blamed on former occasions.

remarked in the kingdom. This grievance was now of an old date; and sir Thomas More, alluding to it, observes in his Utopia, that a sheep in England had become a more ravenous animal than a lion or a wolf, and that it frequently devoured whole villages, cities, and provinces.

It must also be remarked, that the profusion of Henry the Eighth had reduced him, notwithstanding his rapacity, to such difficulties, that he had been obliged to remedy a present necessity, by the pernicious expedient of debasing the coin; and the wars in which the protector had been involved, had induced him to carry still further the same abuse. The usual consequences ensued: the good specie was hoarded or exported; base metal was coined at home, or imported from abroad in great abundance; the common people, who received their wages in it, could not purchase commodities at the usual rates; an universal diffidence and stagnation of commerce took place, and loud complaints were heard in every part of England.

The duke of Somerset, lord protector, who loved popularity, and pitied the condition of the people, encouraged these complaints by endeavouring to redress them. He appointed a commission for making inquiry concerning inclosures; and issued a proclamation, ordering all late inclosures to be laid open by a day appointed. The populace, meeting with such countenance from government, began to rise in several places, and to commit disorders, but were quieted by remonstrances and persuasion. In order to give them greater satisfaction, the duke of Somerset appointed new commissioners, whom he sent, with an unlimited power to hear and determine all causes about inclosures, highways, and cottages. This commission was disagreeable to the nobility and gentry, and they stigmatized it as arbitrary and illegal; and the common people, fearing it would be eluded, and being impatient for redress, sought for a remedy by force of arms. The rising began at once in several parts of England, as if an universal conspiracy had been formed by the commonalty. The rebels in Wiltshire were dispersed by sir William Herbert: those in the neighbouring counties, Oxford and Gloucester, by lord Gray of Wilton. Many of the rioters were killed in the field; others were executed by martial law. The commotions in Hampshire, Sussex, Kent, and other counties, were quieted by gentler expedients; but the disorders in Devonshire and Norfolk threatened more dangerous consequences.

The commonalty in Devonshire began with the usual complaints against inclosures and against oppressions from the gentry; but the parish priest of Sampford Courtenay had the address to give their discontent a direction towards religion; and the delicacy of the subject in the present emergency made the insurrection immediately appear formidable. In other counties the gentry had kept closely united with government; but here many of them took part with the populace; among others, Humphry Arundel, governor of St. Michael's Mount. The rioters set up the pope's standard on the 10th of June, 1549, and were brought into the form of a regular army, which amounted to the number of ten thousand. Lord Russel had been sent against them at the head of a small force; but finding himself too weak to encounter them in the field, he kept at a distance, and began to negociate with them; in hopes of eluding their fury by delay, and of dispersing them by the difficulty of their subsisting in a body. They had the boldness to present a list of grievances (s) to Lord Russel, as the ground-work of negociation, which that nobleman immediately sent to the council, who returned a haughty answer; commanding the rebels to disperse, and promising them pardon upon their immediate submission. Enraged at this disappointment, they marched to Exeter, on the 2nd of July; carrying before them crosses, banners, holy water, candlesticks, and other implements of ancient superstition; together with the host, which they covered with a canopy. The citizens of Exeter shut their gates; and the rebels, as they had no cannon, endeavoured to take the place, first by scalade, then by mining, but were repulsed in every attempt. Russel meanwhile lay at Honiton till reinforced by sir William Herbert and lord Gray, with some German horse, and some Italian arquebusiers under Battista Spinola. He then resolved to attempt the relief of Exeter, which was now reduced to extremities. He attacked the rebels on the 6th of August, drove them from all their posts, did great execution upon them both in the action and pursuit, and took many prisoners. Arundel and the other leaders were sent to London, tried and executed. Many of the inferior sort were put to death by martial law: the vicar of St. Thomas, one of the principal incendiaries, was hanged on the top of his own steeple, arrayed in his popish weeds, with his beads at his girdle.

The people of Norfolk rose with more violence, and their insurrection was attended with greater acts of outrage. The populace were at first excited, as in other places, by complaints against inclosures; but finding their numbers amount to twenty thousand, they grew insolent, and proceeded to more exorbitant pretensions. They required the suppression of the gentry, the placing of new counsellors about the king, and the re-establishment of the ancient rites. One Ket, a tanner, had assumed the government over them, and he exercised his authority with the utmost arrogance. Having taken possession of Moushold-hill, near Norwich, he erected his tribunal under an old oak, thence called the oak of reformation; and summoning the gentry to appear before him, he gave such decrees as might be expected from his character and situation. The marquis of Northampton was first ordered against him; but met with a repulse in an action where lord Sheffield was killed. The protector affected popularity, and cared not to appear in person against the rebels: he therefore sent the earl of Warwick at the head of six thousand men, levied for the wars against Scotland; and he thereby afforded his mortal enemy an opportunity of increasing his reputation and character. Warwick having tried some skirmishes with the rebels, at last made a general attack upon them, and put them to flight. Two thousand fell in the action and pursuit: Ket was hanged at Norwich castle; nine of his followers on the boughs of the oak of reformation; and the insurrection was entirely suppressed. Some rebels in Yorkshire, learning the fate of their companions, accepted the offers of pardon, and threw down their arms. The protector soon after published a general act of indemnity.

The protector, whose interest it was to keep the nation in tranquillity, not only discovered great reluctance to proceed with rigour against the rebels, during the time of those insurrections; but so soon as he perceived that the people had laid down their arms and returned to their homes, he was the first that moved the council to proclaim a general pardon; and upon their demur, he took the extraordinary step, by his sole authority, to publish a pardon for all crimes committed before the 21st of August, excepting only a few rebel prisoners. As this act of sovereignty was contrary to the advice of the council, who found they had been consulted only out of mere form, it inflamed their hatred, as well as it did that of the nobility, although he could warrant what he had done by virtue of his patent.

Those who take upon them to defend the protector's lenity towards the rebels, tell us, that he was obliged to try all means to keep peace at home, when the king's dominions were perfidiously attacked by the king of France. The case is this: Henry the Second, king of France, was

(s) The following are the articles which the Devonshire rebels had the audacity to insist on as the basis of negociation; upon the granting of which they promised to lay down their arms:

1. That all the general councils and the ancient canons of the church should be observed.
2. That the act of the six articles should be again in force.
3. That the mass should be in Latin, and the priests alone should receive.
4. That the host should be lifted up and worshipped, and those who refused to do it should suffer as heretics.
5. That the sacrament should only be given to the people at Easter in one kind.
6. That baptism should be administered at any hour, and at all times.
7. That holy bread, holy water, and palms be again used; and images set up, with all the other ancient ceremonies.
8. That the new liturgy should be laid aside, and the old offices, as well as the processions restored.
9. That all preachers before their sermons, and priests in the mass, should pray for the souls in purgatory.
10. That the people should be forbid to read the Bible.
11. That Dr. Moreman and Mr. Crispin should be restored to their livings.
12. That cardinal Pole should be restored, and made of the king's council.
13. That every gentleman might have but one servant for every hundred marks of yearly rent belonging to him.
14. That the half of the abbey lands should be taken from the possessors, and adjudged to two of the chief abbies in every county; and all the church boxes, for seven years, should be given to the said houses, that devout persons might live in them, who should pray for the king and the commonwealth.
15. That for their particular grievances, they should be redressed, as Humphry Arundel and the mayor of Bodmin should inform the king and council.

no sooner settled on his throne than he meditated a design to recover Boulogne by force of arms, which by the treaty entered into by Francis the First, his predecessor, was ceded to king Henry the Eighth for eight years; and was not to be restored then, without the payment of two millions of gold crowns to the king of England. Henry the Second, being informed of the troubles which broke out in England, thought the present a favourable opportunity to endeavour to recover those places which Henry the Eighth had conquered from France. He therefore assembled an army; and falling suddenly upon the Boulonnois, took the castles of Sellaque, Blackness, and Ambleteuse, though well supplied with garrisons, ammunition, and provisions. He endeavoured to surprize Boulenberg, and was repulsed; but the garrison, not thinking the place tenable after the loss of the other fortresses, destroyed the works and retired to Boulogne. The rains, which fell in great abundance during the autumn, and a pestilential distemper which broke out in the French camp, deprived Henry of all hopes of success against Boulogne itself; and he retired to Paris, leaving the command of the army to Gaspar de Coligny, lord of Chatillon, afterwards so well known by the name of admiral Coligny; and he gave him orders to form the siege early in the spring: but the active disposition of the general induced him to make, during the winter, several attempts against the place; yet he proved unsuccessful in every effort. Strozzi, who commanded the French fleet and galleys, endeavoured to make a descent on Jersey and Guernsey; but meeting there with an English fleet, he commenced an action which seems not to have been decisive, since the historians of the two nations differ in their account of the event.

The French war was hardly broke out, when the protector endeavoured to fortify himself with the alliance of the emperor; to which end he sent secretary Paget to Brussels, where Charles then kept his court, in order to assist sir Philip Hobby, the resident ambassador, in this negociation. But that prince had formed a design of extending his dominions by acting the part of champion for the catholic religion; and though extremely desirous of accepting the English alliance against France, his capital enemy, he thought it unsuitable to his other pretensions to enter into strict confederacy with a nation which had broken off all connexions with the church of Rome. He therefore declined the advances of friendship from England; and eluded the applications of the ambassadors (t).

The duke of Somerset, despairing of assistance from the emperor, was inclined to conclude a peace with France and Scotland; and besides that he was not in a condition to maintain such ruinous wars, he thought that there no longer remained any object of hostility. The Scots had sent away their queen; and could not, if ever so much inclined, complete the marriage contracted with Edward: and as Henry VIII. had stipulated to restore Boulogne in 1554, it seemed a matter of small moment to anticipate a few years the execution of the treaty. But when he proposed these reasons to the council, he met with strong opposition from his enemies, who seeing him unable to support the war, were determined, for that very reason, to oppose all proposals for a pacification. The factions ran high in the court of England; and matters were drawing to an issue fatal to the authority of the protector.

After Somerset obtained the patent, which invested him with regal authority, he no longer paid attention to the opinion of the other executors and counsellors; and being elated with his high dignity, as well as with his victory at Pinkey, he thought that every one ought in every thing to yield to his sentiments. All those who were not entirely devoted to him were sure to be neglected; whoever opposed his will received marks of anger or contempt; and while he shewed a resolution to govern every thing, his capacity appeared not in any respect proportioned to his ambition. Warwick, more subtle and artful, covered more exorbitant views under fairer appearances; and having associated himself with the earl of Southampton, who had been re-admitted into the council, he formed a strong party, who were determined to free themselves from the slavery imposed on them by the protector. The discontented counsellors found the disposition of the nation favourable to their designs. The nobility and gentry were for the most part displeased with the preference which Somerset seemed to have given to the people; and as they ascribed all the insults to which they had been lately exposed to his procrastination, and to the countenance shown to the multitude, they apprehended a renewal of the insurrections from his present affectation of popularity (u). But though Somerset courted the people, the interest which he had formed with them was in no degree answerable to his expectations. The catholic party, who retained influence with the lower ranks, were his avowed enemies; and took advantage of every opportunity to decry his conduct (v).

All Somerset's imprudencies were remarked by his enemies, who resolved to take advantage of them. Accordingly, on the 6th of October, lord St. John, president of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five members more, met at Ely-house; and assuming to themselves the whole power of the council, began to act independently of the protector, whom they represented as the author of every public grievance and misfortune. They wrote letters to the chief nobility and gentry in England, informing them of the present measures, and requiring their assistance: they sent for the mayor and aldermen of London, and enjoined them to obey their orders, without regard to any contrary orders which they might receive from the duke of Somerset. They laid the same injunctions on the lieutenant of the Tower, who expressed his resolution to comply with them. Next day, Rich, lord chancellor, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewsbury, sir Thomas Cheney, sir John Gage, sir Ralph Sadler, and chief justice Montague, joined the malcontent counsellors; and every thing bore an unfavourable aspect for the protector's authority. Secretary Petre, whom he had sent to treat with the council, rather chose to remain with them. On the 8th of October, they went in a body to Guildhall in the city of London, where, in the presence of the common council, they declared that they were acting for the good of the king, and had no intention to alter religion; and that their whole view was to take his majesty out of the power of the duke of Somerset, whom they accused of considering nothing but his own private interest. Whereupon the common council declared with one voice their approbation of the new measures, and their resolution of doing all in their power to support them.

Somerset, upon his becoming acquainted with the defection of the counsellors, removed the king from Hampton-court, where he then resided, to Windsor Castle; and, arming his friends and servants, seemed determined to defend himself against all his enemies. But finding that no man of rank, except Cranmer and Paget, adhered to him, that the people did not rise at his summons, that the city and Tower had declared against him, that even his best friends had deserted him, he lost all hopes of success, and began to apply to his enemies for pardon and forgiveness. As soon as this despondency was known, lord Russel, sir John Baker, speaker of the house of commons, and three other counsellors, who had hitherto remained neuters, joined the party of Warwick, on the 9th of October, whom every one now regarded as master. The (t) An exact account is preserved of this negociation in a letter of Hobby's; and it is remarkable that the emperor, in a conversation with the English ministers, asserted that the prerogatives of a king of England were more extensive than those of a king of France. Burnet, who preserves this letter, subjoins, as a parallel instance, that one objection which the Scots made to marrying their queen with Edward was, that all their privileges would be swallowed up by the great prerogative of the kings of England.

(u) He had erected a court of requests in his own house for the relief of the people, and he interposed with the judges in their behalf; a measure which might be deemed illegal, if any exertion of prerogative at that time could with certainty deserve that appellation. And this attempt, which was a stretch of power, seemed the more impolitic, because it disgusted the nobles, the surest support of monarchical authority.

(v) The attainder and execution of his brother bore an odious aspect: the introduction of foreign troops into the kingdom was represented in invidious colours: the great estate which he had suddenly acquired at the expence of the church and of the crown, rendered him obnoxious; and the palace which he was building in the Strand served, by its magnificence, and still more by other circumstances which attended it, to expose him to the censure of the public. The parish church of St. Mary, with three bishops houses, was pulled down, in order to furnish ground and materials for this structure: not content with that sacrilege, an attempt was made to demolish St. Margaret's, Westminster, and to employ the stones to the same purpose; but the parishioners rose in a tumult, and chased away the protector's tradesmen. He then laid his hands on a chapel in St. Paul's Church Yard, with a cloister and charnel-house belonging to it; and these edifices, together with a church of St. John of Jerusalem, were made use of to raise his palace. What rendered the matter more odious to the people was, that the tombs and other monuments of the dead were defaced; and the bones being carried away, were buried in unconsecrated ground. Heylin, p. 72, 73. Stowe's Survey of London. Hayward, p. 303.

council informed the public, by proclamation, of their actions and intentions; they wrote to the princesses Mary and Elizabeth to the same purpose; and they made addresses to the king, in which, after the humblest protestations of duty and submission, they informed him, that they were the council appointed by his father for the government of the kingdom during his minority; that they had chosen the duke of Somerset protector, under the express condition, that he should guide himself by their advice and direction; that he had usurped the whole authority, and had neglected, and even in every thing opposed their counsel; that he had proceeded to that height of presumption as to levy forces against them, and place these forces about his majesty's person: they therefore begged that they might be admitted to his royal presence; that he would be pleased to restore them to his confidence, and that Somerset's servants might be dismissed. Their request was complied with: Somerset capitulated only for gentle treatment, which was promised him. He was, however, sent to the Tower on the 12th, with Mr. secretary Smith, sir Michael Stanhope, sir John Thynn, Edward Wolfe, and William Cecil, some of his friends and partizans.

On the 14th of the same month the duke of Somerset was carried from the Tower before the council, when a paper containing articles of accusation (w) was read against him, which the duke of course was not prepared immediately to answer, and therefore he was again sent to the Tower. Scarcely had the duke been re-conducted to the Tower, than the council appointed six lords and four knights to be governors of the king's person; two of whom were ordered to attend him constantly in their course: and the principal administration of the government was tacitly deposited in the hands of the earl of Warwick, without any title that might give him a particular authority.

The catholics were extremely elated with this revolution; and as they had ascribed all the late innovations to Somerset's authority, they hoped that his fall would prepare the way for the return of the ancient religion. But Warwick, who now bore chief sway in the council, was entirely indifferent with regard to all these points of controversy; and finding that the principles of the reformation had sunk deeper into Edward's mind than to be easily eradicated, he was determined to comply with the young prince's inclinations, and not to hazard his new acquired power by any dangerous enterprize. He took care very early to express his intentions of supporting the reformation; and he threw such discouragements on Southampton, who stood at the head of the Romanists, and whom he considered as a dangerous rival, that that high-spirited nobleman retired from the council, and soon after died from vexation and disappointment. The other counsellors, who had concurred in the revolution, received their reward by promotions and new honours. Russel was created earl of Bedford: the marquis of Northampton obtained the office of great chamberlain; and lord Wentworth, besides the office of chamberlain of the household, got two large manors, Stepney and Hackney, which were taken from the see of London. A council of regency was formed, not that which Henry's will had appointed for the government of the kingdom, and which, being founded on an act of parliament, was the only legal one; but one which was composed chiefly of members who had formerly been appointed by Somerset, and who derived their seat from an authority which was now declared usurped and illegal. But such niceties were little understood, and still less regarded, in England during that age.

A session of parliament began to sit on the 4th of November; and as it was the usual maxim of that assembly to acquiesce in every administration which was established, the council dreaded no opposition from that quarter, and had more reason to look for a corroboration of their authority. On the 23rd of December Somerset had been prevailed on to confess on his knees, before the council, all the articles of charge against him; and he imputed these misdemeanors to his own rashness, folly, and indiscretion, not to any malignity of intention. He even subscribed this confession; and the paper was given in to parliament, on the 2nd of January, 1550, when a bill of attainder, with the above confession signed by himself, was read in the house of lords, who, after sending a committee to examine him, and hear him acknowledge it to be genuine, the bill was read a third time and passed; on the 14th of the same month; when they passed a vote, by which they fined him two thousand pounds a year in land, with a forfeiture of all his goods to the king, and the loss of all his offices; and upon giving bond for ten thousand pounds for his good behaviour, he was discharged from the Tower on the 6th of February: ten days after he received his pardon from the king, who remitted his fine, and still thinking him innocent, he gave him a place in his council on the 6th of April following. Lord St. John was created treasurer in his place, and Warwick earl marshal; and, thinking that he was now sufficiently humbled, and that his authority was much lessened by his late tame and abject behaviour, agreed to an alliance between their families, by the marriage of his own son, lord Dudley, with the lady Jane Seymour, daughter of Somerset.

During this session a severe law was passed against riots. It was enacted, That if any, to the number of twelve persons, should meet together for any matter of state, and, being required by a lawful magistrate, should not disperse, it should be treason; and if any broke hedges, or violently pulled up pales about inclosures, without lawful authority, it should be felony: any attempt to kill a privy counsellor was subjected to the same penalty. The bishops had made an application, complaining that they were deprived of all their power by the encroachments of the civil courts, and the present suspension of the canon law; that they could summon no offender before them, punish no vice, or exert the discipline of the church. From this diminution of ecclesiastical authority the clergy pretended, that vice and immorality had greatly increased. The design of some was, to revive the penitentiary rules of the primitive church; but others thought, that such an authority committed to the bishops would prove more oppressive than confession, penance, and all the clerical inventions of the Romish superstition. The parliament empowered the king to appoint thirty-two commissioners to compile a body of canon laws, which were to be valid, though never ratified by parliament. Such implicit trust did they repose in the crown; without reflecting that all their liberties and properties might be affected by these canons (x). The king did not live to affix the royal sanction to the new canons. Sir John Sharington, whose crimes and malversations had appeared so egregious at the condemnation of lord Seymour, obtained from parliament a reversal of his attainder (y). This man sought favour with the more zealous reformers; and bishop Latimer affirmed, that though formerly he had been a most notorious knave, he was now so penitent that he had become a very honest man.

In the year 1550, soon after Warwick and the council of regency began to exercise their power, they found themselves involved in the same difficulties that had embarrassed the protector. The wars with France and Scotland could not be supported by an exhausted exchequer; seemed dangerous to a divided nation; and were now acknowledged not to have any object which even the greatest and most uninterrupted success could attain. The project of peace entertained by Somerset had served them as a pretence for clamour against his administration; yet, after sending sir Thomas Cheney to the emperor, and making

(w) These articles were,

1. That he had not observed the condition on which he had been made protector.

2. That he had treated with ambassadors without notifying it to the council, and disposed of governments and bishoprics by his own authority.

3. That he had held a court of requests at his own house.—Here we may observe, that the intent of this court was to hear poor men's petitions and suits; and upon the hearing of them, he either decided their business, or sent his letters to the Chancery in their favour; which was reckoned to be a stopping of the proceedings of the courts, or influencing the judges.

4. That he had embased the coin.

5. That he had issued out proclamations in the affair of the inclosures, against the mind of the whole council.

6. That he had not taken care to suppress, but had even supported and encouraged the late insurrections.

7. That he had occasioned the loss of the forts in the Boulognnois, by neglecting to furnish them with ammunition and provisions.

8. That he had endeavoured to instill into the king an ill opinion of his counsellors.

9. That he had caused the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors.

10. That he had put the king in fear, by carrying him so suddenly to Windsor, and thereby cast him into a dangerous disease.

11. That he had disarmed the king's servants, armed his own friends and servants, and did intend to fly to Jersey or Guernsey.

No unprejudiced reader can, we apprehend, peruse these articles of impeachment or accusation against the duke of Somerset, without horror, at the base and treacherous manner in which his enemies brought him to the block.

again

again a fruitless effort to engage him in the protection of Boulogne, they found themselves obliged to listen to the advances which Henry made them, by the canal of Guidotti, a Florentine merchant. John Russel, earl of Bedford, sir John Mason, Paget, and Petre, were sent over to Boulogne, with full powers to negociate. The French king absolutely refused to pay the two millions of crowns which his predecessor had acknowledged to be due to the crown of England as arrears of pensions; and said that he never would consent to render himself tributary to any prince: but he offered a sum for the immediate restitution of Boulogne; and four hundred thousand crowns were agreed on, March 24, one half to be paid immediately, the other in August following. Six hostages were given for the performance of this article. Scotland was comprehended in the treaty: the English stipulated to restore Lauder and Douglas, and to demolish the fortresses of Roxburgh and Eymouth. Peace being concluded with France, a project was entertained of a close alliance with that kingdom; and Henry willingly embraced a proposal so suitable both to his interests and his inclinations. An agreement some time after was formed for a marriage between Edward and Elizabeth, a daughter of France; and all the articles were, after a little negociation, fully settled: but this project never took effect.

The intention of marrying the king to a daughter of Henry, a violent persecutor of the Protestants, was nowise acceptable to the Reformers in England; but in all other respects the council was steady in promoting the reformation, and in enforcing the laws against the Catholics Several prelates were still biassed to the communion of the church of Rome; and though they made some compliances, in order to save their bishoprics, they retarded, as much as they safely could, the execution of the new laws, and gave countenance to such incumbents as were negligent or refractory. A resolution was therefore taken to seek pretences for depriving those prelates; and the execution of this intention was the more easy, as they had all of them been obliged to take commissions, in which it was declared, that they held their sees during the king's pleasure only. It was thought proper to begin with Gardiner, in order to strike a terror into the rest. The method of proceeding against him was violent. Injunctions had been given him to inculcate, in a sermon, the duty of obedience to a king, even during his minority; and because he had neglected this topic, he had been thrown into prison, and had been there detained during two years, without being accused of any crime, except disobedience to this command. The duke of Somerset, Mr. secretary Petre, and some others of the council, were sent, in order to try his temper, and they endeavoured to find some grounds for depriving him: he professed to them his intention of conforming to the government, of supporting the king's laws, and of officiating by the new liturgy: but this was not the disposition which they expected or desired. A new deputation was therefore sent, who carried him several articles to subscribe. He was required to acknowledge his former misbehaviour, and to confess the justice of his confinement: he was likewise to own, that the king was supreme head of the church; that the power of making and dispensing with holidays was part of the royal prerogative; that the book of common-prayer was a godly and commendable form; that the king was a complete sovereign in his minority; that the law of the six articles was justly repealed; and that the king had full authority to correct and reform what was amiss in ecclesiastical discipline, government, or doctrine. The bishop was willing to set his hand to all the articles except the first: he maintained his conduct to have been inoffensive; and declared that he would not own himself guilty of faults which he had never committed.

The council, perceiving that the artful prelate had proceeded thus far, were determined to prevent his full compliance, by multiplying the difficulties upon him, and sending him new articles to subscribe. A list was therefore selected of such points as they thought would be most disagreeable to him, and they insisted on his submission, and his acknowledgement of past errors. They also demanded a promise, that he would recommend and publish all these articles from the pulpit: but Gardiner determined not to comply with their demands: he still maintained his innocence; desired a fair trial; and refused to subscribe more articles, till he should recover his liberty. For this offence his bishopric was put under sequestration for three months; and as he then appeared no more compliant than before, a commission was appointed to try him. The commissioners were, the primate, the bishops of London, Ely, and Lincoln, secretary Petre, sir James Hales, and some other lawyers. Gardiner objected to the legality of the commission, which was not founded on any statute or precedent; and he appealed from the commissioners to the king. His appeal was not regarded: sentence was pronounced against him: he was deprived of his bishopric of Rochester on the 13th of February, 1550 (z), and committed to close custody: his books and papers were seized; he was secluded from all company; and was not allowed either to send or receive any letters or messages.

Gardiner, as well as the other prelates, had agreed to hold his office during the king's pleasure: but the council, unwilling to make use of a concession which had been extorted, chose to employ some forms of justice; but the zeal of the reformers did not stop here. Day, bishop of Chichester, Heathe of Worcester, and Viosey of Exeter, were deprived of their bishoprics, for disobedience. Even Kitchen of Landaff, Capon of Salisbury, and Sampson of Coventry, though they had complied in every thing, yet not being cordial in their obedience, were obliged to seek protection, by sacrificing the most considerable revenues of their see to the courtiers.

An order was likewise issued by the council for purging the library at Westminster of all missals, legends, and other superstitious volumes, and delivering their garniture to sir Anthony Aucher (a). Great havoc was likewise made on the libraries at Oxford. Books and manuscripts, by the fury of the zealous commissioners, were destroyed without distinction (b). The university were in danger of losing their own revenues; and expected every moment to be swallowed up by the earl of Warwick and his associates.

Notwithstanding every one besides yielded to the authority of the council, the princess Mary never could be brought to compliance; and she still continued to adhere to the mass, and to reject the new liturgy. Her behaviour was during some time connived at; but at last her two chaplains, Mallet and Berkley, were thrown into prison; and remonstrances were made to the princess herself on account of her disobedience. The council wrote her a letter, by which they endeavoured to effect a change in her sentiments, and to persuade her that her religious faith was very ill grounded. They asked her what warrant there was in scripture for prayers in an unknown tongue, the use of images, or offering up the sacrament for the dead; and they desired her to peruse St. Austin, and the other ancient doctors, who would convince her of the errors of the Romish superstition, and prove that it was founded merely on false miracles and lying stories. The princess Mary, however, remained obstinate against all this advice, and declared herself willing to endure death rather than relinquish her religion: she only feared, she said, that she was not worthy to suffer martyrdom in so holy a cause: and as for Protestant books, she thanked God, that as she never had, so she hoped never to read any of them. Dreading farther trouble, she endeavoured to make an escape to her kinsman Charles; but her design was discovered and prevented. The emperor remonstrated in her behalf, and even threatened hostilities, if liberty of conscience were refused her: but though the council, sensible that the kingdom was in no condition to support with honour such a war, was desirous to comply, they found great difficulty to overcome the scruples of the young king. He had been educated in such a violent abhorrence of mass and other popish rites, which he regarded as impious and idolatrous, that he should participate, he thought, in the sin, if he allowed its commission: and when at last the importunity of Cranmer, Ridley, and Poinet, prevailed somewhat over his opposition, he burst into tears; lamenting his sister's obstinacy, and bewailing his own hard fate, that he must suffer her to continue in such an abominable mode of worship.

The great object, at this time, of antipathy among the protestant (z) It was in this year that the city of London, for the sum of one thousand marks, purchased of the king the liberties of Southwark.

(a) Many of these books were plaited with gold and silver, and curiously embossed.

(b) The volumes of divinity suffered for their rich binding: those of literature were condemned as useless: those of geometry and astronomy were supposed to contain nothing but necromancy.

Protestant sects was Popery. The Protestants regarded the Papists as the common enemy, who threatened every moment to overwhelm the evangelical faith, and destroy its partizans by fire and sword: they had not as yet had leisure to attend to the other minute differences among themselves, which afterwards became the object of furious quarrels and animosities, and threw the whole kingdom into a ferment. Several Lutheran divines who had reputation in those days, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and others, were induced to take shelter in England, from the persecutions which the emperor exercised in Germany; and they received protection and encouragement. John à Lasco, a Polish nobleman, being expelled his country by the rigours of the Catholics, settled during some time at Emden, in East Friezeland, where he became preacher to a congregation of the Reformed. Foreseeing the persecutions which ensued, he removed to England, and brought his congregation along with him. The council, who regarded them as industrious useful people, and desired to invite over others of the same character, not only gave them the church of Augustine Friers for the exercise of their religion, but granted them a charter, by which they were erected into a corporation, consisting of a superintendant and four assisting ministers. This ecclesiastical establishment was quite independent of the church of England, and differed from it in some rites and ceremonies.

These differences among the Protestants were matter of triumph to the Catholics; who insisted, that the moment men departed from the authority of the church, they lost all criterion of truth and falsehood in matters of religion, and must be carried away by every wind of doctrine. The continual variations of every sect of Protestants afforded them the same topic of reasoning. The book of Common Prayer in England underwent a new revisal, and some rites and ceremonies which had given offence were omitted. The speculative doctrines, or the metaphysics of religion, were also reduced to forty-two articles. These were intended to obviate farther divisions and variations; and the compiling of them had been postponed till the establishment of the liturgy, which was justly regarded as a more material object to the people.

The theological zeal of the council, though seemingly fervent, went not so far as to make them neglect their own temporal concerns. They found leisure to attend to the public interest; nay, to the commerce of the nation, which was at that time very little the object of general study or attention. The trade of England had anciently been carried on altogether by foreigners, chiefly the inhabitants of the Hanse-towns, or Easterlings, as they were called; and in order to encourage these merchants to settle in England, they had been erected into a corporation by Henry III. had obtained a patent, were endowed with privileges, and were exempted from several heavy duties paid by other aliens (c). The council now thought it expedient to annul the privileges of this corporation, privileges which put them nearly on an equal footing with Englishmen in the duties which they paid; and as such patents were, during that age, granted by the absolute power of the king, men were the less surprized to find them revoked by the same authority. Several remonstrances were made against this innovation by Lubec, Hamburgh, and other Hanse towns; but without effect; for the council persevered in their resolution, and the good resulting from it soon became visible to the nation. The English merchants, by their very situation as natives, had advantages above foreigners in the purchase of cloth, wool, and other commodities; though these advantages had not hitherto been sufficient to rouse their industry, or engage them to become rivals to this opulent company: but when aliens' duty was also imposed upon all foreigners indiscriminately, the English were tempted to enter into commerce; and a spirit of industry began to appear in the kingdom.

About the same time a treaty was made with Gustavus Ericson, king of Sweden, by which it was stipulated, that if he sent bullion into England, he might export English commodities without paying custom; that he should carry bullion to no other prince; that if he sent ozimus, steel, copper, &c. he should pay custom for English commodities as an Englishman; and that if he sent other merchandize, he should have free intercourse, paying custom as a stranger. The bullion sent over by Sweden, though it could not be in great quantity, set the mint to work: good specie was coined; and much of the base metal formerly issued was recalled: a circumstance which tended extremely to the encouragement of commerce.

In April, 1551, England was visited by the sweating sickness: it began at Shrewsbury, and spread towards the north, continuing to make its ravages till the October following. Whoever was seized with it died, or recovered, within ten hours. If he took cold, he was sure to die in three hours; if he slept, within six hours, he died raving; and it raged chiefly amongst young men of robust constitutions. As this disease did not affect foreigners in England, so it spread amongst the English alone residing in foreign parts. This sickness carried off several of the nobility also, amongst whom were the duke of Suffolk and his brother; by which means the title became extinct in the family of the Brandons, which were next in succession to the crown after the two daughters of Henry the Eighth.

The schemes, however, which had been adopted for promoting industry, were likely to prove abortive, by the fear of domestic convulsions, arising from the ambition of Warwick. That nobleman, not contented with the station which he had attained, carried farther his pretensions, and had gained partizans, who were disposed to second him in every enterprize. The last earl of Northumberland died without issue; and as sir Thomas Percy, his brother, had been attainted on account of the share which he had in the Yorkshire insurrection during the late reign, the title was at present extinct, and the estate was vested in the crown. Warwick now procured to himself a grant of those ample possessions, which lay chiefly in the North, the most warlike part of the kingdom; and he was dignified with the title of duke of Northumberland. His friend William Paulet, lord St. John, the treasurer, was created, first, earl of Wiltshire, then marquis of Winchester; and sir William Herbert obtained the title of earl of Pembroke. But the ambition of Northumberland made him regard all increase of possessions and titles, either to himself or his partizans, as steps only to farther acquisitions. Finding that Somerset, though degraded from his dignity, and even lessened in the public opinion by his spiritless conduct, still enjoyed a considerable share of popularity, he determined to ruin the man whom he regarded as the chief obstacle to the attainment of his hopes. The alliance which had been contracted between the families had produced no cordial union, and only enabled Northumberland to compass with more certainty the destruction of his rival. He secretly gained many of the friends and servants of that unhappy nobleman: he sometimes terrified him by the appearance of danger; sometimes provoked him by ill usage. The unguarded Somerset often broke out into menacing expressions against Northumberland: at other times he formed rash projects, which he immediately abandoned: his treacherous confidents carried to his enemy every passionate word which dropped from his mouth: they revealed the schemes which they themselves had first suggested; and Northumberland, thinking that the proper season was now come, began to act in an open manner against him.

In the night of the 16th of October, 1551, the duke of Somerset, lord Grey, David, and John Seymour, Hammond, and Neudigate, two of the duke's servants, sir Ralph Vane, and sir Thomas Palmer, were arrested, and committed to custody in the Tower. Next day the duchess of Somerset, with her favourites Crane and his wife, sir Miles Partridge, sir Michael Stanhope, Bannister, and others, were thrown into prison. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had all along acted as a spy upon Somerset, accused him of having formed a design to raise an insurrection in the north, to attack the gens d'armes on a muster-day, to secure the Tower, and to raise a rebellion in London; but, what was the only probable accusation, he asserted, that Somerset had once laid a project for murdering Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, at a banquet which was to be given them by lord Paget. Crane and his wife confirmed Palmer's testimony with regard to this last design; and it appears that some rash scheme of that nature had really been mentioned; though no regular conspiracy had been been formed, or means prepared for its execution. Hammond confessed that the duke had armed men to guard him one night in his house at Greenwich.

(c) So ignorant were the English of commerce, that this company, usually denominated the Merchants of the Still-yard, engrossed, even down to the reign of Edward the Sixth, almost the whole foreign trade of the kingdom; and as they naturally employed the shipping of their own country, the navigation of England was also in a very languishing condition.

Somerset was brought to his trial before the marquis of Winchester, created high steward. Twenty-seven peers composed the jury, among whom were Northumberland, Pembroke, and Northampton, whom decency should have hindered from acting as judges in the trial of a man that appeared to be their enemy. Somerset was accused of high treason on account of the projected insurrections, and of felony in laying a design to murder privy-counsellors.

Notwithstanding the partiality of Somerset's trial, the proofs against him were so trivially supported, when witnesses were examined by the privy council on the 1st of December; and Somerset's defence was so satisfactory, that the peers gave verdict in his favour: the intention alone of assaulting the privy-counsellors was supported by tolerable evidence; and the jury brought him in guilty of felony. The prisoner himself confessed that he had expressed his intention of murdering Northumberland and the other lords; but had not formed any resolution on that head; and when he received sentence, he asked pardon of those peers for the designs which he had hearkened to against them. The people, by whom Somerset was beloved, hearing the first part of his sentence, by which he was acquitted from treason, expressed their joy by loud acclamations; but their satisfaction was suddenly damped, on finding that he was condemned to death for felony.

Care had been taken by Northumberland's emissaries, to prepossess the young king against his uncle; and lest he should relent, no access was given to any of Somerset's friends, and the prince was kept from reflection by a continued series of occupations and amusements. At last the prisoner was brought to the scaffold on Tower Hill, on the 22nd of January, 1552, amidst great crowds of spectators, who bore him such sincere kindness that they entertained to the last moment the fond hopes of his pardon. Many of them rushed in to dip their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they long preserved as a precious relique; and some of them soon after, when Northumberland met with a similar fate, upbraided him with his cruelty, and displayed to him these symbols of his crime.

Not long after the execution of that nobleman, sir Thomas Arundel, sir Michael Stanhope, sir Miles Patridge, and sir Ralph Vane, all of them Somerset's friends, were brought to their trials, condemned, and executed on the 26th of February: great injustice seems to have been used in their prosecution (d). Lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy, was on some pretence tried in the star-chamber, and condemned in a fine of six thousand pounds, with the loss of his office. To mortify him the more, he was degraded from the order of the garter; as unworthy, on account of his mean birth, to share that honour. Lord Rich, chancellor, was also compelled to resign his office, on the discovery of some marks of friendship which he had shewn to Somerset.

On January the 23rd, the day after the execution of Somerset, a session of parliament was held, in which farther advances were made towards the establishment of the reformation. The new liturgy was authorized; and penalties were enacted against all those who absented themselves from public worship (e). To use the mass had already been prohibited under severe penalties; and the practice of toleration was at that time equally unknown to all sects and parties. To dissent from the religion of the magistrate, was universally conceived to be as criminal as to question his title, or rebel against his authority.

A law was enacted against usury; that is, against taking any interest for money (f). This act was the remains of ancient superstition; but being found extremely iniquitous in itself, as well as prejudicial to commerce, it was afterwards repealed in the twelfth of Elizabeth (g).

A bill was introduced by the ministry into the house of lords, renewing those rigorous statutes of treason which had been abrogated in the beginning of this reign; and though the peers, by their high station, stood most exposed to these tempests of state, yet had they so little regard to public security, or even to their own true interest, that they passed the bill with only one dissenting voice (h). But the commons rejected it, and prepared a new bill, that passed into a law, (5 and 6 Edward VI. cap. 2.) by which it was enacted, That whoever should call the king or any of his heirs, named in the statute of the 35th of the last reign, heretic, schismatic, tyrant, infidel, or usurper of the crown, should forfeit, for the first offence, their goods and chattels, and be imprisoned during pleasure; for the second, should incur a præmunire; for the third should be attainted for treason. But if any should unadvisedly utter such a slander in writing, printing, painting, carving, or graving, he was for the first offence to be held a traitor (i). The commons annexed to this bill a clause which was of more importance than the bill itself, that no one should be convicted of any kind of treason unless the crime were proved by the oaths of two witnesses confronted with the prisoner. The lords for some time scrupled to pass this clause, though conformable to the most obvious principles of equity. But the members of that house of commons trusted for protection to their personal interest and power, and neglected the noblest and most permanent security, that of laws.

The house of peers passed a bill, whose object was making a provision for the poor; but the commons, not chusing that a money-bill should begin in the upper house, framed a new act to the same purpose (k).

There was another occasion in which the parliament reposed an unusual confidence in the bishops. They empowered them to proceed against such as neglected the Sundays and holidays (l). But these were unguarded concessions granted to the church: the general humour of the age rather led men to bereave the ecclesiastics of all power, and even to pillage them of their property: many clergymen about this time were obliged for a subsistence to turn carpenters or taylors, and some kept ale-houses (m). The bishops themselves were generally reduced to poverty, and held both their revenues and spiritual office by a very precarious and uncertain tenure.

Tunstal, bishop of Durham, was one of the most eminent prelates of that age, still less for the dignity of his see, than for his own personal merit; his learning, moderation, humanity, and beneficence. He had opposed, by his vote and authority, all innovations in religion; but as soon as they were enacted, he had always submitted, and had conformed to every theological system which had been established. His known probity had made this compliance be ascribed, not to an interested or time-serving spirit, but to a sense of duty, which led him to think, that all private opinion ought to be sacrificed to the great concern of public peace and tranquillity. The general regard paid to his character had protected him from any severe treatment during the administration of Somerset; but when Northumberland gained the ascendant, he was thrown into prison; and as that rapacious nobleman had formed a design of seizing the revenues of the see of Durham, and of acquiring to himself a principality in the northern counties, he was resolved, in order to effect his purpose, to deprive Tunstal of his bishopric. A bill of attainder, therefore, on pretence of misprision of treason, was introduced into the house of peers against the prelate; and it passed with the opposition only of lord Stourton, a zealous Catholic, and of Cranmer, who always bore a cordial and sincere friendship to the bishop of Durham. But when the bill was sent down to the commons, they required that witnesses should be examined, that Tunstal should be allowed to defend himself, and that he should be confronted with his accusers: and when these demands were refused, they rejected the bill. This equity, so unusual in the parliament during that age, was ascribed by (d) It is remarkable that the jury had been compelled, as it were, by keeping them locked up from meat and drink, almost twenty-four hours, to find them guilty.

(i) It may be worthy of remark, that the king and his next heir, the princess Mary, were professedly of different religions; and religions which threw on each other the imputation of heresy, schism, idolatry, profaneness, blasphemy, wickedness, and all the opprobrious epithets that religious zeal has invented. It was almost impossible, therefore, for the people, if they spoke at all on these subjects, not to fall into the crime so severely punished by the statute; and the jealousy of the commons for liberty, though it led them to reject the bill of treasons sent them by the lords, appears not to have been very active, vigilant, or clear-sighted.

(k) By this act the churchwardens were empowered to collect charitable contributions; and if any refused to give, or dissuaded others frem that charity, the bishop of the diocese was empowered to proceed against them.

(l) 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 3. (m) Burnet, vol. ii. p. 202.

Northumberland and his partizans, not to any regard for liberty and justice, but to the prevalence of Somerset's faction in a house of commons, which, being chosen during the administration of that nobleman, had been almost entirely filled with his creatures. They were confirmed in this opinion, when they found that a bill, ratifying the attainder of Somerset and his accomplices, was also rejected by the commons, though it had passed the upper house. A resolution was therefore taken to dissolve the parliament on the 15th of April, which had sitten during this whole reign; and soon after to summon a new one, which might be more devoted to Northumberland's interest.

In the year 1552, Heath, bishop of Worcester, and Day, bishop of Chichester, were deprived of their sees for openly opposing the progress of the Reformation. The see of Gloucester was suppressed, and converted into an exempt archdeaconry. Its bishop, Dr. John Hooper, was made bishop of Worcester by a patent, with this clause in it, "Durante vita naturali, si tam diu se bene gesserit:" by which bishops could be deprived of their sees at the pleasure of the king.

The queen of Scotland passed this year through England in her way home from France, and was magnificently treated and conducted to her own borders. Being arrived in Scotland, she found means to persuade the earl of Arran to resign the regency into her own hands, and had the address to secure the reins of government to herself, by promising the Reformed the free exercise of their religion in their own houses, to the great disgust of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, who caballed against her.

Northumberland, in order to ensure to himself a house of commons entirely obsequious to his will, ventured on an expedient, which could not have been practised, or even imagined, in an age where there was any idea or comprehension of liberty. He engaged the king to write circular letters to all the sheriffs, in which he enjoined them to inform the freeholders, that they were required to choose men of knowledge and experience for their representatives. After this general exhortation, the king continued in these words: "And yet, nevertheless, our pleasure is, that where our privy-council, or any of them, shall, in our behalf, recommend within their jurisdiction men of learning and wisdom, in such cases their directions shall be regarded and followed, as tending to the same end which we desire; that is, to have this assembly composed of the persons in our realm the best fitted to give advice and good counsel (n)." Several letters were sent from the king, recommending members to particular counties, sir Richard Cotton to Hampshire; sir William Fitzwilliams and sir Henry Nevil to Berkshire; sir William Drury and sir Henry Benningfield to Suffolk, &c. But though some counties only received this species of congè d'elire from the king; the recommendations from the privy-council and the counsellors, we may fairly presume, would extend to the greater part, if not to the whole of the kingdom.

A new parliament being chosen, it met on the 1st of March, 1553, and, by their proceedings, gave evident proofs of their attachment to the duke of Northumberland. As Tunstal had in the interval, on the 14th of August, in the preceding year, been deprived of his bishopric, by the sentence of lay commissioners appointed to try him, the see of Durham was by act of parliament divided into two bishoprics, which had certain portions of the revenue assigned them. To the new bishopric of Durham two thousand marks a year was allotted, and to that of Newcastle (taken out of Durham) one thousand. The regalities of the see, which included the jurisdiction of a count palatine, were given by the king to Northumberland; nor is it to be doubted but that nobleman had also purposed to make rich plunder of the revenue as was then usual with the courtiers whenever a bishopric became vacant.

The commons gave the ministry another mark of attachment, which was at that time the most sincere of any, the most cordial, and the most difficult to be obtained: they granted a considerable subsidy, with two tenths, and two fifteenths. To render this present the more acceptable, they voted a preamble, containing a long accusation of Somerset, "for involving the king in wars, wasting his treasure, engaging him in much debt, embasing the coin, and giving occasion for a most terrible rebellion (o)." This parliament was dissolved on the 31st of March, having sat only one month.

(o) 7 Edward VI. cap. 12.

The debts of the crown were at this time considerable. The king had received from France four hundred thousand crowns on delivering Boulogne; he had reaped profit from the sale of some chantry lands; the churches had been spoiled of all their plate and rich ornaments, which, by a decree of council, had been converted to the king's use: yet such had been the rapacity of the courtiers, that the crown owed about three hundred thousand pounds (p); and great dilapidations were at the same time made of the royal demesnes. The young prince showed, among other virtues, a disposition to frugality, which, had he lived, would soon have retrieved these losses; but as his health was declining very fast, the present emptiness of the exchequer was a sensible obstacle to the execution of those projects which the ambition of Northumberland had founded on the prospect of Edward's approaching end.

That nobleman represented to the prince, whom youth and an infirm state of health made susceptible of any impression, that his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, had both of them been declared illegitimate by act of parliament: and though Henry the Eighth, by his will, had restored them to a place in the succession, the nation would never submit to see the throne of England filled by a bastard: that they were the king's sisters by the half-blood only; and even if they were legitimate, could not enjoy the crown as his heirs and successors: that the queen of Scots stood excluded by the late king's will; and being an alien, had lost by law all right of inheriting; not to mention, that as she was betrothed to the dauphin, she would by her succession render England, as she had already done Scotland, a province to France: that the certain consequence of his sister Mary's succession, or that of the queen of Scots, was the abolition of the protestant religion, and the repeal of the laws enacted in favour of the reformation, and the re-establishment of the usurpation and idolatry of the church of Rome: that, fortunately for England, the same order of succession which justice required, was also the most conformable to public interest; and there was not on any side any just ground for doubt or deliberation: that when these three princesses were excluded by such solid reasons, the succession devolved on the marchioness of Dorset, elder daughter of the French queen, and the duke of Suffolk: that the next heir of the marchioness was the lady Jane Grey, a lady of the most amiable character, accomplished by the best education, both in literature and religion; and every way worthy of a crown; and that even if her title by blood were doubtful, which there was no just reason to pretend, the king was possessed of the same power that his father enjoyed, and might leave her the crown by letters patent. These reasonings made impression on the young prince; and above all, his zealous attachment to the protestant religion, made him apprehend the consequences, if so bigotted a catholic as his sister Mary should succeed to the throne. And though he bore a tender affection to the lady Elizabeth, who was liable to no such objection, means were found to persuade him that he could not exclude the one sister on account of illegitimacy, without giving also an exclusion to the other.

Northumberland, finding that his arguments were likely to operate on the king, began to prepare the other parts of his scheme. Two sons of the duke of Suffolk having died this season of the sweating sickness, the title was extinct; and Northumberland engaged the king to bestow it on the marquis of Dorset. By means of this favour, and of others which he conferred upon him, he persuaded the new duke of Suffolk and the duchess to give their daughter, the lady Jane, in marriage to his fourth son, the lord Guildford Dudley. In order to fortify himself by farther alliances, he negociated a marriage between the lady Catherine Grey, second daughter of Suffolk, and lord Herbert, eldest son of the earl of Pembroke. He also married his own daughter to lord Hastings, eldest son of the earl of Huntingdon. These marriages were solemnized with great pomp and festivity; and the people, who hated Northumberland, could not forbear expressing their indignation at seeing such public demonstrations of joy during the languishing state of the young prince's health.

Edward had been seized on the 2nd of April, 1552, first with the measles, then with the small-pox; but having perfectly recovered from both these distempers, the nation entertained hopes that they would only serve to confirm his health; and he had afterwards made a progress through some parts of the kingdom. It was suspected that he had there over-heated himself in exercise: he was seized with a cough, which proved obstinate, and gave way neither to regimen nor medicines: several fatal symptoms of a consumption appeared; and though it was hoped, that as the season advanced, his youth and temperance might get the better of the malady, men saw with great concern his bloom and vigour insensibly decay. The general attachment to the young prince, joined to the hatred borne the Dudleys, made it be remarked, that Edward had every moment declined in health from the time that lord Robert Dudley had been put about him in quality of gentleman of the bedchamber.

The languishing state of Edward's health made Northumberland the more intent on the execution of his project. He removed all except his own emissaries from about the king: he himself attended him with the greatest assiduity: he pretended the most anxious concern for his health and welfare; and by all these artifices he prevailed on the young prince to give his final consent to the settlement projected. Sir Edward Montague, chief justice of the common pleas, sir John Baker, and sir Thomas Bromley, two judges, with the attorney and solicitor-general, were summoned to the council; where, after the minutes of the intended deed were read to them, the king required them to draw them up in the form of letters patent. They hesitated to obey; and desired time to consider of it. The more they reflected, the greater danger they found in compliance. The settlement of the crown by Henry VIII. had been made in consequence of an act of parliament; and by another act, passed in the beginning of this reign, it was declared treason in any of the heirs, their aiders or abettors, to attempt on the right of another, or change the order of succession. The judges pleaded these reasons before the council. They urged, that such a patent as was intended would be entirely invalid; that it would subject, not only the judges who drew it, but every counsellor who signed it, to the pains of treason; and that the only proper expedient, both for giving sanction to the new settlement, and freeing its partizans from danger, was to summon a parliament, and to obtain the consent of that assembly. The king said, that he intended afterwards to follow that method, and would call a parliament, in which he purposed to have his settlement ratified; but in the mean time he required the judges, on their allegiance, to draw the patent in the form required. The council told the judges that their refusal would subject all of them to the pains of treason. Northumberland gave to Montague the appellation of traitor; and said, that he would in his shirt fight any man in so just a cause as that of lady Jane's succession. The judges were reduced to great difficulties between the dangers from the law, and those which arose from the violence of present power and authority. The arguments were canvassed in several different meetings between the council and the judges; and no solution could be found of the difficulties. At last Montague proposed an expedient, which satisfied both his brethren and the counsellors. He desired that a special commission should be passed by the king and council, requiring the judges to draw a patent for the new settlement of the crown; and that a pardon should immediately after be granted them for any offence which they might have incurred by their compliance. When the patent was drawn, and brought to the bishop of Ely, then lord chancellor, in order to have the great seal affixed to it, this prelate required that all the judges should previously sign it. Gosnold at first refused; and it was with much difficulty that he was prevailed on, by the violent menaces of Northumberland to comply; but the constancy of sir James Hales, who, though a zealous protestant, preferred justice on this occasion to the prejudices of his party, could not be shaken by any expedient. The chancellor next required, for his greater security, that all the privy counsellors should set their hands to the patent: the intrigues of Northumberland, or the fears of his violence, were so prevalent, that the counsellors complied with this demand. Cranmer alone hesitated some time, but at last yielded to the earnest and pathetic intreaties of the king. Cecil, at that time secretary of state, pretended afterwards that he only signed as witness to the king's subscription. And thus, by the king's letters patent, the two princesses, Mary and Elizabeth; were set aside; and the crown was settled on the heirs of the duchess of Suffolk; for the duchess herself was content to give place to her daughters.

After this settlement was made, with so many inauspicious circumstances, Edward visibly declined every day; small hopes were entertained of his recovery. His physicians were now dismissed by Northumberland's advice, and by an order of council; and he was put into the hands of an ignorant woman, who undertook in a little time to restore him to his former state of health. After the use of her medicines, all the bad symptoms increased to the most violent degree: he felt a difficulty of speech and breathing; his pulse failed, his legs swelled, his colour became livid; many other symptoms appeared of his approaching dissolution; and he expired at Greenwich on the 6th of July, 1553, in the sixteenth year of his age, and the seventh of his reign. He was buried on the 8th of August, in Henry the Seventh's Chapel, at Westminster, near the body of the said king, his grandfather; where a superb monument was erected to his memory.

All the English historians, says Hume, dwell with pleasure on the excellent qualities of this young prince; whom the flattering promises of hope, joined to many real virtues, had made an object of tender affection to the public. He possessed mildness of disposition, application to study and business, a capacity to learn and judge, and an attachment to equity and justice. He seems only to have contracted, from his education, and from the genius of the age in which he lived, too much of a narrow prepossession in matters of religion, which made him incline somewhat to bigotry and persecution: but as the bigotry of Protestants, less governed by priests, lies under more restraints than that of Catholics, the effects of this malignant quality were the less to be apprehended, if a longer life had been granted to young Edward.

This young king was a great patronizer of the arts, as well liberal as mechanical, and he was a friend to merit of every denomination. He encouraged every measure which he considered as likely to redound to the interest or the happiness of his people. He stored his mind with a knowledge of the politics and interests of foreign nations; and he astonished the ambassadors from different states of Europe, by the variety of his knowledge, and the sagacity of his observations. He has indeed been charged with a want of mental vigour; and in support of this idea, they mention the "death of his uncle, the duke of Somerset, a faithful servant of the crown, whom, from a facility in believing the insinuations of his enemies, and from an apparent defect in manly firmness, he gave up to the malice of faction." This, however, we can easily acquit him of, and see no reason to charge him with want of manly firmness in this affair. He came to the throne when he was nine years old, and five years afterwards, when he was only fourteen, he signed the warrant for the duke's execution; but he did not sign it, till nearly eight weeks after that nobleman had been condemned, during which time the duke's enemies kept him constantly amused with different sports and pastimes, paid strict attention to him, and were unremittingly instilling into his mind notions detrimental to the interests of his uncle. Thus it was that they wrought upon his infant mind, and at last persuaded him to sign the fatal warrant. It is not to be wondered that a boy of fourteen should be persuaded by his council; for we surely cannot expect to find in one of so tender an age, the vigour and firmness of a man of forty. Indeed, there is no reason to doubt, had he been continued longer among us, he would have asserted his natural right of seeing with his own eyes, and judging according to his own convictions.

That Edward was a prince of œconomy may be gathered from the following statement of the annual expences, during his reign:

The parliament which met on the 4th of November, 1547, gave the king all the lands designed for the maintenance of chantries, chapels, and colleges, which were not possessed by Henry the Eighth, and all revenues given for obits, anniversaries, lights in the churches, together with all Guild lands, provided they should be appropriated to the maintenance of grammar schools and preachers. Accordingly king Edward founded and endowed Christ's Hospital, in London, that of St. Thomas, in Southwark; at St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk; at Spilesby lesby and Louth, in Lincolnshire; at Chelmsford, in Essex; at Sedburgh, in Yorkshire; at Shrewsbury; at East Retford, in Nottinghamshire; at Birmingham, in Warwickshire; at Morpeth, in Northumberland; and at Macclesfield, Nuneaton, Stourbridge, in Worcestershire; Bath, Bedford, Guildford, Grantham, Thorne, Giggleswick, St. Albans, Southampton, Stratford upon Avon, &c. &c.

CHAP. VI.

MARY.

FEW nations have suffered more from the depravity of their kings, or from the turbulence of their nobility, than the English; for whom the death of Edward the Sixth prepared fresh troubles, paving the way for disorders which rendered the reign of his successor one of the most gloomy in the dark annals of regal turpitude. No regular rules of succession had hitherto been observed; it had been obtained, partly by lineal descent, and partly by the apparent aptitude for government in the person chosen: neither quite hereditary, nor entirely elective, it had made ancestry the pretext of right; while the consent of the people was necessary to support the best-founded claims which birth could bestow. In fact, this species of succession, when conducted with wisdom, is the best that can be conceived; because it is the most conducive to the welfare and felicity of the subject; being equally calculated for the prevention of that aristocracy which is ever the result of governments purely elective; and of that tyranny, which is too often established where hereditary pretensions are never infringed on.

The protestants, as may well be supposed, had now reason to apprehend a series of persecutions from the elevation of so bigotted a person as the princess Mary to the throne: indeed they appear to have been either so fully convinced of the expediency of maintaining the principle of hereditary succession, or they were so apprehensive of the inutility of attempting to overturn a claim which had only the faction of the duke of Northumberland to oppose it, that but few gave their active support to lady Jane Grey, the avowed friend of their religion. After Edward's death, the duke of Northumberland (who was then at the head of the nation) and the duke of Suffolk were sent by the council to Durham House in the Strand, to inform lady Jane of her being appointed by the deceased king to ascend the throne. This young lady therefore received an unwelcome visit from the duke of Northumberland, and the chief noblemen of his party, who, approaching her on their knees, surprized her with a display of humility which she did not expect; for they had not yet communicated to her the appointment which had been made for her to succeed to the sovereignty of the nation. The desire of reigning, which so many of her sex are inclined to cherish, had little sway over her innocent mind; and though the danger of accepting the offer of a crown which the majority of the nation considered as due to another, it is probable that, in her earnest refusal of the royal dignity, she was less influenced by that consideration, than by a real unwillingness to exchange the calm pursuits of literature and science, and the mild joys of domestic retirement, for the splendid cares of royalty, and the toils and anxieties of state. But the importunities of the duke her father-in-law, the remonstrances of her parents, and the persuasions of her husband, for whom she had a strong affection, induced her, though with the greatest reluctance, to recall her refusal, and accept the crown which the late king had bequeathed to her.

The duke of Northumberland endeavoured to conceal the circumstance of the king's death for some time, that he might have an opportunity of getting the princesses Mary and Elizabeth into his power, and of preparing for the peaceable establishment of the lady Jane Grey on the throne. Letters of invitation had been written to those princesses, by the council, previous to the death of Edward, inviting them to repair to the palace, and comfort their afflicted brother; and Mary, who readily accepted the invitation, had reached Hoddesdon, in Hertfordshire, in her way to the metropolis, when she was informed of Edward's death, and of her own danger, from the earl of Arundel, who, though he maintained an appearance of amity with her great enemy the duke of Northumberland, cherished a strong resentment against him for former injuries. This information induced her to turn back, and she travelled with extraordinary rapidity to Kenning Hall, in Norfolk, and thence to Framlingham, in Suffolk, with an intention of retiring, in case of emergency, to the sea-coast, whence she might transport herself to the Netherlands.

On the second day after Edward's decease, the duke of Northumberland sent for the lord mayor, and some of the principal citizens of London; who, repairing to Greenwich, were informed by the council of the loss they had sustained, and of the appointment of lady Jane Grey to the succession. The patent being produced to them, they were inveigled by promises, or compelled by menaces, to take an oath in her favour; and were strictly enjoined to secrecy. Two days afterwards, July 10, 1553, when it was known that Mary had been apprized of the circumstance of his death, the duke conveyed his daughter-in-law to the Tower, where she was presented with the keys of that fortress. On the same day she was proclaimed queen; but such was the unpopularity of her cause, that, amidst a great concourse of people, few acclamations were heard (q). The general odium against the author of her elevation, and the consideration of the danger of the precedent, absorbed all religious divisions, and united both Protestants and Catholics in the interests of the princess Mary, the rightful heir.

Jane commenced her reign with confirming the commissions of the lieutenants of the counties, and of other officers of the crown. She then sent dispatches to the English ambassadors at foreign courts, requiring them to notify the death of Edward VI. and her own accession. Before her proclamation, the council had sent intelligence of the king's decease to the emperor Charles, with a request that he would persevere in his friendship with the English nation; to which he signified his assent. Richard Shelley, Esq. was afterwards entrusted with the conveyance of a letter from the new queen to his imperial majesty, professing a desire of amity, and offering a renewal of that mediation which Edward had opened for a peace between Charles and the French king: but Shelley, concluding that the emperor would be greatly displeased at the news of the exclusion of the princess Mary, and that Jane's sovereignty would not be permanent, delayed the execution of his commission.

This ambassador's opinion, respecting the short duration of Jane's regal power, was confirmed by the event. Mary's resolution and activity proved beneficial to her cause. She sent circular letters to the nobility and the corporations of the realm, asserting her right to the crown, not only by the laws of inheritance, but by the will of her father, and commanding them to rise in defence of her crown and person. She dispatched a spirited message to the members of the council, on the very day that Jane was proclaimed, expressing her displeasure at their neglect of notifying to her the death of her brother; intimating that she knew of their consultations and engagements to her prejudice; but that she was willing to pardon all past offences, on condition of their immediate submission to her authority, and of their taking measures for fixing her in the throne to which she was entitled. In answer to which communication, the council wrote to her, declaring, "That she (Mary) could not pretend to the crown, because she was born of an unlawful marriage, dissolved by a legal sentence, confirmed by more than one parliament: that she ought to give over her pretensions, and acknowledge queen Jane for her sovereign, who was now on the throne by virtue of the late king's letters patent: that if she shewed herself obedient, she should find the counsellors all ready to do her any service, consistent with their duty to queen Jane (r).

The princess Mary was soon joined by a considerable number (q) During the proclamation, one Gilbert Pot threw out some satirical reflections on the new government; for which he was put in the pillory, and lost both his ears: an instance of severity which was not calculated to allay the hatred which the public bore to the Dudley family. Vid. Stowe's Annals.

(r) This answer was subscribed by twenty-one counsellors, viz. the archbishop of Canterbury; the lord chancellor; the dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland; the marquisses of Winchester and Northampton; the earls of Arundel, (who gave her intimation of her danger,) Shrewsbury, Huntingdon, Bedford, and Pembroke; the lords Cobham and Darcy; sir Thomas Cheney, sir Robert Cotton, sir William Petre, sir William Cecil, sir John Cheek, sir John Mason, sir Edward North, and sir Robert Bowes. In all probability, the interest and power of these persons would have been sufficient to maintain queen Jane upon the number of provincials; and among these were many Protestants, who were allured to her service by her hypocritical and deceitful promises of maintaining the present religious establishment. The first noblemen who joined her were the earls of Bath and Sussex; and other persons of rank quickly followed their example.

When the friends of Jane heard of the increasing strength of her rival, they resolved to repel force by force, and determined to send an army against her, under the conduct of the duke of Suffolk; but the appointment of this nobleman to a post of such danger so wrought upon the filial attachment of his daughter, which was heightened by the insinuations of the hypocritical Arundel, that she persuaded the duke of Northumberland to assume the command. The secret friends of Mary endeavoured to promote the departure of the duke, for he kept them in awe by his presence. They were confident that he would not prevail over the adherents of Mary; and it was their intention, during his absence, to take measures for reducing Jane to her primitive condition. It was with great reluctance therefore that he consented to quit the capital. He doubted the fidelity of the citizens to his daughter-in-law, and had strong suspicions of the honour of many of the privy counsellors. But, reflecting that his military experience might be usefully exerted against the partizans of Mary, and that a successful battle would be of signal service to his interests, he prepared for his expedition. Having exacted from the counsellors a solemn promise of adhering to queen Jane, he marched out of London with a body of forces, accompanied with the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Huntingdon, lord Grey, and other noblemen. Instead of advancing against Mary with a celerity which might have intimidated her followers, he loitered at Cambridge, where, as chancellor of the university, he ordered a sermon to be preached by the vice-chancellor in vindication of Jane's title to the crown. As he went along, he remarked the disaffection of the people, which foreboded a fatal issue. "Many," said he to lord Grey, "come out to look at us, but I find not one who cries, God speed you." Proceeding, however, to Newmarket, where a rendezvous had been appointed, he mustered an army of two thousand cavalry and six thousand infantry, and advanced to Bury St. Edmunds; where he found himself too weak to encounter Mary's forces.

Mary's party, in the mean time, increased in numbers and confidence. She was reinforced by the friends and vassals of the Howard family, who were zealous Roman Catholics, and was gratified with intelligence of the declaration of many counties in her favour. She was proclaimed queen at Norwich, and received supplies of men and ammunition from that great city. Six vessels, which had been directed to cruise off the eastern coast, with a view either to intercept her if she should attempt, in a fit of despair, to make her escape by sea, or of preventing the arrival of succours from the Netherlands, were driven by tempestuous weather into Yarmouth, near which sir Henry Jerningham was enlisting men in her name; and the captains, regardless of the interests of Jane, in whose behalf they had engaged to act, transferred their service to Mary. Sir Edward Hastings, who had been directed to raise troops for Jane in Buckinghamshire, had no sooner levied them, than he openly declared for her competitor. Jane instantly sent orders to her friends in that county to reduce sir Edward to her obedience; but, amidst the general inclination of the people towards Mary, no prospect appeared of the execution of those commands.

While the army of Mary received constant reinforcements, that of the duke of Northumberland daily decreased in number, in consequence of the discouragement arising from the popular zeal for the lawful heir. Finding the provincials unwilling to join him, and that his army did not amount to half the number of that of Mary, he returned from Bury to Cambridge, and sent a peremptory message to the council, demanding such a supply of forces as would enable him to cope with the enemy. But this demand did not meet with compliance; for though the duke of Suffolk, who acted as minister to his daughter in the absence of Northumberland, was eager to levy troops for her service, the majority of the counsellors had resolved to abandon her cause. On pretence of superintending the new levies, and of conferring with the French ambassador on the subject of procuring men from Picardy, the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, and other members of the council, obtained permission to quit the Tower. They soon after held a meeting at Baynard's Castle, a house belonging to Pembroke; and here their despair of fixing Jane on the throne, and their disgust to the duke of Northumberland, produced resolutions adverse to the interests of Jane. Arundel harangued the assembly on the duke's inordinate and tyrannical spirit, which, in the event of Jane's establishment, he said, would subject their lives and fortunes to his will. He represented the criminality of the enterprize which the duke had projected, and the guilt in which he had involved the whole council: and he affirmed, that the only method of rescuing the state from his pernicious government, and of atoning for the guilt which he and other counsellors had contracted by supporting the interest of Jane, was by a speedy return to their duty, and recognizing Mary as queen. This was warmly espoused by Pembroke, who put his hand to his sword, and swore he was ready to fight any man that expressed himself of a contrary sentiment. The mayor and aldermen of London were immediately sent for, who discovered great alacrity in obeying the orders they received to proclaim Mary; which was accordingly done at the cross in Cheapside, on the 19th of July. The people expressed their approbation by shouts of applause. Even Suffolk, who commanded in the Tower, finding resistance fruitless, opened the gates, and declared for Mary. The lady Jane, after the vain pageantry of wearing a crown during ten days, returned to a private life with more satisfaction than she felt when the royalty was tendered to her: and the messengers who were sent to Northumberland with orders to lay down his arms, found that he had despaired of success, was deserted by most of his followers, and had already proclaimed the queen at Cambridge, with exterior marks of joy and satisfaction. The people every where, on the queen's approach to London, gave sensible expressions of their loyalty and attachment. And the lady Elizabeth met her at the head of a thousand horse, which that princess had levied in order to support their joint title against the usurper.

The queen gave orders for taking into custody the duke of Northumberland, who fell on his knees to the earl of Arundel that arrested him, and abjectly begged his life. At the same time were committed the earl of Warwick, his eldest son, lord Ambrose and lord Henry Dudley, two of his younger sons, sir Andrew Dudley, his brother, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Huntingdon, sir Thomas Palmer, and sir John Gates; Dr. Edwin Sandys, vice-chancellor of Cambridge, Dr. Nicholas Ridley, bishop of London, and the chief justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas. The queen afterwards confined the duke of Suffolk, lady Jane Grey, and lord Guildford Dudley. But Mary, though her natural temper did not incline her to mercy, was desirous, in the beginning of her reign, to acquire popularity by the appearance of clemency; and because the counsellors pleaded constraint as an excuse for their treason, she extended her pardon to most of them. Suffolk himself recovered his liberty; and he owed this indulgence in a great measure to the contempt entertained of his capacity. But the guilt of Northumberland was too great, as well as his ambition and courage too dangerous, to permit him to entertain any reasonable hopes of life. When brought to his trial, he only desired permission to ask two questions of the peers appointed to sit on his jury; whether a man could be guilty of treason that obeyed orders given him by the council under the great seal? and whether those who were involved in the same guilt with himself could sit as his judges? Being told that the great seal of an usurper was no authority, and that persons not lying under any sentence of attainder were still innocent in the eye of the law, and might be admitted on any jury; he acquiesced, and pleaded guilty, and was executed August 22 (s). Sir Thomas Palmer and sir John Gates suffered with him; and this was all the blood spilled on account of so dangerous and criminal an enterprize against the rights of the sovereign. Sentence was pronounced against the lady Jane and lord Guildford; but without any present intention of putting it in execution. The youth the throne of this kingdom, against all the force princess Mary could pretend to bring into the field, had there been a good understanding amongst themselves; but very few of them were real friends to the duke of Northumberland; and, consequently, could not be supposed heartily engaged to execute his ambitious projects in favour of his own family.

(s) At his execution he made profession of the Catholic religion, and told the people that they never would enjoy tranquillity till they returned to the faith of their ancestors.

and innocence of the persons, neither of whom had reached their seventeenth year, pleaded strongly in their favour.

On Mary's first arrival at the Tower, the duke of Norfolk, who had been detained prisoner during all the last reign; Courtney, son of the marquis of Exeter, who, without being charged with any crime, had been subjected to the same punishment ever since his father's attainder; Gardiner, Tunstal, and Bonner, who had been confined for their adhering to the Catholic cause, appeared before her and implored her clemency and protection. They were all restored to liberty, and immediately admitted to her confidence and favour. Norfolk's attainder, notwithstanding that it had passed in parliament, was represented as null and invalid; because, among other informalities, no special matter had been alleged against him, except wearing a coat of arms which he and his ancestors without giving any offence had always made use of, in the face of the court and of the whole nation (t). Besides performing all those popular acts, which, though they only affected individuals, were very acceptable to the nation, the queen endeavoured to ingratiate herself with the public, by granting a general pardon, though with some exceptions, and by remitting the subsidy voted to her brother by the last parliament.

Every one rejoiced on account of the succession of the lawful heir, though the gracious demeanour of the sovereign, hindered not the people from being agitated with great anxiety concerning the state of religion; and as the bulk of the nation inclined to the Protestant communion, the apprehensions entertained concerning the principles and prejudices of the new queen were pretty general. The legitimacy of Mary's birth had appeared to be somewhat connected with the papal authority; and that princess, being educated with her mother, had imbibed the strongest attachment to the Catholic faith, and the highest aversion to those new tenets, whence she believed all the misfortunes of her family had originally sprung. The discouragements which she lay under from her father, though at last they brought her to comply with his will, tended still more to increase her disgust to the Reformers; and the vexations which the protector and the council gave her during Edward's reign, had no other effect than to confirm her more strongly in her prejudices. Naturally of a sour and obstinate temper, and irritated by contradiction and misfortunes, she possessed all the qualities fitted to compose a bigot; and her extreme ignorance rendered her utterly incapable of doubt in her own belief, or of indulgence to the opinions of others. The nation, therefore, had great reason to dread not only the abolition, but the persecution of the established religion, from the zeal of Mary; and it was not long ere she discovered her intentions.

Gardiner, Bonner, Tunstal, Day, Heath, and Vesey, were reinstated in their sees, either by a direct act of power, or what is nearly the same, by the sentence of commissioners appointed to review their trial and condemnation. Though the bishopric of Durham had been dissolved by authority of parliament, the queen erected it anew by letters patent, and replaced Tunstal in his regalities as well as his revenue. On pretence of discouraging controversy, but in fact to hinder the advocates for the reformed doctrines from continuing to propagate their tenets, she silenced, by an act of prerogative, all the preachers throughout England, except such as should obtain a particular license; and it was easy to foresee that none but the Catholics would be favoured with this privilege. Holgate, archbishop of York, Coverdale, bishop of Exeter, Ridley of London, and Hooper of Gloucester, were thrown into prison; whither old Latimer also was sent soon after. The zealous bishops and priests were encouraged in their forwardness to revive the mass, though contrary to the present laws. Judge Hales, who had discovered such constancy in defending the queen's title, lost all his merit by an opposition to those illegal practices; and being committed to custody, was treated with such severity, that he fell into frenzy, and killed himself. The men of Suffolk were brow-beaten, because they presumed to plead the promise which the queen, when they enlisted themselves in her service, had given them of maintaining the reformed religion: one in particular was set in the pillory, because he had been too peremptory in recalling to her memory the engagements which she had taken on that occasion. And though the queen still promised, in a public declaration before the council, to tolerate those who differed from her, men foresaw that this engagement, like the former, would prove but a feeble security when set in opposition to religious prejudices: for it evidently appears that she had formed a determined resolution of giving a loose to the spirit of persecution, and of enforcing, in the most rigorous manner, the ancient laws against heresy. Her confessors easily satisfied her conscience with respect to the violation of her repeated promises, which, they affirmed, in the true spirit of their church, ought not to be kept with heretics.

The merits of Cranmer towards the queen during the reign of Henry had been considerable; and he had successfully employed his good offices in mitigating the severe prejudices which that monarch had entertained against her. But the active part which he had borne in promoting her mother's divorce, as well as in conducting the reformation, had made him the object of her hatred; and though Gardiner had been equally forward in soliciting and defending the divorce, he had afterwards made sufficient atonement by his sufferings in defence of the Catholic cause. The primate, therefore, had reason to expect little favour during the present reign; but it was by his own indiscreet zeal that he brought on himself the first violence and persecution (u). On the publication of his sentiments concerning the Latin service, Cranmer was thrown into prison, and was tried for the part which he had acted in concurring with the lady Jane, and opposing the queen's accession. Sentence of high treason was pronounced against him; and though his guilt was shared with the whole privy council, and was even less than that of the greater part of them, this sentence, however severe, must be allowed entirely legal. The execution of it, however, did not follow; and Cranmer was reserved for a punishment by far more cruel.

Every one perceived the persecution gathering against the reformers, and Peter Martyr, a zealous foreigner of the Protestant persuasion, desired leave to retire from the kingdom; and while some bigotted catholics moved for his commitment, Gardiner pleaded that he had come over by an invitation from the government, and therefore furnished him with supplies for his journey: but as bigotted zeal still increased, his wife's body, which had been interred at Oxford, was afterwards dug up by public orders, and buried in a dunghill. The bones of Bucer and Fagius, two foreign reformers, were about the same time committed to the flames at Cambridge. John à Lasco was first silenced, then ordered to depart the kingdom with his congregation. The greater part of the foreign protestants followed him; and the nation thereby lost many useful hands for arts and manufactures. Several English Protestants also took shelter in foreign parts; and every thing bore a dismal aspect for the reformers and the reformation.

During this revolution of the court, no protection was expected by Protestants from the parliament, which was summoned to assemble on the 5th of October. A zealous reformer asserts, that great violence and iniquity were used in the elections; but besides that the authority of this writer is inconsiderable, that practice, as the necessities of government seldom required it, had not hitherto been often employed in England. There still remained such numbers devoted by opinion or affection to many principles of the ancient religion, that the authority of the crown was able to give such candidates the preference in most elections; and all those who hesitated to comply with the court religion rather declined taking a seat, which, while it rendered them obnoxious to the queen's displeasure, could afterwards afford them no protection against the violence of prerogative. It soon appeared, therefore, that a majority of the commons would be willing to forward

(t) Courtney soon after received the title of earl of Devonshire; and though educated in such close confinement, that he was altogether unacquainted with the world, he soon acquired all the accomplishments of a courtier and a gentleman, and made a considerable figure during the few years which he lived after he recovered his liberty.

(u) A report being spread, that Cranmer, in order to pay court to the queen, had promised to officiate in the Latin service, the archbishop, to wipe off this aspersion, published a manifesto in his own defence. Among other expressions, he there said, that as the devil was a liar from the beginning, and the father of lies, he had at this time stirred up his servants to persecute Christ and his true religion: that this infernal spirit now endeavoured to restore the Latin satisfactory masses, a thing of his own invention and device; and in order to effect his purpose, had falsely made use of Cranmer's name and authority: and that the mass is not only without foundation, either in the Scriptures or in the practice of the primitive church, but likewise discovers a plain contradiction to antiquity and the inspired writings, and is besides replete with many horrid blasphemies.

Mary's

Mary's designs; and as the peers were mostly attached to the court, from interest or expectations, little opposition was expected from that quarter (v). The first bill passed by this obsequious parliament was of a popular nature, and abolished every species of treason not contained in the statute of Edward III. and every species of felony that did not subsist before the first of Henry VIII (w). The parliament next declared the queen to be legitimate, ratified the marriage of Henry with Catherine of Arragon, annulled the divorce pronounced by Cranmer (x), whom they greatly blamed on that account. No mention, however, is made of the pope's authority, as any ground of the marriage. All the statutes of king Edward, with regard to religion, were repealed by one vote (y). The attainder of the duke of Norfolk was reversed; and this act of justice was more reasonable than the declaring of that attainder invalid without farther authority. Many clauses of the riot act passed in the late reign were revived: a step which eluded in a great measure the popular statute enacted at the first meeting of parliament.

Notwithstanding the compliance of the two houses with the queen's inclinations, they had still a reserve in certain articles; and her choice of a husband in particular was of such importance to the interest of the nation, that they were determined not to submit in that respect to her will and pleasure. There were three marriages, concerning which it was supposed that Mary had deliberated after her accession. The first person proposed to her was Courtney, earl of Devonshire, who being an Englishman nearly allied to the crown, could not fail of being acceptable to the nation; and as he was of an engaging person and address, he had visibly gained on the queen's affections, and hints were dropped him of her favourable disposition towards him. That nobleman, however neglected these overtures; and seemed rather to attach himself to the princess Elizabeth, whose youth and agreeable conversation he preferred to all the power and grandeur of her sister. On this account Mary treated him with great coolness, and the queen declared her animosity against Elizabeth. The ancient quarrel between their mothers had sunk deep into the malignant heart of the queen; and after the declaration made by parliament in favour of Catherine's marriage, she wanted not a pretence for representing the birth of her sister as illegitimate. The attachment of Elizabeth to the reformed religion offended Mary's bigotry; and as the young princess had made some difficulty in disclosing her sentiments, violent menaces had been employed to bring her to compliance. But when the queen found that Elizabeth had obstructed her views in a point which perhaps touched her still more nearly, her resentment, excited by pride, no longer knew any bounds; and the princess was visibly exposed to the greatest danger.

Cardinal Pole, who had never taken priests orders, was another party proposed to the queen; and there appeared many reasons to induce her to make choice of this prelate. The high character of Pole for virtue and humanity; the great regard paid him by the Catholic church, of which he had nearly reached the highest dignity on the death of pope Paul III.; the queen's affection for the countess of Salisbury, his mother, who had once been her governess; the violent animosity to which he had been exposed on account of his attachment to the Romish communion; all these considerations had a powerful influence on Mary. But the cardinal was now in the decline of life; and having contracted habits of study and retirement, he was represented to her as unqualified for the bustle of a court and the hurry of business. The queen, therefore, dropped all thoughts of that alliance: but as she entertained a great regard for Pole's wisdom and virtue, she intended to reap the benefit of his counsel in the administration of her government. She secretly entered into a negociation with Commendone, an agent of cardinal Dandino, legate at Brussels; she sent assurances to the then pope, Julius III. of her earnest desire to reconcile herself and her kingdoms to the holy see; and she desired that Pole might be appointed legate for the performance of that pious office.

These two marriages being rejected, the queen cast her eye towards the emperor's family, from which her mother was descended, and which during her own distresses had always afforded her countenance and protection. Charles V. who a few years before was almost absolute master of Germany, had exercised his power in such an arbitrary manner, that he gave extreme disgust to the nation, who apprehended the total extinction of their liberties from the encroachments of that monarch. Religion had served him as a pretence for his usurpations; and from the same principle he met with that opposition which overthrew his grandeur and eclipsed all his ambitious hopes. Maurice, elector of Saxony, enraged that the landgrave of Hesse, who, by his advice and on his assurances, had put himself into the emperor's hands, should be unjustly detained a prisoner, formed a secret conspiracy among the Protestant princes; and covering his intentions with the most artful disguises, suddenly marched his forces against Charles, and narrowly missed becoming master of his person. The Protestants flew to arms in every quarter; and their insurrection, aided by an invasion from France, reduced the emperor to such difficulties that he was obliged to submit to terms of peace, which insured the independency of Germany. To retrieve his honour he made an attack on France; and laying siege to Mentz with an army of a hundred thousand men, he conducted the enterprize in person, and seemed determined to succeed in an undertaking which had fixed the attention of Europe. But the duke of Guise, who defended Mentz, with a garrison composed of the bravest nobility of France, exerted such vigilance, conduct, and valour, that the siege was protracted to the depth of winter; and the emperor found it dangerous to persevere any longer. He retired with the remains of his army into the Low Countries, much dejected with that reverse of fortune which in his declining years had so fatally overtaken him.

So soon as the emperor Charles heard of the death of Edward, and the accession of his kinswoman Mary to the crown of England, he formed the design of acquiring that kingdom to his family; and hoped by this incident to balance all the losses which he had sustained in Germany. His son Philip was a widower; and though he was only twenty-seven years of age, eleven years younger than the queen, this objection it was thought would be overlooked, and there was no reason to despair of her still having a numerous issue. The emperor's desire of this match was indeed so strong, that he broke off one which he had negociated between his son and a princess of Portugal. He therefore immediately sent an agent to this country, to signify his intentions to Mary, who, pleased with the support of so powerful an alliance, and glad to unite herself more closely with her mother's family, to which she was ever strongly attached, readily embraced the proposal. He practised the arts of insinuation, and even of corruption, to gain over the chief ministers of Mary; and, at his instigation, Norfolk, Arundel, and Paget, gave their advice for the match; and Gardiner, who was become prime minister, and who had been promoted to the office of chancellor, finding how Mary's inclinations lay, seconded the project of the Spanish alliance. At the same time he represented both to her and the emperor, the necessity of stopping all farther innovations in religion, till the completion of the marriage. He observed that the parliament, amidst all their compliances, had discovered evident symptoms of jealousy, and seemed at present determined to grant no farther concessions in favour of the Catholic persuasion: that though they might make a sacrifice to their sovereign of some speculative principles which they did not well comprehend, or of some rites which seemed not of any great moment, they had imbibed such strong prejudices against the pretended usurpations and exactions of the court of Rome, that they would with great difficulty be again brought to submit to its authority: that the danger of resuming the abbey lands would alarm the nobility and gentry, and induce them to encourage the prepossessions which were but too general among the people, against the doctrine and worship of the Catholic church:

(v) In opening the parliament, the court shewed a contempt of the laws, by celebrating before the two houses a mass of the Holy Ghost in the Latin tongue, attended with all the ancient rites and ceremonies, though abolished by act of parliament. Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, having refused to kneel at this service, was severely handled, and was violently thrust out of the house. Fox's Martyrology, vol. iii. p. 19. The queen, however, still retained the title of supreme head of the church of England; and it was generally pretended, that the intention of the court was only to restore religion to the same condition in which it had been left by Henry; but that the other abuses of popery which were the most grievous to the nation, would never be revived. Burnet, vol. ii. p. 252.

(w) Mariæ, sess. 1. c. 1. By this repeal, though it was in general popular, the clause of 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 11. was lost, which required the confronting of two witnesses, in order to prove any treason.

church: that much pains had been taken to prejudice the nation against the Spanish alliance; and if that point were urged at the same time with farther changes in religion, it would hazard a general revolt and insurrection: that the marriage being once completed, would give authority to the queen's measures, and enable her afterwards to forward the pious work in which she was engaged; and that it was even necessary previously to reconcile the people to the marriage, by rendering the conditions extremely favourable to the English, and such as would seem to ensure to them their independency, and the entire possession of their ancient laws and privileges.

The emperor, who was well acquainted with the prudence and experience of Gardiner, assented to all these reasons; and endeavoured to temper the zeal of Mary, by representing the necessity of proceeding gradually in the great work of converting the nation. Hearing that cardinal Pole, more sincere in his religious opinions, and less guided by the maxims of human policy, after having sent contrary advice to the queen, had set out on his journey to England, where he was to exercise his legatine commission; he thought proper to stop him at Dillinghen, a town on the Danube; and afterwards obtained Mary's consent for this detention. The negociation for the marriage meanwhile proceeded apace; and Mary's intentions of espousing Philip became generally known to the nation. The commons, who hoped that they had gained the queen by the concessions which they had already made, were alarmed to hear that she was resolved to contract a foreign alliance; and, on the 6th of December, they sent a committee to remonstrate in strong terms against that dangerous measure. The queen was displeased at their presumption, and answered, that she held her crown of God, and would trust to his counsel alone on so important an occasion; that she had not yet come to a determination on the subject; but that whenever she did, she would take care to consult the general benefit of her realm, though she herself was principally concerned in the disposal of her own person. And to prevent farther applications of the same kind, she thought proper to dissolve a parliament which she found not willing to comply with all her caprices.

A convocation had been summoned at the same time with the parliament; and the majority here also appeared to be of the court religion. An offer was very frankly made by the Romanists, to dispute concerning the points controverted between the two communions; and as transubstantiation was the article which of all others they deemed the clearest, and founded on the most irresistible arguments, they chose to try their strength by defending it. The Protestants maintained their argument as far as the clamour and noise of their antagonists would permit; and they fondly imagined that they had obtained some advantage, when in the course of the debate they obliged the Catholics to avow that, according to their doctrine, Christ had in his last supper held HIMSELF in his hand, and had swallowed and eaten HIMSELF (z)! This triumph, however, was confined only to their own party: the Romanists maintained, that their champions had clearly the better of the day; that their adversaries were blind and obstinate heretics; that nothing but the most extreme depravity of heart could induce men to contest such self-evident principles; and that the severest punishments were due to their perverse wickedness. So pleased were they with their superiority in this favourite point, that they soon after renewed the dispute at Oxford; and to shew that they feared no force of learning or abilities, where reason was so evidently on their side, they sent thither Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, under a guard, to try whether these renowned controversialists could find any appearance of argument to defend their baffled principles. The issue of the debate was very different from what it appeared to be a few years before, in a famous conference held at the same place during the reign of Edward.

On the dissolution of the parliament and convocation, the new laws with regard to religion, though they had been anticipated in most places by the zeal of the Catholics, countenanced by government, were still more openly put in execution, in the beginning of 1554. The mass was every where re-established; and marriage was declared to be incompatible with any spiritual office. It has been asserted by some writers, that three-fourths of the clergy were at this time deprived of their livings, because they refused to subscribe to her creed; though other historians, more accurate, have estimated the number of sufferers to be far short of this proportion. A visitation was appointed, in order to restore more perfectly the mass and the Roman Catholic rites. Among other articles, the commissioners were enjoined to forbid the oath of supremacy to be taken by the clergy on their receiving any benefice (a).

This violent and sudden change of religion inspired the Protestants with great discontent; and even affected indifferent spectators with concern, by the hardships to which so many individuals were on that account exposed. But the Spanish match was a point of more general concern, and diffused universal apprehensions for the liberty and independence of the nation. To obviate all clamour, the articles of marriage were drawn as favourable as possible for the interest and security, and even grandeur of England. It was agreed, that though Philip should have the title of king, the administration should be entirely in the queen; that no foreigner should be capable of enjoying any office in the kingdom; that no innovation should be made in the English laws, customs, and privileges; that Philip should not carry the queen out of the kingdom, unless she should voluntarily signify her request to that effect, nor any of her children, without the consent of the nobility; that sixty thousand pounds a year should be settled as her jointure; that the male issue of this marriage should inherit, together with England, both Burgundy and the Low Countries; that if Don Carlos, Philip's son by his former marriage, should die and his line be extinct, the queen's issue, whether male or female, should inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip; and that if the queen should die without issue, Philip should not claim any share in the government of England or its dependencies. Such was the treaty of marriage signed by count Egmont, on the 15th of January, 1554, and three other ambassadors sent over to England by the emperor.

These articles, when published, gave no satisfaction to the nation: it was universally said that the emperor, in order to get possession of England, would verbally agree to any terms; and the greater advantage there appeared in the conditions which he granted, the more certainly might it be concluded that he had no serious intention of observing them: that the usual fraud and ambition of that monarch might assure the nation of such a conduct; and his son Philip, while he inherited these vices from his father, added to them tyranny, sullenness, pride, and barbarity, more dangerous vices of his own: that England would become a province, and a province to a kingdom which usually exercised the most violent authority over all her dependent dominions: that the Netherlands, Milan, Sicily, Naples, groaned under the burthen of Spanish tyranny; and throughout all the new conquests in America there had been displayed scenes of unrelenting cruelty, hitherto unknown in the history of mankind: that the inquisition was a tribunal invented by that tyrannical nation; and would infallibly, with all their other laws and institutions, be introduced into England: and that the divided sentiments of the people with regard to religion would subject multitudes to this iniquitous tribunal, and would reduce the whole nation to the most abject servitude.

There being now strong grounds to suppose that the persecutions of the Protestants would not terminate in the mere loss of their benefices, but would be carried to the extremities of violence against all those who should refuse to abjure their tenets, a great number of individuals took the opportunity of retiring out of the kingdom, to avoid the flames of superstitious cruelty. The discontents of the people rising to a great height, both on religious and political accounts, they seemed ripe for a rebellion; and had any foreign power given them encouragement, or any great man appeared to head them, the consequences might have proved fatal to the queen's authority. But the king of France, though engaged in hostilities with the emperor, refused to concur in any proposal for an insurrection, lest he should afford Mary a pretence for declaring war against him. And the more prudent part of the nobility thought, that as the evils of the Spanish alliance were only dreaded at a distance, matters were not yet fully prepared for a general revolt. Some persons, however, more turbulent than the rest, believed that it would be safer to prevent than to redress grievances; and they formed a conspiracy to rise in arms, and declare against the queen's marriage with Philip. Sir Thomas Wiat purposed to raise Kent, sir Peter Carew, Devonshire; and they engaged the duke of Suffolk, by the hopes of recovering the crown for the lady Jane, to attempt raising the midland counties. Carew's impatience engaged him to break the concert, and to rise in arms before the day appointed: he was soon suppressed by the earl of Bedford, and constrained to fly into France. On this intelligence Suffolk, dreading an arrest, suddenly left the town, with his brothers, lord Thomas and lord Leonard Gray; and endeavoured to raise the people in the counties of Warwick and Leicester, where his interest lay; but he was so closely pursued by the earl of Huntingdon, at the head of three hundred horse, that he was obliged to disperse his followers, and being discovered in his concealment, he was carried prisoner to London. Wiat was at first more successful in his attempt; and having published a declaration at Maidstone in Kent, against the queen's evil counsellors, and against the Spanish match, without any mention of religion, the people began to flock to his standard. The duke of Norfolk, with sir Henry Jerningham, was sent against him, at the head of the guards and some other troops, reinforced with five hundred Londoners commanded by Bret: and he came within sight of the rebels at Rochester, where they had obtained possession of the castle and fixed their head-quarters. Sir George Harper here pretended to desert from them; but having secretly gained Bret, these two malcontents so wrought on the Londoners, that the whole body deserted to Wiat, and declared that they would not contribute to enslave their native country. Norfolk, dreading the contagion of the example, immediately retreated with his troops, and took shelter in the city.

After this proof of the dispositions of the people, especially of the Londoners, who were mostly Protestants, Wiat was encouraged to proceed. When he had reached Deptford, Mary sent two knights to learn his demands. Elate with confidence, he required that the Tower should be put under his command; that the queen should remain there under his guard; that some changes should be made in the privy council; that four counsellors should be delivered into his hands as hostages; and, in order to ensure the liberty of the nation, that the queen should marry an Englishman. Incensed at the arrogance of Wiat's behaviour, the queen repaired to Guildhall on the first of February, 1554, and demanded the assistance of the corporation against the rebels: whose intentions, she said, were to plunder the city, and make themselves masters of the government. With respect to the match of which they affected to complain, she declared that she had taken no steps in the affair without the advice of her nobility; but that, if the states of the realm should oppose her marriage, she would endeavour to evade the accomplishment of the treaty, rather than give disgust to her faithful subjects. Her harangue had some effect on the minds of the citizens, who began to put themselves in a posture of defence. On the same day, she issued a proclamation, offering pardon to all the insurgents, except sir Thomas Wiat, sir George Harper, and two others, and promising lands to the annual value of one hundred pounds to any person who should apprehend Wiat. She appointed lord Howard of Effingham to superintend the equipment of a military force in the city; and the earl of Pembroke was ordered to march with a detachment against the revolters.

In his march from Rochester, Wiat had increased his army to four thousand men; but, while he loitered his time at Deptford, so many of them deserted his standard, that when he approached Southwark, the number of his followers did not exceed three thousand. He endeavoured to hinder them from committing any depredations; but, notwithstanding all his care and vigilance, some of them entered the house of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and destroyed a great part of his library and furniture. Finding that the bridge was well guarded, and secured against him, he called a council of war, in which it was resolved to cross the Thames at Kingston, and proceed to the western extremity of London. When he reached Kingston, he found that the bridge had been broken down, and perceived a small body of forces on the opposite banks, ready to oppose his passage over the river. By bringing his artillery to bear upon them, he quickly dispersed them; and, having repaired the bridge, he passed over with his men, and advanced towards the capital. One of the carriages of his cannon happening to break on the road, he imprudently stopped several hours for its reparation, and thus precluded himself from the opportunity of surprizing the court in the night; which he might with ease have effected. Despairing of success, many of the insurgents now left him; and sir George Harper, actuated by the hope of procuring a pardon, hastened to Whitehall, on the 7th of February, and gave the queen a circumstantial account of the proceedings and intentions of Wiat. The earl of Pembroke was immediately directed to prepare for an engagement; but, when the rebels had advanced to St. James's Park, he forbore to commence a general action, as he thought they might be reduced to submission with less hazard. He therefore contented himself with harassing Wiat's rear, while he was proceeding to Charing Cross. Here a skirmish ensued between the revolters and a body of royalists commanded by sir John Gage, lord chamberlain. Wiat's attack was conducted with such spirit, that he quickly forced his adversaries to retreat, sir John exclaiming, as he fled, that the earl of Pembroke, instead of co-operating with him, was inclined to assist the rebels. Continuing his route towards the city, Wiat reached Ludgate, and demanded admittance, on pretence that the queen had acceded to his requisitions. Lord Howard, who guarded the gate, answered him with reproaches; and this disappointment induced him to retreat, in hopes of joining Vaughan, one of his officers, whom he had detached with two companies to Westminster. His men were now so discouraged, that they rapidly abandoned his declining cause. The cavalry of the earl of Pembroke opposing him at Temple Bar, he maintained, for a short time, an unequal conflict; during which a herald approached him, and exhorted him to yield, rather than expose his comrades to certain destruction; intimating that his only chance of the queen's mercy depended on his immediate submission. Wiat, sensible of the inutility of a longer resistance, surrendered himself prisoner to sir Maurice Berkeley; and his chief confederates were also obliged to yield. The other rebels sought refuge in flight; but many of them fell into the hands of the queen's soldiers. Four hundred persons are said to have suffered for this rebellion (b): four hundred more were conducted before the queen with ropes about their necks; and falling on their knees, received a pardon, and were dismissed. Thus, after she had glutted her revenge by the amazing number of persons which had been executed on account of Wiat's rebellion, the queen made an ostentatious display of her clemency, thinking thereby to court popularity.

Wiat was brought to trial, and of course was condemned, and executed on the 11th of April. On the trial of Wiat, the queen, who detested her sister Elizabeth for her attachment to the Protestant religion, and who was jealous of her rising popularity, endeavoured to extort such information from Wiat as might furnish a pretence for proceeding to extremities against her. Being harassed with interrogatories, lured by promises, and assailed with threats, sir Thomas gave some answers which seemed to reflect on the princess and the earl of Devonshire, as if they had encouraged him in his insurrection. But when brought to the scaffold, he solemnly exculpated them both, to the great dissatisfaction of Mary.

The lady Elizabeth, it should be observed, had been, during some time treated with great harshness by her sister; and many studied instances of discouragement and disrespect had been practised against her. She was ordered to take place at court after the countess of Lenox and the duchess of Suffolk, as if she were not legitimate: her friends were discountenanced on every occasion; and while her virtues, which were now become eminent, drew to her the attendance of all the young nobility, and rendered her the favourite of the nation, the malevolence of the queen discovered itself every day by fresh symptoms, and obliged the princess to retire into the country. Mary seized the opportunity of this rebellion; and hoping to involve her sister in some appearance of guilt, sent for her under a strong guard, committed her to the Tower, and ordered her to be strictly examined by the council. But the public declaration made by Wiat rendered it impracticable to employ against her any false evidence which might have offered; and the princess made so good a defence, that the queen found herself under a necessity of releasing her. In order to send her out of the kingdom, a marriage was offered her with the duke of Savoy; and when she declined the proposal, she was committed to custody under a strong guard at Wodestoke; The earl of Devonshire, though equally innocent, was confined in Fotheringay Castle.

But this rebellion proved still more fatal to the lady Jane Grey, as well as to her husband lord Guilford Dudley. The duke of Suffolk's guilt was imputed to her; and though the rebels and malcontents seemed chiefly to rest their hopes on the lady Elizabeth and the earl of Devonshire, the queen, incapable of generosity or clemency, determined to remove every person from whom the least danger could be apprehended. Warning was given the lady Jane to prepare for death; a doom which she had long expected, and which the innocence of her life, as well as the misfortunes to which she had been exposed, rendered nowise unwelcome to her. The queen's zeal, under colour of tender mercy to the prisoner's soul, induced her to send Dr. Feckenham, dean of St. Paul's, with directions to aim at her conversion to popery. He harassed her with perpetual disputation; and even a reprieve for three days was granted her, in hopes that she would be persuaded during that time to pay, by a timely conversion, some regard to her eternal welfare. The lady Jane, however, was too fully convinced of the corruptions and absurdities of that religion to suffer herself to be deluded by the sophistry of a Catholic priest; and she answered his arguments, notwithstanding her present melancholy situation, with that acuteness and erudition which commanded his respect. On the night which preceded her death, she was so perfectly calm and collected, that she wrote a letter to her sister in the Greek language; in which, besides sending her a copy of the scriptures in that tongue, she exhorted her to maintain, in every fortune, a like steady perseverance. On the day of her execution, February 12, her husband, lord Guilford, desired permission to see her; but she refused her consent, and informed him by a message, that the tenderness of their parting would overcome the fortitude of both, and would too much unbend their minds from that constancy which their approaching end required of them: their separation, she said, would be only for a moment; and they would soon rejoin each other in a scene where their affections would be for ever united, and where death, disappointment, and misfortunes, could no longer have access to them, and disturb their everlasting happiness.

It had been intended to execute the lady Jane and lord Guilford together on the same scaffold at Tower-hill; but the council, dreading the compassion of the people for their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, changed their orders, and gave directions that she should be beheaded within the verge of the Tower. She saw her husband led to execution; and having given him from the window some token of her remembrance, she waited with tranquillity till her own appointed hour should bring her to a like fate. She even saw his headless body carried back in a cart; and found herself more confirmed by the reports which she heard of the constancy of his end, than shaken by so tender and melancholy a spectacle (c). On the scaffold she made a speech to the by-standers; in which the mildness of her disposition led her to take the blame wholly on herself, without uttering one complaint against the severity with which she had been treated. She said that her offence was not the having laid her hand upon the crown, but the not rejecting it with sufficient constancy: that she had less erred through ambition than through reverence to her parents, whom she had been taught to respect and obey: that she willingly received death, as the only satisfaction which she could now make to the injured state; and though her infringement of the laws had been constrained, she would shew, by her voluntary submission to their sentence, that she was desirous to atone for that disobedience into which too much filial piety had betrayed her: that she had justly deserved this punishment for being made the instrument, though the unwilling instrument, of the ambition of others: and that the story of her life, she hoped, might at least be useful, by proving that innocence excuses not great misdeeds, if they tend anywise to the destruction of the commonwealth. After uttering these words, she caused herself to be disrobed by her women; and with a steady serene countenance submitted herself to the hands of the executioner (d).

Her father, the duke of Suffolk, was tried, condemned, and executed soon after; and would have met with more compassion, had not his temerity been the cause of his daughter's untimely end. Her uncle, lord Thomas Gray, lost his life for the same crime. A remarkable instance of the queen's arbitrary temper appeared in the case of sir Nicholas Throgmorton, who was tried in Guildhall; but there appearing no satisfactory evidence against him he was enabled, by making an admirable defence, to obtain a verdict of the jury in his favour. The queen was so enraged at the disappointment, that instead of releasing him as the law required, she re-committed him to the Tower, and kept him in close confinement during some time. But her resentment stopped not here: the jury, being summoned before the council, were all sent to prison, and afterwards fined, some of them a thousand pounds, others two thousand a-piece. This violence proved fatal to several; among others, to sir John Throgmorton, brother to sir Nicholas, who was condemned on no better evidence than had formerly been rejected; and the sanguinary queen, disappointed of his brother's blood, gladly sacrificed him to her vengeance. She filled the Tower and other prisons with nobility and gentry, whom their interest with the nation, rather than any appearance of guilt, had made the objects of her suspicion. And finding that she was universally hated, she determined to disable the people from resistance, by ordering general musters, and directing the commissioners to seize their arms, and lay them up in the different fortresses.

Notwithstanding the government laboured under so general an odium, the queen's authority had received such an increase from the suppression of Wiat's rebellion, that the ministry hoped to find a compliant disposition in the new parliament, which was summoned to assemble on the 5th of April. The emperor also, in order to facilitate the same end, had borrowed no less a sum than four hundred thousand crowns, which he had sent over to England, to be distributed in bribes and pensions among the members: a pernicious practice, of which there had not hitherto been any instance in England. And not to give the public any alarm with regard to the church lands, the queen resumed the title of supreme head of the church, which she had dropped three months before. Gardiner, the chancellor, opened the session by a speech; in which he asserted the queen's hereditary title to the crown; maintained her right of chusing a husband for herself; observed how proper a use she had made of that right, by giving the preference to an old ally, descended from the house of Borgundy; and remarked the failure of Henry VIII.'s posterity, of whom there now remained none but the queen and the lady Elizabeth. He added, that in order to obviate the inconveniences which might arise from different pretenders, it was necessary to invest the queen, by law, with a power of disposing of the crown, and of appointing her successor: a power, he said, which was not to be thought unprecedented in England, since it had formerly been conferred on Henry VIII.

Though the parliament was disposed to gratify the queen in all her desires; yet when the liberty and independency of the nation were in such visible danger, they could not by any means be brought to compliance. They knew both the inveterate hatred which she bore to the lady Elizabeth, and her devoted attachment to the house of Austria: they were acquainted with her extreme bigotry, which would lead her to set aside all considerations of justice or national interest to the establishment of the Catholic religion: they remarked that Gardiner had carefully avoided, in his speech, the giving to Elizabeth the appellation of the queen's sister; and they thence concluded that a design was formed of excluding her as ille-

(c) Sir John Gage, constable of the Tower, when he led her to execution, desired her to bestow on him some small present, which he might keep as a perpetual memorial of her: she gave him her table-book, on which she had just written three sentences on seeing her husband's dead body; one in Greek, another in Latin, a third in English. The purport of them was, that human justice was against his body, but divine mercy would be favourable to his soul; that if her fault deserved punishment, her youth at least, and her imprudence were worthy of excuse; and that God and posterity, she trusted, would shew her favour.

(d) Lady Jane Gray was a young person of an amiable and engaging disposition, and accomplished parts: and being of an equal age with the late king, she had received all her education with him, and seemed even to possess greater facility in acquiring every part of manly and polite literature. She had attained a familiar knowledge of the Roman and Greek languages, besides modern tongues; had passed most of her time in an application to learning; and expressed a great indifference for other occupations and amusements usual with her sex and station. Roger Ascham, tutor to the lady Elizabeth, having one day paid her a visit, found her employed in reading Plato, while the rest of the family were engaged in a party of hunting in the park; and on his admiring the singularity of her choice, she told him that she received more pleasure from that author than others could reap from all their sport and gaiety.

gitimate: they expected that Mary, if invested with such a power as she required, would make a will in her husband's favour, and thereby render England for ever a province to the Spanish monarchy: and they were the more alarmed with these projects, as they heard that Philip's descent from John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, was carefully insisted on, and that he was publicly represented as the true and only heir by right of inheritance.

The parliament, therefore, aware of their danger, were determined to keep at a distance from the precipice which lay before them. They could not avoid ratifying the articles of marriage, which were drawn very favourable for England; but they declined the passing of any such law as the chancellor pointed out to them: they would not so much as declare it treason to imagine or attempt the death of the queen's husband, while she was alive; and a bill introduced for that purpose was laid aside after the first reading (e).

A law passed in this parliament for re-erecting the bishopric of Durham, which had been dissolved by the last parliament of Edward the Sixth. The queen had already, by an arbitrary exertion of her power, put Tunstal in possession of that see: but though it was usual at that time for the crown to assume authority which might seem entirely legislative, it was always deemed more safe and satisfactory to procure the sanction of parliament. Bills were introduced for suppressing heterodox opinions contained in books, and for reviving the law of the six articles, together with those against the Lollards, and against heresy and erroneous preaching: but the parliament very properly rejected them all, and none of these laws could pass the two houses: a proof that the parliament had reserves even in their concessions with regard to religion, about which they seem to have been less scrupulous. The queen, therefore, finding that they were less passive than she expected, finished the session by dissolving them on the 5th of May.

Mary's bigotted projects were delayed for some time, by reason of her thoughts being wholly occupied in making preparations for the reception of Don Philip, whose arrival she hourly expected. This princess, who had lived so many years in a very reserved and private manner, without any prospect or hopes of a husband, was so smitten with affection for her young consort, whom she had never seen, that she waited with the utmost impatience for the completion of the marriage; and every obstacle was to her a source of anxiety and discontent. She complained of Philip's delays as affected; and she could not conceal her vexation, that though she brought him a kingdom as her dowry, he treated her with such neglect, that he had never yet favoured her with a single letter. Her fondness was but the more increased by this supercilious treatment; and when she found that her subjects had entertained the greatest aversion for the event to which she directed her fondest wishes, she made the whole English nation the object of her resentment. A squadron under the command of lord Effingham, had been fitted out to convoy Philip from Spain, where he then resided; but the admiral informing her that the discontents ran very high among the seamen, and that it was not safe for Philip to entrust himself in their hands, she gave orders to dismiss them. She then dreaded lest the French fleet, being masters of the sea, might intercept her husband; and every rumour of danger, every blast of wind, threw her into panics and convulsions. Her health, and even her understanding, were visibly hurt by this extreme impatience; and she was struck with a new apprehension lest her person, impaired by time, and blasted by sickness, should prove disagreeable to her future consort. Her glass discovered to her how haggard she was become; and when she remarked the decay of her beauty, she knew not whether she ought more to desire or apprehend the arrival of Philip.

At last came the moment so impatiently expected; and news was brought the queen of Philip's arrival at Southampton (f), on the 19th of July. Mary set out immediately to meet him at Winchester, and they were there married by Gardiner, bishop of that see, on the 25th (g). A few days after, they proceeded to Westminster; and having made a pompous entry into London, where Philip displayed his wealth with great ostentation, she carried him to Windsor, the palace in which they afterwards resided. The prince's behaviour was ill calculated to remove the prejudices which the English nation had entertained against him. He was distant and reserved in his address; took no notice of the salutes even of the most considerable noblemen; and so entrenched himself in form and ceremony, that he was in a manner inaccessible: but this circumstance rendered him the more acceptable to the queen, who desired to have no company but her husband's, and who was impatient when she met with any interruption to her fondness. The shortest absence gave her vexation; and when he showed civilities to any other woman, she could not conceal her jealousy and resentment.

The queen soon found that her husband's ruling passion was ambition; and that the only method of gratifying him, and securing his affections, was to render him master of England. The interest and liberty of her people were considerations of small moment, in comparison of her obtaining this favourite point. She summoned a new parliament, in hopes of finding them entirely compliant to her will; and that she might acquire the greater authority over them, she imitated the precedent of the former reign, and wrote circular letters, directing a proper choice of members. The zeal of the Catholics, the influence of Spanish gold, the powers of prerogative, the discouragement of the gentry, particularly of the Protestants; all these causes seconding the intrigues of Gardiner, had procured her a house of commons, which was in a great measure to her satisfaction; and it was thought, from the disposition of the nation, that she might now safely omit, on her assembling the parliament, which met on the 12th of November, the title of supreme head of the church, though inseparably annexed by law to the crown of England. Cardinal Pole had arrived in Flanders, invested with legatine powers from the pope: in order to prepare the way for his arrival in England, the parliament passed an act reversing his attainder, and restoring his blood; and the queen, dispensing with the old statute of provisors, granted him permission to act as legate. The cardinal came over; and after being introduced to the king and queen, he addressed the two houses of parliament, at Whitehall, in a long oration, thanking them for the reversion of that proscription which had long prevented hs return to his native land, and declaring that the best proof of his gratitude for so great a favour would be to use his efforts for abolishing the schism which had rendered them exiles from the unity of the church and the kingdom of heaven. He trusted that they would permit him to make use of that authority which the vicar of Christ had delegated to him, for bringing them back to the fold, and restoring them to their celestial inheritance. Nothing could exceed the joy which Mary felt when her parliamentary subjects seemed to listen with avidity to the proposal of the new legate; and his speech, being perfectly consonant with her ideas, filled her with such emotion, that she fondly thought, or pretended to think, she felt the embryo stir in her womb.

The cardinal's speech being discussed by the two houses on a subsequent day, a conference ensued between them; the result of which was a determination of being reconciled to the church of Rome. An address was prepared, and presented to the king and queen, stating, that, whereas they had been guilty of a most horrible defection and schism from the apostolic see, they now sincerely repented of it; that they were ready to give demonstration of their penitence, by abrogating all laws which had been enacted to the prejudice of that see; that, as the pollution of their schism had not reached their majesties, they hoped they would

(e) The more effectually to cut off Philip's hopes of possessing any authority in England, they passed a law in which they declared, "That her majesty, as their only queen, should solely, and as sole queen, enjoy the crown and sovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courtesy of the realm, or by any other means."

(f) We are told by sir William Monson, p. 225, that the admiral of England fired at the Spanish navy, when Philip was on board; because they had not lowered their topsails, as a mark of deference to the English navy in the narrow seas: a very spirited behaviour, and very unlike those times. Philip disembarked at Southampton, and had no sooner set his foot on land, than he drew his sword, and marched forward in a warlike attitude. This behaviour was differently interpreted; some regarding it as an omen of his intention of ruling England by the sword; while others affirmed that it argued a resolution of drawing his sword in defence of the nation.

(g) After the nuptial ceremony, their titles were thus proclaimed by the heralds: "Philip and Mary, king and queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem, and Ireland; defenders of the faith; princes of Spain and Sicily; archdukes of Austria; dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant; counts of Hapsburg, Flanders, and Tirol."

would intercede with the legate to grant them absolution, and receive them again into the bosom of the church. The cardinal, after the formality of the royal intercession, absolved the parliament in the name of the pope, and released the kingdom from all spiritual censures. The pope, Julius III. being informed of these transactions, said, "that it was an unexampled instance of his felicity to receive thanks from the English for allowing them to do what he ought to give them thanks for performing.

Here it may be proper to observe, that notwithstanding the extreme zeal of those times for and against popery, the object always uppermost with the nobility and gentry was their money and estates: they were not brought to make these concessions in favour of Rome, till they had received repeated assurances, from the pope as well as the queen, that the plunder which they had made on the ecclesiastics should never be inquired into; and that the abbey and church lands should remain with the present possessors. But not trusting altogether to these promises, the parliament took care in the law itself, by which they repealed the former statutes enacted against the pope's authority, to insert a clause, in which, besides bestowing validity on all marriages celebrated during the schism, and fixing the right of incumbents to their benefices, they gave security to the possessors of church lands, and freed them from all danger of ecclesiastical censures. The convocation also, in order to remove apprehensions on that head, were induced to present a petition to the same purpose; and the legate, in his master's name, ratified all these transactions. It now appeared that, notwithstanding the efforts of the queen and king, the power of the papacy was effectually suppressed in England, and invincible barriers fixed against its re-establishment. For though the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastics was for the present restored, their property, on which their power greatly depended was irretrievably lost, and no hopes remained of recovering it. Even these arbitrary, powerful, and bigotted princes, while the transactions were yet recent, could not regain to the church her possessions so lately ravished from her; and no expedients were left to the clergy for enriching themselves, but those which they had at first practised, and which had required many ages of ignorance, barbarism, and superstition, to produce their effect on mankind. But in order to make some amends to the church by encouraging donations and bequests to that body, the statute of mortmain was suspended for twenty years.

The parliament having secured their own possessions, were more indifferent with regard to religion, or even to the lives of their fellow-citizens: they revived the old sanguinary laws against heretics (h), which had been rejected in the former parliament: they also enacted several statutes against seditious words and rumours (i); and they made it treason to imagine or attempt the death of Philip during his marriage with the queen (k). Each parliament hitherto had been induced to go a step farther than their predecessors; but none of them had entirely lost all regard to national interests. Their hatred against the Spaniards, as well as their suspicion of Philip's pretensions, still prevailed; and though the queen attempted to get her husband declared presumptive heir of the crown, and to have the administration put into his hands, she failed in all her endeavours, and could not even procure the parliament's consent to his coronation. All attempts likewise to obtain subsidies from the commons, in order to support the emperor in his war against France, proved fruitless: the usual animosity and jealousy of the English against that kingdom seemed to have given place for the present to like passions against Spain. Philip, sensible of the prepossessions entertained against him, endeavoured to acquire popularity by procuring the release of several prisoners of distinction; lord Henry Dudley, sir George Harper, sir Nicholas Throgmorton, sir Edmond Warner, sir William St. Lo, sir Nicholas Arnold, Harrington, Tremaine, who had been confined from the suspicions or resentment of the court. But nothing was more agreeable to the nation than his protecting the lady Elizabeth from the spite and malice of the queen, and restoring her to liberty (l), The earl of Devonshire also reaped some benefit from Philip's affectation of popularity, and recovered his liberty: but that nobleman, finding himself exposed to suspicion, begged permission to travel; and he soon after died at Padua from poison, as is asserted, given him by the Imperialists (m).

Mary was very desirous of having issue; and this made her fondly give credit to any appearance of pregnancy; and fancying herself with child, dispatches were immediately sent to inform foreign courts of the event: orders were issued to give public thanks: great rejoicings were made: the family of the young prince was already settled; for the catholics held themselves assured that the child was to be a male: and Bonner, bishop of London, made public prayers be said, that Heaven would please to render him beautiful, vigorous, and witty. But the nation still remained somewhat incredulous; and men were persuaded that the queen laboured under infirmities which rendered her incapable of having children. Her infant proved only the commencement of a dropsy, which the disordered state of her health had brought upon her. The belief, however, of her pregnancy was upheld with all possible care; and was one artifice by which Philip endeavoured to support his authority in the kingdom. The parliament passed a law, in the beginning of 1555, which, in case of the queen's demise, appointed him protector during the minority; and the king and queen, finding they could obtain no further concessions, came unexpectedly to Westminster and dissolved them (n).

The queen and her council now deliberated on the most effectual means of extirpating the Protestant faith. Mary was extremely rejoiced at the revival of the infamous laws for the burning of heretics; and she was inclined to put them in rigorous execution. But all her counsellors did not adopt the same inhumanity of sentiment. Some of them, particularly cardinal Pole, recommended a lenity of treatment towards those who dissented from the Catholic tenets. This great prelate maintained, that pastors ought not to divest themselves of compassion for their straying sheep; that bishops should act as the fathers of the people, and consider those who erred as their distempered children, whose disorders ought to be touched with a gentle hand, not stopped by the death of the patient. It had been found by experience, he said, that the extremities of persecution rather inflamed than cured the disease of heresy; and he was therefore of opinion, that moderate courses were more eligible, not only as affording a better prospect of success, but, as being more consistent with the dictates of Christian philanthrophy. Sufficient time should be allowed to the people to recover from those errors which, having been sanctioned by the heads of the ch rch in the late reign, had made a deep impression on the minds of many; and the best prelude to their recovery would be a reformation of the manners of the clergy. There was little doubt that the ignorance and immorality of the popish ecclesiastics had greatly contributed to the promotion of the protestant cause; and a correction of such defects and abuses as were too prevalent, would tend to restore the credit of the catholic church, and effect the gradual extirpation of the weeds of heterodoxy.

These arguments did not suit the severity of Gardiner's disposition. Though he was less attached than the cardinal to the Romish doctrines, his obsequious complaisance to the queen's bigotry, by giving him hopes of securing a continuance of her regard, induced him to recommend a zealous defence of the Catholic faith, by the capital punishment of its opponents. He affirmed, that lenient medicines would feed, instead of checking, the disease; and that those who wished for the establishment of an unity of doctrine could not take more effectual steps for the attainment of that desirable purpose than the infliction of extreme severities on the nonconformists. It would argue, he said, a disgraceful indifference with regard to religion, to tolerate such opinions as were repugnant to (l) This measure was not the effect of any generosity in Philip, a sentiment of which he was wholly destitute; but of a refined policy, which made him foresee, that if that princess were put to death, the next lawful heir was the queen of Scots, whose succession would for ever annex England to the crown of France.

(m) He was the eleventh and last earl of Devonshire of that noble family, one of the most illustrious in Europe.

(n) There happened an incident this session which must not be passed over in silence. Several members of the lower house, dissatisfied with the measures of the parliament, but finding themselves unable to prevent them, made a secession, on the 16th of January, 1555, in order to show their disapprobation, and refused any longer to attend the house. For this instance of contumacy they were indicted in the king's bench after the dissolution of parliament: six of them submitted to the mercy of the court, and paid their fines: the rest traversed; and the queen died before the affair was brought to an issue.

the true faith; and such a conduct would not only encourage those religious divisions, which disturbed the peace of society, but would endanger the souls of great multitudes of people, who, being indulged with a liberty of conscience, might be induced to adopt the pernicious tenets propagated by pretended reformers.

Having heard the different arguments adduced to each, Mary, as all who knew her disposition foresaw, signified her inclination for violent measures; and orders were given for the immediate enforcement of the revived laws against heretics.

The first Protestant whom the ferocious bigots of this reign condemned to the stake, was John Rogers, prebendary of St. Paul's, a man eminent among the Protestants for virtue as well as for learning, and one of their most popular preachers. He was first examined by the council, and then tried by a synod of bishops; and refusing either to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope, to whom the English parliament had now restored that dignity, or to express his belief of the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, he was pronounced a contumacious heretic, degraded from his clerical station, and delivered to the secular arm to be burned. Gardiner's plan was first to attack men of that character whom he hoped terror would bend to submission, and whose example, either of punishment or recantation, would naturally have influence on the multitude: but he found a perseverance and courage in Rogers, which it may seem strange to find in human nature, and of which all ages and all sects do nevertheless furnish many examples. Rogers, beside the care of his own preservation, lay under other powerful temptations to compliance: he had a wife whom he tenderly loved, and ten children; yet such was his serenity after his condemnation, that the jailors, it is said, waked him from a sound sleep when the hour of his execution approached. He had desired to see his wife before he died; but Gardiner told him, that he was a priest, and could not possibly have a wife; thus joining insult to cruelty. A pardon was offered him at the stake, as the price of his recantation; but he peremptorily rejected it, and suffered, with admirable constancy, the horrible death to which his inhuman persecusors had doomed him, being burnt in Smithfield (o) on the 4th of February, 1555.

Dr. John Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, had been tried at the same time with Rogers; but was sent to his own diocese to be executed. This circumstance was contrived to strike the greater terror into his flock; but it was a source of consolation to Hooper, who rejoiced in giving testimony by his death to that doctrine which he had formerly preached among them. When he was tied to the stake, a stool was set before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it, which it was still in his power to merit by a recantation: but he ordered it to be removed; and cheerfully prepared himself for that dreadful punishment to which he was sentenced. He suffered it in its full severity: the wind, which was violent, blew the flame of the reeds from his body; the faggots were green, and did not kindle easily: all his lower parts were consumed before his vitals were attacked: one of his hands dropped off: with the other he continued to beat his breast: he was heard to pray and to exhort the people; till his tongue, swoln with the violence of his agony, could no longer permit him utterance. He was three quarters of an hour in torture, which he bore with inflexible constancy. He was burned at Gloucester on the 9th of February.

Mr. Lawrence Saunders was burned at Coventry on the 8th of February. A pardon was also offered him; but he rejected it, and embraced the stake, saying, "Welcome the cross of Christ! welcome everlasting life!" Mr. Rowland Taylor, parson of Hadley, was punished by fire in that place, surrounded by his ancient friends and parishioners. When tied to the stake, he rehearsed a psalm in English: one of his guards struck him in the mouth, and bade him speak Latin: another, in a rage, gave him a blow on the head with his halbert, which put an end to his torments.

There was one Philpot, archdeacon of Winchester, who was so inflamed with zeal for orthodoxy, that having been engaged in dispute with an Arian, he spit in his adversary's face, to shew the great detestation which he had entertained against that species of heresy. He afterwards wrote a treatise to justify this unmannerly expression of zeal: he said, "that he was led to it in order to relieve the sorrow conceived from such horrid blasphemy, and to signify how unworthy such a miscreant was of being admitted into the society of any Christian." Philpot was a Protestant; and falling now into the hands of people as zealous as himself, but more powerful, he was condemned to the flames, and suffered at Smithfield (p).

It is needless to be particular in enumerating all the cruelties practised in England during the course of three years that these persecutions lasted: the savage barbarity on the one hand, and the patient constancy on the other, are so similar in all those martyrdoms, that the narrative, little agreeable in itself, would never be relieved by variety. Human nature appears not, on any occasion, so detestable, and at the same time so absurd, as in these religious persecutions, which sink men below infernal spirits in wickedness, and below the beasts in folly. A few instances only may be worth preserving, in order, if possible, to warn zealous bigots for ever to avoid such odious and such fruitless barbarity.

Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, was burned at Carmarthen, in his own diocese, on the 30th of March; and his appeal to cardinal Pole was not attended to. He was condemned by Morgan, his successor. Ridley, bishop of London, and Latimer, formerly bishop of Worcester, two prelates celebrated for learning and virtue, perished together in the same flames at Oxford, on the 16th of October, and supported each other's constancy by their mutual exhortations. Latimer, when tied to the stake, called to his companion, "Be of good cheer, brother; we shall this day kindle such a torch in England, as, I trust in God, shall never be extinguished (q).

One Hunter, a young man of nineteen, an apprentice, having been seduced by a priest into a dispute, had unwarily denied the real presence. Sensible of his danger, he immediately absconded; but Bonner, laying hold of his father, threatened him with the greatest severities if he did not produce the young man to stand his trial. Hunter hearing of the vexations to which his father was exposed, voluntarily surrendered himself to Bonner, and was condemned to the flames by that barbarous prelate.

Thomas Haukes, when conducted to the stake, agreed with his friends, that if he found the torture tolerable, he would make them a signal to that purpose in the midst of the flames. His zeal for the cause in which he suffered so supported him that he stretched out his arms, the signal agreed on; and in that posture he expired. This example, with many others of like constancy, encouraged multitudes not only to suffer, but even to court and aspire to martyrdom.

Even the tender sex, as they have commonly greater propensity to religion, produced many examples of the most inflexible courage in supporting the profession of it against all the fury of the persecutors. One execution in particular was attended with circumstances which, even at this time, excited astonishment by reason of their unusual barbarity. A woman in Guernsey, being near the time of her labour when brought to the stake, was thrown into such agitation by the torture that her belly burst, and she was delivered in the midst of the flames. One of the guards immediately snatched the infant from the fire, and attempted to save it: but a magistrate who stood by ordered it to be thrown back; being determined, he said, that nothing should survive which sprang from so obstinate and heretical a parent.

The persons condemned to these punishments were not convicted of teaching, or dogmatising, contrary to the established religion: they were seized merely on suspicion; and articles being offered them to subscribe, they were immediately upon their refusal condemned to the (o) Mr. Rogers was brought up at Cambridge, and had been many years chaplain to the English merchants at Antwerp. He returned to England in Edward the Sixth's reign, and was made a prebendary of St. Paul's, and reader of the divinity lecture, then belonging to that cathedral.

(p) The crime for which almost all the Protestants were condemned was, their refusal to acknowledge the real presence. Gardiner, who had vainly expected that a few examples would strike a terror into the Reformers, finding the work daily multiply upon him, devolved the invidious office on others, chiefly on Bonner, a man of profligate manners, and of a brutal character, who seemed to rejoice in the torments of the unhappy sufferers. He sometimes whipped the prisoners with his own hands, till he was tired with the violence of the exercise: he tore out the beard of a weaver who refused to relinquish his religion; and that he might give him a specimen of burning, he held his hand to the candle till the sinews and veins shrunk and burst. Fox, vol. iii. p. 187.

(q) The executioners had been so merciful (for that clemency may more naturally be ascribed to them than to the religious zealots) as to tie bags of gunpowder about these prelates, in order to put a speedy period to their tortures: the explosion immediately killed Latimer, who was in extreme old age; Ridley continued alive duting some time in the midst of the flames.

flames. These instances of barbarity, so unusual in the nation, excited the utmost consternation and horror; the constancy of the martyrs was the object of admiration; and as men have a principle of equity engraven in their minds, which even false religion is not able to obliterate, they were shocked to see persons of probity, of honour, of pious dispositions, exposed to punishments more severe than were inflicted on the greatest ruffians for crimes subversive of civil society. To exterminate the whole Protestant party was known to be impossible; and nothing could appear more iniquitous, than to subject to torture the most conscientious and courageous among them, and allow the cowards and hypocrites to escape. Each martyrdom, therefore, was equivalent to a hundred sermons against popery; and men either avoided such horrid spectacles, or returned from them full of a violent, though secret, indignation against the persecutors. Repeated orders were sent from the council to quicken the diligence of the magistrates in searching out heretics; and in some places the gentry were constrained to countenance by their presence those barbarous executions. These acts of violence tended only to render the Spanish government daily more odious; and Philip, sensible of the hatred which he incurred, endeavoured to remove the reproach from himself by a very gross artifice: he ordered his confessor to deliver in his presence a sermon in favour of toleration; a doctrine somewhat extraordinary in the mouth of a Spanish frier. But the court finding that Bonner, however shameless and savage, would not bear alone the whole infamy, soon threw off the mask; and the unrelenting temper of the queen, as well as of the king, appeared without control. A bold step was even taken towards introducing the inquisition into England. As the bishops' courts, though extremely arbitrary, and not confined by any ordinary forms of law, appeared not to be invested with sufficient power, a commission was appointed, by authority of the queen's prerogative, more effectually to extirpate heresy. Twenty-one persons were named; but any three were armed with the powers of the whole (r). Some civil powers were also given the commissioners to punish vagabonds and quarrelsome persons.

To bring the methods of proceeding in England still nearer to the practice of the inquisition, letters were written to lord North, and others, enjoining them, "To put to the torture such obstinate persons as would not confess, and there to order them at their discretion." Secret spies also and informers were employed, according to the practice of that iniquitous tribunal. Instructions were given to the justices of peace, "That they should call secretly before them one or two honest persons within their limits, or more at their discretion, and command them by oath, or otherwise, that they shall secretly learn and search out such persons as shall evil-behave themselves in church, or idly, or shall despise openly by words, the king's or queen's proceedings, or go about to make any commotion, or tell any seditious tales or news. And also that the same persons so to be appointed shall declare to the same justices of peace the ill behaviour of lewd disordered persons, whether it shall be for using unlawful games, and such other light behaviour of such suspected persons: and that the same information shall be given secretly to the justices; and the same justices shall call such accused persons before them, and examine them, without declaring by whom they were accused. And that the same justices shall, upon their examination, punish the offenders, according as their offences shall appear, upon the accusement and examination, by their discretion, either by open punishment or by good abearing." In some respects, this arbitrary and tyrannical edict even exceeded the oppression of the inquisition; by introducing, into every part of government, the same iniquities which that tribunal practises for the extirpation of heresy only. But the court had devised a more expeditious and summary method of supporting orthodoxy than even the inquisition itself. They issued a proclamation against books of heresy, treason, and sedition; and declared, "That whosoever had any of these books, and did not presently burn them, without reading them, or shewing them to any other person, should be esteemed rebels; and without any farther delay be executed by martial law."

We have thrown together almost all the proceedings against heretics, though carried on during a course of three years; that we may be obliged, as little as possible, to return to such shocking violences and barbarities (s). This mode of the burning of heretics was esteemed a very natural way of reconciling the kingdom to the Romish communion; and little solicitation was requisite to engage the pope to receive the strayed flock, from which his predecessors had reaped such considerable profit: yet was there a solemn embassy sent to Rome, consisting of sir Anthony Brown, created viscount Montacute, the bishop of Ely, and sir Edward Carne; in order to carry the submissions of England, and beg to be re-admitted into the bosom of the catholic church. Paul IV. after a short interval, now filled the papal chair; the most haughty pontiff that during several ages had been elevated to that dignity. He was offended that Mary still retained among her titles that of queen of Ireland; and he affirmed, that it belonged to him alone, as he saw cause, either to erect new kingdoms, or abolish the old; but to avoid all dispute with the new converts, he thought proper to erect Ireland into a kingdom, which he did on the 7th of June, and he then admitted the title, as if it had been assumed from his concession. This was an usual artifice of the popes, to give allowance to what they could not prevent, and afterwards pretend that princes, while they exercised their own powers, were only acting by authority from the papacy. And though Paul had at first intended to oblige Mary formally to recede from this title before he would bestow it upon her; he found it prudent to proceed in a less haughty manner.

Another point in discussion between the pope and the English ambassadors was not so easily terminated. Paul insisted, "that the property and possessions of the church should be restored to the uttermost farthing: that whatever belonged to God could never by any law be converted to profane uses, and every person who detained such possessions was in a state of eternal damnation: that he would willingly, in consideration of the humble submissions of the English, make them a present of these ecclesiastical revenues; but such a concession exceeded his power, and the people might be certain that so great a profanation of holy things would be a perpetual anathema upon them, and would blast all their future happiness: that if they would truly shew their filial piety, they must restore all the privileges and emoluments of the Romish church, and Peter's pence among the rest; nor could they expect that this apostle would open to them the gates of paradise, while they detained from him his patrimony on earth." These earnest remonstrances being transmitted to England, though they had little influence on the nation, operated powerfully on the queen; who was determined, in order to ease her conscience, to restore all the church lands which were still in the possession of the crown: and the more to display her zeal, she erected anew some convents and monasteries, notwithstanding the poverty of the ex-

(r) The commission runs in these terms: "That since many false rumours were published among the subjects, and many heretical opinions were also spread among them, the commissioners were to inquire into those, either by presentments, by witnesses, or any other political way they could devise, and to search after all heresies; the bringers in, the sellers, the readers of all heretical books: they were to examine and punish all misbehaviours or negligences in any church or chapel; and to try all priests that did not preach the sacrament of the altar; all persons that did not hear mass, or come to their parish church to service, that would not go in processions, or did not take holy bread or holy water: and if they found any that did obstinately persist in such heresies, they were to put them into the hands of their ordinaries, to be punished according to the spiritual laws: giving the commissioners full power to proceed as their discretions and consciences should direct them, and to use all such means as they would invent for the searching of the premises; empowering them also to call before them such witnesses as they pleased, and to force them to make oath of such things as might discover what they sought after." Burnet, vol. ii. coll. 32.

(s) It is indeed unpleasing to dwell on these unnatural and impious proceedings: enough has been said to excite the just detestation of posterity against a queen who could thus let loose the furies of superstition, as well as against the spiritual assassins who gloried in these horrid scenes, and who, on pretence of laws which no humane government could ever enforce, and which they disgraced by their inquisitorial modes of process, sacrificed the most inoffensive and respectable members of the community to their malignity and revenge. It is computed, that in that time two hundred and seventy-seven persons were brought to the stake; besides those who were punished by imprisonment, fines, and confiscations. Among those who suffered by fire were five bishops, twenty-one clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbandmen, servants, and labourers, fifty-five women, and four children. This persevering cruelty appears astonishing; yet is it much inferior to what has been practised in other countries. A great author computes, that in the Netherlands alone, from the time that the edict of Charles V. was promulgated against the Reformers, there had been fifty thousand persons hanged, beheaded, buried alive, or burnt, on account of religion; and that in France the number had also been considerable. Yet in both countries, as the same author subjoins, the progress of the new opinions, instead of being checked, was rather forwarded by these persecutions.

chequer. When this measure was debated in council, some members objected, "that if such a considerable part of the revenue were dismembered, the dignity of the crown would fall to decay;" but the queen replied, "that she preferred the salvation of her soul to ten such kingdoms as England." These imprudent measures would not probably have taken place so easily, had it not been for the death of the persecuting bishop Gardiner, which happened about this time: the great seal was given to Heathe, archbishop of York; that an ecclesiastic might still be possessed of that high office, and be better enabled by his authority to forward the persecutions against those of the Reformed religion (t).

The persecutions which had been carried on, were become very odious to the nation; and the effects of the public discontent appeared in the new parliament summoned to meet at Westminster, on the 21st of October, 1555. A bill was passed, restoring to the church the tenths and first-fruits, and all the impropriations which remained in the hands of the crown; but though this matter directly concerned none but the queen herself, great opposition was made to the bill in the house of commons. An application being made for a subsidy during two years, and for two fifteenths, the latter was refused by the commons; and many members said, that while the crown was thus despoiling itself of its revenue, it was in vain to bestow riches upon it. The parliament rejected a bill for obliging the exiles to return under certain penalties, and another for incapacitating such as were remiss in the prosecution of heresy from being justices of peace. The queen, finding that the commons were not inclinable to gratify her in every arbitrary wish, thought proper to dissolve the parliament on the 9th of December.

The spirit of opposition which began to prevail in parliament was the more likely to be vexatious to Mary, as she was otherwise in a very bad humour on account of her husband's absence, who, tired of her importunate love and jealousy, and finding his authority extremely limited in England, had laid hold of the first opportunity to leave her, and had gone over last summer to the emperor in Flanders. The indifference and neglect of Philip, added to the disappointment in her imagined pregnancy, threw her into a deep state of melancholy; and she gave vent to her spleen, by daily enforcing the persecutions against the Protestants, and even by expressions of rage against all her subjects; by whom she knew herself to be hated, and whose opposition, in refusing an entire compliance with Philip, was the cause, she believed, why he had alienated his affections from her, and afforded her so little of his company. The less return her love met with, the more it increased; and she passed most of her time in solitude, where she gave vent to her passion, either in tears, or in writing fond epistles to Philip, who seldom returned her any answer, and scarcely deigned to pretend any sentiment of love or even of gratitude towards her. The chief part of government to which she attended was the extorting of money from her people, in order to satisfy her husband's demands; and as the parliament had granted her but a scanty supply, she had recourse to expedients very violent and irregular. She levied a loan of sixty thousand pounds upon a thousand persons, of whose compliance, either on account of their riches or their affections to her, she held herself best assured: but that sum not sufficing, she exacted a general loan on every one who possessed twenty pounds a-year. This imposition lay heavy on the gentry, who were obliged many of them to retrench their expences, and dismiss their servants, in order to enable them to comply with her demands: and as these servants, accustomed to idleness, and having no means of subsistence, commonly betook themselves to theft and robbery, the queen published a proclamation, by which she obliged their former masters to take them back to their service. She levied sixty thousand marks on seven thousand yeomen, who had not contributed to the former loan; and she exacted thirty-six thousand pounds more from the merchants. In order to engage some Londoners to comply more willingly with her multiplied extortions, she passed an edict, prohibiting for four months the exporting of any English cloth or kersey to the Netherlands; an expedient which procured a good market for such as had already sent any quantity of cloth thither. Her rapacious disposition engaged her to give endless disturbance and interruption to commerce. The English company settled in Antwerp having refused her a loan of forty thousand pounds, she dissembled her resentment till she found that they had bought and shipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp fair, which was approaching: she then laid an embargo on the ships, and obliged the merchants to grant her a loan of the forty thousand pounds at first demanded, to engage for the payment of twenty thousand pounds more at a limited time, and to submit to an arbitrary imposition of twenty shillings on each piece. Some time after she was informed, that the Italian merchants had shipped above forty thousand pieces of cloth for the Levant, for which they were to pay her a crown a-piece, the usual imposition: she struck a bargain with the merchant adventurers in London; prohibited the foreigners from making any exportation; and received from the English merchants, in consideration of this iniquitous transaction, the sum of fifty thousand pounds, and an imposition of four crowns on each piece of cloth which they should export. She attempted to borrow great sums abroad; but her credit was so low, that though she offered fourteen per cent. to the city of Antwerp for a loan of thirty thousand pounds, she could not obtain it, till she compelled the city of London to be surety for her. All these arbitrary and violent expedients were employed, while she was in profound peace with all the world, and had visibly no occasion for money but to supply the demands of a husband, who gave attention only to his own convenience, and showed himself entirely indifferent about the interest of his queen or the welfare of the English nation.

Mary's husband, Philip, was now become master of all the wealth of the new world, and of the richest and most extensive dominions in Europe, by the voluntary resignation of his father, the emperor Charles V. who, though still in the vigour of his age, had taken a disgust to the world, and was determined to seek, in the tranquillity of retreat, for that happiness which he had in vain attempted to arrive at amidst the tumults of war, and the restless projects of ambition. He summoned the states of the Low Countries, on the 25th of October, and seating himself on the throne for the last time, explained to his subjects the reasons of his resignation, absolved them from all oaths of allegiance, and, devolving his authority on Philip, told him, that his paternal tenderness made him weep, when he reflected on the burden which he imposed upon him. He inculcated on his son the great and only duty of a prince, the study of his people's happiness; and represented how much preferable it was to govern by affection, rather than by fear, the nations subjected to his dominion. The cool reflections of age now discovered to him the emptiness of his former pursuits; and he found that the vain schemes of extending his empire had been the source of endless opposition and disappointment, and kept himself, his neighbours, and his subjects, in perpetual inquietude, and had frustrated the sole end of government, the felicity of the nations committed to his care; an object which meets with less opposition, and which, if steadily pursued, can alone convey a lasting and solid satisfaction.

A few months after, in the beginning of 1556, he resigned to Philip his other dominions; and, embarking on board a fleet, sailed to Spain, and took his journey to St. Just, a monastery in Estremadura, which, being situated in a healthy climate, and amidst the greatest beauties of nature, he had chosen for the place of his retreat. When he arrived at Burgos he found, by the thinness of his court, and the negligent attendance of the Spanish grandees, that he was no longer emperor; and though this observation might convince him still more of the vanity of the world, and make him more heartily despise what he had renounced, he sighed to find that all former adulation and obeisance had been paid to his fortune, not to his person (u). He pursued, however, his resolution with inflexible con(t) The Catholic bigots lamented the decease of their patron Stephen Gardiner; but every friend to humanity rejoiced at the departure of one who had been the chief adviser of religious persecution. The cruelties, however, which he had enforced did not expire with him. Bonner, a depraved wretch, whose character was more brutally savage than that of the defunct chancellor, continued the practice of those inhumanities which have marked the reign of Mary with indelible turpitude; and his chief associates in those detestable proceedings were Baine, Christopherson, and Griffith, bishops of Litchfield, Chichester, and Rochester; Thorndon, suffragan of Dover; and Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury. And Cardinal Pole, the primate after Cranmer was committed to the flames, though he was too humane to be pleased with these barbarities, was too tame and passive to endeavour to prevent them.

(u) With better reason was he struck with the ingratitude of his son Philip, who obliged him to wait a long time for the payment of the small pension which he had reserved; and this disappointment in his domestic enjoyments gave him a sensible concern.

stancy; and, shutting himself up in his retreat, he exerted such self-command, that he restrained even his curiosity from any inquiry concerning the transactions of the world, which he had entirely abandoned. He is said, in his retreat, to have discovered a propensity to the new doctrines; and to have frequently dropped hints of this unexpected alteration in his sentiments. Having amused himself with the construction of clocks, of which he collected a great variety; and, having tried a long time to bring them all to strike together, without effect, he broke out into this remarkable expression: "How vain and foolish is it for princes to endeavour to make all their subjects be of one mind in religion, when no art is able to make a few clocks strike together!" He survived his retreat two years (v).

The emperor Charles had very early in the beginning of his reign found the difficulty of governing such distant dominions; and he had made his brother Ferdinand be elected king of the Romans; with a view to his inheriting the Imperial dignity, as well as his German dominions. But having afterwards enlarged his schemes, and formed plans of aggrandizing his family, he regretted that he must dismember such considerable states; and he endeavoured to engage Ferdinand, by the most tempting offers, and most earnest solicitations, to yield up his pretensions in favour of Philip. Finding his attempts fruitless, he had resigned the Imperial crown with his other dignities; and Ferdinand, according to common form, applied to the pope for his coronation. The arrogant pontiff refused the demand; and pretended, that though on the death of an emperor he was obliged to crown the prince elected, yet, in the case of a resignation, the right devolved to the holy see, and it belonged to the pope alone to appoint an emperor. The conduct of Paul was in every thing conformable to these lofty pretensions. He thundered always in the ears of all ambassadors, that he stood in no need of the assistance of any prince; that he was above all the potentates of the earth; that he would not accustom monarchs to pretend to a familiarity or equality with him; that it belonged to him to alter and regulate kingdoms; that he was successor of those who had deposed kings and emperors; and that, rather than submit to any thing below his dignity, he would set fire to the four corners of the world. He went so far, as at table, in the presence of many persons, and even openly, in a public consistory, to say, that he would not admit any kings for his companions; they were all his subjects, and he would hold them under these feet: so saying, he stamped on the ground with his old and infirm limbs: for he was now upwards of fourscore years of age.

Philip, though less warlike than his father, was no less ambitious; and he trusted, that by the intrigues of the cabinet, where he believed his caution and secrecy and prudence gave him the superiority, he should be able to subdue all his enemies, and extend his authority and dominion. For this reason, as well as from the desire of settling his new empire, he wished to maintain peace with France; but when he found, that without sacrificing his honour it was impossible for him to overlook the hostile attempts of Henry, he prepared for war with great alacrity. In order to give himself the more advantage, he was desirous of embarking England in the quarrel; and though the queen was of herself extremely averse to that measure, he hoped that the devoted fondness which, notwithstanding repeated instances of his indifference, she still bore to him, would effectually second his applications. Had the matter indeed depended solely on her, she was incapable of resisting her husband's commands; but she had little weight with her council, still less with her people; and her government, which was every day becoming more odious, seemed unable to maintain itself even during the most profound tranquillity, much more if a war were kindled with France, and, what seemed an inevitable consequence, with Scotland, supported by that powerful kingdom.

This year an act of barbarity was exercised in England, which, added to many other instances of a similar nature, tended to render the government extremely unpopular. Archbishop Cranmer had long been detained prisoner; but the queen now determined to bring him to punishment; and, in order the more fully to gratify her revengeful disposition, she resolved to punish him for heresy, rather than for treason. He was cited by the pope to stand his trial at Rome; and though he was known to be kept in close custody at Oxford, he was, upon his not appearing, condemned as contumacious. Bonner, bishop of London, and Thirleby, of Ely, were sent to Oxford to degrade him, on the 14th of February; and the former executed the melancholy ceremony with all the joy and exultation which suited his savage nature, venting the most bitter railleries and invectives against the prisoner, during the ceremony, while Thirleby melted into tears (w). The implacable spirit of the queen, not satisfied with the eternal damnation of Cranmer, which she believed inevitable, and with the execution of that dreadful sentence to which he was condemned, prompted her also to seek the ruin of his honour, and the infamy of his name. Persons were employed to attack him, not in the way of disputation, against which he was sufficiently armed; but by flattery, insinuation, and address; by representing the dignities to which his character still entitled him, if he would merit them by a recantation; by giving hopes of long enjoying those powerful friends whom his beneficent disposition had attached to him during the course of his prosperity. Overcome by the fond love of life, terrified by the prospect of those tortures which awaited him; he allowed, in an unguarded hour, the sentiments of nature to prevail over his resolution, and he agreed to subscribe the doctrines of the papal supremacy, and of the real presence. The court, equally perfidious and cruel, were determined that this recantation should avail him nothing; and they sent orders that he should be required to acknowledge his errors in church before the whole people, and that he should thence be immediately carried to execution. Cranmer was then conducted to St. Mary's church, that he might solemnly renounce his heretical pravity; but whether that he had received a secret intimation of their design, or had repented of his weakness, he surprised the audience by a contrary declaration. He said, that he was well apprised of the obedience which he owed to his sovereign and the laws; but this duty extended no farther than to submit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without resistance, whatever hardships they should impose upon him: that a superior duty, the duty which he owed to his Maker, obliged him to speak truth on all occasions, and not to relinquish, by a base denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had revealed to mankind: that he renounced the pope as an enemy to Christ, and a promoter of false doctrines; that he professed a complete detestation of the Romish errors: that there was one miscarriage in his life, of which, above all others, he severely repented; the insincere declaration of faith to which he had the weakness to consent, and which the fear of death alone had extorted from him: that he took this opportunity of atoning for his error, by a sincere and open recantation; and was willing to seal, with his blood, that doctrine which he firmly believed to be communicated from Heaven: and that, as his hand had erred, by betraying his heart, it should first be punished, by a severe but just doom, and should first pay the forfeit of its offences. He was thence led to the stake, amidst the insults of the Catholics; and, having now summoned up all the force of his mind, he bore their scorn, as well as the torture of his punishment, with singular fortitude. He stretched out his hand, and, without betraying, either by his countenance or motions, the least sign of weakness, or even of feeling, he held it in the flames till (v) Charles passed his time in a rational manner till about six months previous to his death, when his mind became a prey to the most gloomy superstition. Not content with the severest mortifications, by which he vainly hoped to expiate his sins, he had recourse to an act the most wild and uncommon that the disordered brain of an enthusiast had ever engendered. He resolved to celebrate his own obsequies before his death; and having ordered his tomb to be erected in the chapel of the monastery, his domestics marched thither in funeral procession, with black tapers in their hands; while he himself followed in his shroud. He was laid in his coffin with much solemnity; the service for the dead was chaunted; and Charles joined in the prayers which were offered for the repose of his soul, mingling his tears with those which his attendants shed, as if they had been celebrating a real funeral. The ceremony closed with sprinkling holy water on the coffin in the usual form; and, all the assistants retiring, the doors of the chapel were shut. Then Charles rose out of his coffin, and withdrew to his apartment, full of those awful sentiments which such a singular solemnity was calculated to inspire. But either the fatigue of the ceremony, or the impression which the image of death left on his mind, affected him so much, that the next day he was seized with a fever, which put a period to his life, on the 21st of September, 1558.

(w) On this occasion they put on him pontifical robes made of canvas, to render him more ridiculous, and then stripped him of that ludicrous attire piece by piece, according to the bull and ceremonies of degradation sent from Rome, which may be seen in Wilkins's Concilia, vol. iv. fol. 132.

it was entirely consumed. His thoughts seemed wholly occupied with reflections on his former fault, and he called aloud several times, "This hand has offended." Satisfied with that atonement, he then discovered a serenity in his countenance; and when the fire attacked his body, he seemed to be quite insensible of his outward sufferings, and, by the force of hope and resolution, to have collected his mind altogether within itself, and to repel the fury of the flames (x). It is pretended, that, after his body was consumed, his heart was found entire and untouched amidst the ashes; an event which, as it was the emblem of his constancy, was fondly believed by the zealous Protestants.

Some time after Cranmer's death, cardinal Pole, who had now taken priest's orders, was installed in the see of Canterbury; and was thus, by this office, as well as by his commission of legate, placed at the head of the church of England. But though he was averse to all sanguinary methods of converting heretics, and deemed the reformation of the clergy the more effectual, as the more laudable expedient for that purpose; he found his authority too weak to oppose the barbarous and bigoted disposition of the queen and her counsellors. He himself, he knew, had been suspected of Lutheranism; and as Paul, the reigning pontiff, was a furious persecutor, and his personal enemy, he was prompted, by the modesty of his disposition, to reserve his credit for other occasions, in which he had a greater probability of success.

The queen was now anxious to engage the nation in the war which was kindled between France and Spain; and cardinal Pole, with some other counsellors, openly and zealously opposed this measure, in 1557. Besides insisting on the marriage articles, which provided against such an attempt, they represented the violence of the domestic factions in England, and the disordered state of the finances; and they foreboded, that the tendency of all these measures was to reduce the kingdom to a total dependence on Spanish counsels. Philip had come to London in order to urge the queen to the undertaking, and support his partizans; and he told the queen, that if he were not gratified in so reasonable a request, he never more would set foot in England. This declaration extremely heightened her zeal for promoting his interests, and overcoming the inflexibility of her council. After employing other menaces of a more violent nature, she threatened to dismiss all of them, and to appoint counsellors more obsequious; yet could she not procure a vote for declaring war with France.

While the council continued to oppose the queen's wishes, an incident occurred which tended to overcome their reluctance. A military officer, of the name of Stafford, who, with other Englishmen, had retired to France from the oppressive sway of Mary, was seduced, by the artful instigations of some of the emissaries of her court, to attempt a descent in England, where they assured him he would meet with encouragement from the disaffection of the people to the queen and her consort. Stafford being in a state of indigence, was ready for any adventurous scheme; and, in conjunction with other English exiles, and several foreigners, he hired some vessels at Dieppe in Normandy, and set sail for Scarborough in Yorkshire, with a resolution of aiming at the reduction of the castle, which, he had been informed, was weakly garrisoned. He and his companions found means to surprize this fortress, on the 24th of April; but they were unable to maintain it against the attacks of the earl of Westmoreland, who compelled them to surrender. Stafford was conducted prisoner to London; and though the court endeavoured to extort from him a confession of his having been encouraged to his bold attempt by the king of France, he declared that both that prince and the constable de Montmorency, to whom he had communicated his intentions, had refused to give him any assistance. He was beheaded on Tower Hill; three of his accomplices were hanged at Tyburn; and others of his company suffered death in Yorkshire.

The council now gave way to the demands of Mary, who represented it as a matter of no doubt, that Stafford had been instigated to his enterprize by the French king. It was resolved that war should be declared against that monarch without delay; and a proclamation was issued on the 7th of June, in which he was accused of having abetted the traitorous schemes of the late duke of Northumberland, as well as those of sir Thomas Wiat; of having formed a plot to surprize Calais, encouraged Stafford and other conspirators to deprive Mary of her crown, and afforded constant protection to her fugitive subjects. A herald was also dispatched to the court of France, to denounce war in form; a commission which he did not execute without danger; for, by not discovering his office till he had entered the palace, he was considered by the French ministry as guilty, by the law of arms, of a capital offence. The king, however, gave him an audience, and dismissed him with a present. Preparations were now made for an attack on that kingdom.

The revenue of England at that time little exceeded three hundred thousand pounds. Any considerable supplies could scarcely be expected from parliament, considering the present disposition of the nation; and as the war would sensibly diminish that branch arising from the customs, the finances, it was foreseen, would fall short even of the ordinary charges of government; and must still more prove unequal to the expences of war. But though the queen owed great arrears to all her servants, besides the loans extorted from her subjects, these considerations had no influence with her; and, in order to support her warlike preparations, she continued to levy money in the same arbitrary and violent manner which she had formerly practised. She obliged the city of London to supply her with sixty thousand pounds on her husband's entry; she levied before the legal time the second year's subsidy voted by parliament; she issued anew many privy seals, by which she procured loans from her people; and having equipped a fleet, which she could not victual by reason of the dearness of provisions, she seized, by an act of tyranny, all the corn she could find in Suffolk and Norfolk, without paying any price to the owners. By all these expedients, assisted by the power of pressing, she levied an army of ten thousand men, which she sent over to the Low Countries, under the command of the earl of Pembroke. Meanwhile, in order to prevent any disturbance at home, many of the most considerable gentry were thrown into confinement in the Tower; and lest they should be known, the Spanish practice was followed: they either were carried thither in the night-time, or were hoodwinked and muffled by the guards to whose care they were entrusted in their way to that fortress.

The king of Spain had assembled an army which, after the junction of the English, amounted to above sixty thousand men, conducted by Philibert, duke of Savoy, one of the greatest captains of the age. The constable, Montmorency, who commanded the French army, had not half the number to oppose to him. The duke of Savoy, after menacing Mariembourgh and Rocroy, suddenly sat down before St. Quintin; and as the place was weak, and ill provided with a garrison, he expected in a few days to become master of it. But admiral Coligny, governor of the province, thinking his honour interested to save so important a fortress, threw himself into St. Quintin, with some troops of French and Scottish gensdarmerie; and by his exhortations and example animated the soldiers to a vigorous defence. He dispatched a messenger to his uncle Montmorency, on the 10th of August, 1557, desiring a supply of men; and the constable approached the place with his whole army, in order to facilitate the entry of these succours. But the duke of Savoy, falling on the reinforcement, did such execution, that not above five hundred got into the place. He next made an attack on the French army, and put them to total rout, killing four thousand men, and dispersing the remainder. In this unfortunate action many of the principal nobility of France were either slain or taken prisoners: among the latter was the old constable himself, who, fighting valiantly, and resolute to die rather than survive his defeat, was surrounded by the enemy, and thus fell alive into their hands. The whole kingdom of France was thrown into consternation: Paris was attempted to be fortified in a hurry; and had the Spaniards presently marched thither, it could not have failed to fall into their hands. But Philip was of a cautious temper; and he determined first to take St. Quintin, in order to secure a communication with his own dominions. A very little time, it was expected, would finish this enterprize; but the bravery of Coligny still prolonged the siege seventeen days, which proved the safety of France. Some troops were levied and assembled. Couriers were sent to recal the duke of Guise and his army from Italy; and the French, having recovered from their first panic, put themselves in a posture of defence. Philip, after taking Ham and Catelet, found the season so far advanced, that he could attempt no other enterprize: he broke up his camp, and retired to winter-quarters.

(x) Thus perished Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, on the 21st of March, 1556, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and the twenty-third of his primacy. He was one of the chief instruments of English reformation. He was undoubtedly a man of merit; possessed of learning and capacity, and adorned with candour, sincerity, and beneficence, and all those virtues which were fitted to render him useful and amiable in society. His moral qualities procured him universal respect; and the courage of his martyrdom, though he fell short of the rigid inflexibility observed in many, made him the hero of the Protestant party. The chief blemish of his character seems to have been his giving countenance, by the execution of two persons for heretical opinions, to that practice of religious murder by which he himself suffered.

The vigilant activity of Guise prompted him, in the depth of winter, to plan an enterprize, which France during her greatest successes had generally regarded as impracticable, and had never thought of undertaking. Calais was in that age deemed an impregnable fortress; and as it was known to be the favourite of the English nation, by whom it could easily be succoured, the recovery of that place by France was considered as totally desperate. But Coligny had remarked, that as the town of Calais was surrounded with marshes, which during the winter were impassable, except over a dyke guarded by two castles, St. Agatha and Newnam bridge, the English were of late accustomed, on account of the lowness of their finances, to dismiss a great part of the garrison at the end of autumn, and to recal them in the spring, at which time alone they judged their attendance necessary. On this circumstance he founded the design of making a sudden attack on Calais; he caused the place to be secretly viewed by some engineers; and a plan of the whole enterprize being found among his papers, it served, though he himself was made prisoner on the taking of St. Quintin, to suggest the project of that undertaking, and to direct the measures of the duke of Guise.

Several bodies of troops defiled towards the frontiers on various pretences; and the whole being suddenly assembled, formed an army, with which Guise made an unexpected march towards Calais, in the beginning of 1558. At the same time a great number of French ships, being ordered into the channel, under colour of cruising on the English, composed a fleet which made an attack by sea on the fortifications. The French assaulted St. Agatha with three thousand harquebusiers; and the garrison, though they made a vigorous defence, were soon obliged to abandon the place, and retreat to Newnam bridge. The siege of this latter place was immediately undertaken, and at the same time the fleet battered the risbank, which guarded the entrance of the harbour; and both these castles seemed exposed to imminent danger. The governor, lord Wentworth, finding that the greater part of his weak garrison was inclosed in the castle of Newnam bridge and the risbank, ordered them to capitulate, and join him in Calais, which without their assistance he was unable to defend. The garrison of Newnam bridge was so happy as to effect this purpose; but that of the risbank could not obtain such favourable conditions, and were obliged to surrender at discretion. The duke of Guise, now holding Calais blockaded by sea and land, thought himself secure of succeeding in his enterprize, but in order to prevent all accident, he delayed not a moment the attack of the place. He planted his batteries against the castle, where he made a large breach; and having ordered Andelot, Coligny's brother, to drain the fossée, he commanded an assault, which succeeded; and the French made a lodgement in the castle. On the night following, Wentworth attempted to recover this post; but having lost two hundred men in a furious attack which he made upon it, he found his garrison so weak, that he was obliged to capitulate. Ham and Guisnes fell soon after (y).

The Scots finding their ancient allies, the French, thus successful, began to move on the borders of England. Whereupon the English raised loud complaints; and the queen was under the necessity of defending the kingdom against the Scottish invaders in preference to her carrying on a fruitless war against France. After the peace which, in consequence of king Edward's treaty with Henry, took place between Scotland and England, the queen-dowager, on pretence of visiting her daughter and her relations, made a journey to France, and carried along with her the earls of Huntley, Sutherland, Marischal, and many of the principal nobility. Her secret design was, to take measures for engaging the earl of Arran to resign to her the government of the kingdom; and as her brothers, the duke of Guise, the cardinal of Lorraine, and the duke of Aumale, had uncontrolled influence in the court of France, she easily persuaded Henry, and by his authority the Scottish nobles, to enter into her measures. Having also gained Carnegy, of Kinnaird, Panter, bishop of Ross, and Gavin Hamilton, commendator of Kilwinning, three creatures of the governor's, she persuaded him, by their means, to consent to this resignation; and when every thing was thus prepared for her purpose, she took a journey to Scotland, and passed through England in her way thither. Edward received her with great respect and civility; though he could not forbear attempting to renew the old treaty for his marriage with her daughter. When the queen-dowager arrived in Scotland, she found the governor very unwilling to fulfil his engagements; and it was not till after many delays that he could be persuaded to resign his authority. But finding that the majority of the young princess was approaching, and that the queen-dowager had gained the affections of all the principal nobility, he thought it more prudent to submit; and having stipulated that he should be declared next heir to the crown, and should be freed from giving any account of his past administration, he placed her in possession of the power; and from that time, April 12, 1554, she assumed the name of regent. D'Oisel, a Frenchman, celebrated for capacity, had attended her as ambassador from Henry, but in reality to assist her with his counsels in so delicate an undertaking as the administration of Scotland; and this man had formed a scheme for laying a general tax on the kingdom, in order to support a standing military force, which might at once repel the inroads of foreign enemies, and check the turbulence of the Scottish nobles. But though some of the courtiers were gained over to this project, it gave great and general discontent to the nation; and the queen-regent, after ingenuously confessing that it would prove pernicious to the kingdom, had the prudence to desist from it, and to trust entirely for her security to the good-will and affections of her subjects.

When Mary commenced hostilities against France, Henry required the queen-regent to take part in the quarrel; and she summoned a convention of states at Newbottle, and requested them to concur in a declaration of war against England. The Scottish nobles, who were become as jealous of French, as the English were of Spanish influence, refused their assent; and the queen was obliged to have recourse to stratagem, in order to effect her purpose. She ordered d'Oisel to begin some fortifications at Eyemouth, a place which had been dismantled by the last treaty with Edward; and when the garrison of Berwick, as she foresaw, made an inroad to prevent the undertaking, she employed this pretence to inflame the Scottish nation, and to engage them in hostilities against England. The enterprizes, however, of the Scots proceeded no farther than some inroads on the borders: when d'Oisel, of himself, conducted artillery and troops to besiege the castle of Werke, he was recalled, and sharply rebuked by the council.

In order, however, to connect Scotland more closely with France, and to increase the influence of the latter kingdom, it was thought proper by Henry to celebrate the marriage between the young queen and the dauphin; and a deputation was sent by the Scottish parliament to assist at the ceremony, and to settle the terms of the contract.

The close alliance between France and Scotland threatened the repose and security of Mary; and it was foreseen, that though the factions and disorders which (y) Thus the duke of Guise in eight days, during the depth of winter, made himself master of this strong fortress, that had cost Edward III. a siege of eleven months, at the head of a numerous army, which had that very year been victorious in the battle of Cressy. The English had held it above two hundred years; and as it gave them an easy entrance into France, it was regarded as the most important possession belonging to the crown. The joy of the French was extreme, as well as the glory acquired by Guise, who, at the time when all Europe imagined France to be sunk by the unfortunate battle of St. Quintin, had, in opposition to the English, and their allies the Spaniards, acquired possession of a place which no former king of France, even during the distraction of the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, had ever ventured to attempt. The English, on the other hand, bereaved of this valuable fortress, murmured loudly against the improvidence of the queen and her council; who, after engaging in a fruitless war, for the sake of foreign interests, had thus exposed the nation to so severe a disgrace. A treasury exhausted by expences, and burthened with debts; a people divided and dejected; a sovereign negligent of her people's welfare; were circumstances which, notwithstanding the fair offers and promises of Philip, gave them small hopes of recovering Calais.

might naturally be expected in the Scottish government, during the absence of the sovereign, would make its power less formidable, that kingdom would at least afford to the French a means of invading England. The queen, therefore, found it necessary, on the 20th of January, to summon a parliament, and to demand of them some supplies to her exhausted exchequer. The commons voted, besides a fifteenth, a subsidy of four shillings in the pound on land, and two shillings and eight pence on goods. The clergy granted eight shillings in the pound, payable, as was also the subsidy of the laity, in four years by equal portions. The parliament also passed an act, confirming all the sales and grants of crown lands, which either were already made by the queen, or should be made during the seven ensuing years. It was easy to foresee, that in Mary's present disposition and situation, this power would be followed by a great alienation of the royal demesnes; and nothing could be more contrary to the principles of good government, than to establish a prince with very extensive authority, yet permit him to be reduced to beggary. This act met with opposition in the house of commons. One Copley expressed his fears lest the queen, under colour of the power there granted, might alter the succession, and alienate the crown from the lawful heir: but his words were thought irreverent to her majesty; he was committed to the custody of the serjeant at arms; and though he expressed sorrow for his offence, he was not released till the queen was applied to for his pardon.

The people of England during this whole reign, were under great apprehensions with regard not only to the succession, but the life of the princess Elizabeth. The violent hatred which the queen bore to her broke out on every occasion; and it required all the authority of Philip, as well as her own great prudence, to prevent the fatal effects of it. The princess retired into the country; and knowing that she was surrounded with spies, she passed her time wholly in reading and study, intermeddled in no business, and saw very little company. While she remained in this situation, which prepared her mind for those great actions, by which her life was afterwards so much distinguished; proposals of marriage were made to her by the Swedish ambassador in his master's name. As her first question was, Whether the queen had been informed of these proposals? the ambassador told her, that his master thought, as he was a gentleman, it was his duty first to make his addresses to herself; and having obtained her consent, he would next, as a king, apply to her sister. But the princess would allow him to proceed no farther; and the queen, after thanking her for this instance of duty, desired to know how she stood affected to the Swedish proposals. Elizabeth, though exposed to many present dangers and mortifications, had the magnanimity to reserve herself for better fortune; and she covered her refusal with professions of a passionate attachment to a single life, which, she said, she infinitely preferred before any other. The princess showed like prudence in concealing her sentiments of religion, in complying with the present modes of worship, and in eluding all questions with regard to that delicate subject (z).

The supply granted by parliament enabled the queen to fit out a fleet of a hundred and forty sail, which, being joined by thirty Flemish ships, and carrying six thousand land forces on board, was sent to make an attempt on the coast of Britanny. The fleet was commanded by lord Clinton; the land forces by the earls of Huntingdon and Rutland. But the equipment of the fleet and army was so dilatory, that the French got intelligence of the design, and were prepared to receive them. The English found Brest well guarded; so that an attempt on that place was found to be impracticable; but landing at Conquet, they plundered and burnt the town, with some adjacent villages, and were proceeding to commit greater disorders, when Kersimon, a Breton gentleman, at the head of some militia, fell upon them, put them to rout, and drove them to their ships with considerable loss. But a small squadron of ten English ships had an opportunity of amply revenging this disgrace upon the French. The mareschal de Thermes, governor of Calais, had made an irruption into Flanders, with an army of fourteen thousand men; and having forced a passage over the river Aa, had taken Dunkirk, and Berg St. Winoc, and had advanced as far as Nieuport, but count Egmont coming upon him with superior forces, he was obliged to retreat; and being overtaken by the Spaniards near Gravelines, and finding a battle inevitable, he chose very skilfully his ground for the engagement. He fortified his left wing with great precaution; and posted his right along the river Aa, which he thought gave him full security from that quarter. But the English ships, which were accidentally on the coast, being drawn by the noise of the firing, sailed up the river, and flanking the French, did such execution by their artillery, that they put them to flight; and the Spaniards gained a complete victory.

Meanwhile the principal army of France, under the duke of Guise, and that of Spain, under the duke of Savoy, approached each other on the frontiers of Picardy; and as the two kings had come into their respective camps, attended by the flower of their nobility, men expected that some great and important event would follow from the emulation of these warlike nations. But Philip, though actuated by the ambition, possessed not the enterprizing genius of a conqueror; and he was willing, notwithstanding the superiority of his numbers, and the two great victories which he had gained at St. Quintin and Gravelines, to put a period to the war by treaty. Negociations were entered into for that purpose; and as the terms offered by the two monarchs were somewhat wide of each other, the armies were put into winter-quarters till the princes could come to better agreement. Among other conditions, Henry demanded the restitution of Navarre to its lawful owner; Philip that of Calais and its territory to England: but in the midst of these negociations, news arrived of the death of Mary; and Philip, no longer connected with England, began to relax in firmness on that article.

On the 5th of November the parliament of England re-assembled; and a subsidy was demanded for the defence of the realm against the French and Scots. This demand was not received by the commons with complacency; and some debates arose on the subject: but the queen's death put a stop to their deliberations. Her dejection of spirits accelerated the decay of her constitution. She found herself despised by a husband whom she most passionately loved; but, notwithstanding his want of affection for her, she did not hear, without strong feelings of regret, that he was on the point of repairing to his Spanish dominions, in which event she had no hope of seeing him more. She was conscious of her being an object of general odium among her subjects; and the dread of tumult and insurrection disturbed her repose. She lamented her precipitate embarkation in a war for her husband's interests, which had deprived her, to the extraordinary disgust of her people, of a small though valuable territory, possessed for two centuries by her progenitors. She repined, like a true bigot, at the progress of the Protestant opinions, and dreaded the attempts of her sister for the subversion of the Catholic faith. She was grieved at the depression of her finances, the loss of her credit, and the decline of that flourishing state in which her father had left the kingdom. These causes of uneasiness had a sinister effect on her health; and a very unhealthy autumn increased the distemperature of her frame. A dropsy had for some time harassed her; and this was at length accompanied with a fever, which put a period to her life and reign, on the 17th of November; in the forty-third year of the former, and the sixth of the latter. She was buried in Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster.

An accurate sketch of Mary's portrait, says Dr. Coote, will not tend to the honour of her memory. To panegyrize (in imitation of some Catholic writers) a princess whose character and conduct rendered her an object of detestation rather than of praise, would disgust the humane, and be an insult to the discerning reader.

In exterior attractions, she was remarkably deficient. Her features were harsh, her complexion coarse, and her figure

(z) The common net at that time, says sir Richard Baker, for catching of Protestants, was the doctrine of the real presence; and this net was used to catch the lady Elizabeth: for being asked one time, what she thought of the words of Christ, This is my body, whether she thought it the true body of Christ that was in the sacrament? It is said, that after some pausing, she thus answered:

" Christ was the word that spake it,
He took the bread and brake it;
And what the word did make it,
That I believe and take it."

Which, though it may seem but a slight expression, yet hath it more solidness than at first sight appears; at least, it served her turn at that time, to escape the net, which by direct answer she could not have done. Baker's Chronicle, p. 320.

figure inelegant. Her address was awkward, and her manner ungraceful. An air of haughty gravity supplied the place of true dignity of demeanour; and feminine softness was lost in imperious pride.

But if her person was unpleasing and even repulsive, her mind was still more disgusting. Her capacity indeed was not so despicable as her conduct would lead us to presume; she had made some progress in literature, and had acquired a competent knowledge of the language of ancient Rome; but her propensity to the superstition of modern Rome deformed all her attainments, vitiated her taste, and corrupted the fruits of genuine culture. Her judgement was too weak to permit her to discern the fallacy of the chief tenets of Popery; and her early prejudices were too strong to be removed by reason or philosophy. Her perverse obstinacy, and her want of enlarged notions, rendered her a bigot to the religion which she had first embraced; and the priests by whom the was misled confirmed her in her superstitious habits. Her bigotry gave strength to the passions by which she was actuated. It increased her pride, inflamed her vindictive spirit, heightened her malice, and stimulated the native violence of her temper. Her arrogant and arbitrary disposition prompted her to the exercise of tyranny and oppression; her constant suspicions operated to the ruin of many respectable individuals, whom she conceived to be able or willing to disturb her government; her bounty to the popish clergy hurried her into a series of illegal exactions; and her cruelty, heated by superstition, and animated by the vain hope of pleasing the God of mercy by human sacrifices, glutted its impious rage with the destruction of the innocent and the virtuous, whose only offence was the exercise of their common sense in renouncing the belief of transubstantiation and other doctrinal absurdities.

Mary did not shine as a politician. She was too narrow in her sentiments, and too confined in her knowledge, to be mistress of the art of government. She neither consulted the interests nor the dignity of the realm; she encouraged not the improvement of commerce and the arts; she depressed the exertions and obstructed the happiness of her subjects. All her political views centered in the gratification of her husband, to whose ambition she was ready to sacrifice the independence of her kingdom, the welfare of her people, and the rights of her family.

The virtues which she possessed were those of temperance, chastity, and regularity of life; but the vices of her composition greatly overbalanced the scanty portion of her merits; and we cannot, without breach of truth, represent her in a more favourable light than that of a despicable sovereign and an odious woman. The records of history abundantly prove, that she was a disgrace to the throne as well as to her sex (a).

CHAP. VII.

Miscellaneous Affairs.

There occur few general remarks, besides what have already been made in the course of our history of the reign of Mary, with regard to the general state of the kingdom. The naval power of England was then so inconsiderable, that, fourteen thousand pounds being ordered to be applied to the fleet, both for repairing and victualling it, it was computed that ten thousand pounds a-year would afterwards answer all necessary charges. The arbitrary proceedings of the queen above-mentioned, joined to many monopolies granted by this princess, as well as by her father, checked the growth of commerce; and so much the more, as all other princes in Europe either were not permitted, or did not find it necessary, to proceed in so tyrannical a manner. Acts of parliament, both in the last reign and in the beginning of the present, had laid the same impositions on the merchants of the still-yard as on other aliens: yet the queen, immediately after her marriage, complied with the solicitations of the emperor, and by right of her prerogative suspended those laws (b). Nobody in that age pretended to question this exercise of prerogative. The historians are entirely silent with regard to it; and it is only by the collection of public papers that it is handed down to us.

An absurd law had been made in the preceding reign, by which every one was prohibited from making cloth unless he had served an apprenticeship of seven years. The law was repealed in the first year of the queen; and this plain reason given, that it had occasioned the decay of the woollen manufactory, and had ruined several towns (c). It is strange that Edward's law should have been revived during the reign of Elizabeth; and still more strange that it should still subsist.

A passage to Archangel had been discovered by the English during the last reign; and a beneficial trade with Muscovy had been established. A solemn embassy was sent by the czar to queen Mary. The ambassadors were shipwrecked on the coast of Scotland; but being hospitably entertained there, they proceeded on the journey, and were received at London with great pomp and solemnity (d). This seems to have been the first intercourse which that empire had with any of the western potentates of Europe.

A law was passed in the reign of Mary (e), by which the number of horses, arms, and furniture, was fixed, which each person, according to the extent of his property, should be provided with for the defence of the kingdom. A man of a thousand pounds a-year, for instance, was obliged to maintain at his own charge six horses fit for demi-lances, of which three at least to be furnished with sufficient harness, steel saddles, and weapons proper for the demi-lances; and ten horses fit for light horsemen, with furniture and weapons proper for them: he was obliged to have forty corslets furnished; fifty almain revets, or, instead of them, forty coats of plate, corslets or brigandines furnished; forty pikes, thirty long bows, thirty sheafs of arrows, thirty steel caps or skulls, twenty black bills or halberts, twenty harquebuts, and twenty morions or sallets. We may remark, that a man of a thousand marks of stock was rated equal to one of two hundred pounds a-year: a proof that few or none at that time lived on their stock in money, and that great profits were made by the merchants in the course of trade. There is no class above a thousand pounds a-year.

We may form a notion of the little progress made in arts and refinement about this time from one circumstance: a man of no less a rank than the comptroller of Edward VI.'s household paid only thirty shillings a-year of our present money for his house in Channel Row (f): yet labour and provisions, and consequently houses, were only about a third of the present price. Erasmus ascribes the frequent plagues in England to the nastiness and dirt and slovenly habits among the people. "The floors," says he, "are commonly of clay, strewed with rushes, under which lies unmolested an ancient collection of beer, grease, fragments, bones, spittle, excrements of dogs and cats, and every thing that is nasty (g)."

Hollingshed, who lived in queen Elizabeth's reign, gives a very curious account of the plain, or rather rude way of living of the preceding generation. There scarcely was a chimney to the houses, even in considerable towns: the fire was kindled by the wall, and the smoke sought its way out at the roof, or door, or windows: the houses were nothing but watling plaistered over with clay: the people slept on straw pallets, and had a good round log under their head for a pillow; and almost all the furniture and utensils were of wood.

In this reign we find the first general law with regard to highways, which were appointed to be repaired by parish duty all over England (h).

In the reign of Henry the Seventh, several laws were enacted for the promotion of husbandry, by prohibitions against inclosures, and by regulations for keeping up farm houses; but they all proved ineffectual. The practice of depopulating the country, by abandoning tillage, and throwing the lands into pasture, which we have noticed in a former part of our History, still prevailed. By (a) Cardinal Pole had long been sickly, from an intermitting fever; and he died the same day with the queen, about sixteen hours after her. The benign character of this prelate, the modesty and humanity of his deportment, made him be universally beloved; insomuch, that in a nation where the most furious persecution was carried on, and where the most violent religious factions prevailed, entire justice, even by most of the reformers, has been done to his merit. The haughty pontiff, Paul IV. had entertained some prejudices against him: and when England declared war against Henry, the ally of that pope, he seized the opportunity of revenge; and revoking Pole's legatine commission, appointed in his room cardinal Peyto, an observantine frier and confessor to the queen. But Mary would never permit the new legate to act upon the commission; and Paul was afterwards obliged to restore cardinal Pole to his authority.

a law of Henry the Eighth, the king was entitled to half the rents of the land, where any farm houses were allowed to fall to decay: the reason of proprietors finding no profit in tillage, at this period, was probably the unskilfulness of husbandmen. The number of sheep allowed to be kept in one flock was restrained to two thousand; and the statute which enforced this regulation assigns as the motive, that one proprietor or farmer would keep a flock of twenty-four thousand. It is remarkable, that the parliament ascribed the increasing price of mutton to this increase of sheep; "because," said they, "the commodity being gotten into few hands, the price of it is raised at pleasure." This, however, might not be the cause; and although it gave opportunities for monopolizing, yet, perhaps, mutton advanced in price from the daily increase of money. A strong presumptive proof of the bad husbandry in that age is, that in the year 1554, an acre of good land was let for a shilling, or about eighteen pence of our present money; which is ten times cheaper than our average rent at present, though commodities were not above four times cheaper.

Notwithstanding the numerous laws for the prevention of such abuses, yet the increased demand for wool, both at home and abroad, increased the profits of pasturage, and caused whole estates to be laid waste by inclosures. The tenants, regarded as an useless burden, were expelled their habitations; even the cottagers, deprived of the commons on which they formerly fed their cattle, were reduced to misery; and a decay of people, as well as the diminution of the former plenty, was remarked in the kingdom.

Poetry continued to be cultivated with diligence, and not wholly without success in this age. John Skelton, who flourished in the reign of Henry the Seventh and Henry the Eighth, is applauded by Erasmus, as a classical scholar; and though the generality of his poems are polluted by obscene wit and low scurrility, yet his Elegiacs demonstrate that, had his taste not been vitiated by his propensity to the ridiculous, he might have shone among the first writers of Latin poetry in England at the general restoration of learning.

But Henry Howard, earl of Surrey, was a poet of a much superior cast. This accomplished nobleman led the way to many improvements in English poetry, by a happy imitation of Petrarch, and other Italian poets who had excelled in the pathos and propriety with which they painted the anxieties of love. His poems were in high reputation among his contemporaries, and continued, for many years, to receive the warmest commendations from various writers; though, in process of time, the greater part of them became antiquated and forgotten.

Another poet of this age was sir Thomas Wiat, the elder; whose poems are more distinguished by good sense, satire, and just observations of life, than by strength of imagination. Like Surrey, he was an imitator of Petrarch; but then his imitation betrayed a servility to which Surrey was a stranger. Sir Thomas Wiat appears in the most pleasing light, when he displays the felicity of retirement, and attacks the follies, vanities, and vices of a court: this he has done with the indignation of a philosopher, and the freedom and pleasantry of Horace.

John Heywood, commonly called the Epigrammatist, lived at this period: his epigrams, which are six hundred in number, display the gross vulgarity of our ancestors, both in writing and conversation. Heywood's best and most laboured performance is "The Spider and the Flie," which is a very long poem in the octavo stanza, and burlesque style; but he has blended the grave and comic passages so intimately together, that it is scarcely possible to tell when he means to be serious, and when to be witty.

Some idea of the literary character and taste of an age may be formed from the nature of its publications. The works printed during this period were extremely numerous; and among these, controversial treatises and devotional writings held a principal place. An astonishing number of law books also issued from the press. The first Abridgement of the Statutes appeared in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and it was speedily followed by other abridgements. Magna Charta was so often reprinted, that it might naturally be supposed the English, at this period, were extremely vigilant in the preservation of their liberties, did not the whole tenour of their conduct falsify the flattering appearance.

The Ecclesiastical History of the reigns of Edward the Sixth and Mary was so interwoven with the civil accounts, that it was deemed unnecessary to separate it.

CHAP. VIII.

ELIZABETH.

THE life of the princess Elizabeth had been exposed to great danger in the reign of her sister Mary, who hated her with such envenomed rancour, as before mentioned, that she was frequently inclined to put her to death, either on pretence of heresy or of treason. But Elizabeth, though sincerely attached to the Protestant faith, guarded against the malice of her Popish enemies by an outward conformity to the Romish mode of worship, and was even prevailed on, by the importunities of cardinal Pole, to profess herself a Catholic. And, to avoid the suspicion of being disaffected to the government of Mary, that she so studiously shunned all connexions with the malcontents, that no imputation of treason or sedition could be fixed upon her. Notwithstanding all her circumspection, Gardiner and the other leaders of the Popish faction might perhaps have succeeded in compassing her destruction, which they aimed at, had not her brother-in-law Philip interposed in her behalf, with a view of preventing the succession of the queen of Scots to the English throne.

Before Mary's decease, Elizabeth had completed the twenty-fifth year of her age; and having passed a great part of her time in study, she had acquired a degree of learning superior to the usual attainments of her sex, and had prepared herself by the cultivation of her mind, as far as she could without actual experience, for the exercise of her political duties. She was resident at the palace at Hatfield, in Hertfordshire, when she received the news of her sister's dissolution; and the nobility flocking to her with alacrity, she there held councils for several successive days, before she set out for her capital.

A parliament had been assembled some days previous to the death of Mary; and when that event was notified to them by Heathe, archbishop of York, who was then chancellor, scarcely a single expression of regret was uttered for the loss of a princess who had possessed, in an eminent degree, the unfortunate talent of incurring universal detestation: on the contrary, both houses immediately resounded with the joyful acclamations of "God save Queen Elizabeth! May her reign prove long and happy!" The people, less actuated by faction, and less influenced by private views, expressed a joy still more general and hearty on her proclamation; and the auspicious commencement of this reign prognosticated that felicity and glory which, during its whole course, so uniformly attended it.

On Elizabeth's coming to London she made her entrance into the Tower; but the contrast between her present situation and that to which she had been reduced some years before, when she was conducted to the same place as a state-criminal, struck her so forcibly, that she fell on her knees, and returned her most grateful thanks to the Supreme Being for his divine interposition in delivering her from the persecution of her enemies: a deliverance, she said, no less miraculous than that which Daniel had received from the den of lions. Those pure sentiments of religion which inspire us with a just sense of gratitude to our Creator, never fail to fill the bosom they inhabit with charity to mankind. With a prudence and magnanimity truly laudable, she buried all offences in oblivion, and received with affability even those who had acted with the greatest malevolence against her. Sir Harry Bennifield himself, to whose custody she had been committed, and who had treated her with unbecoming severity, never experienced, during the whole course of her reign, any effects of her resentment. Yet was not the gracious reception which she gave prostitute and undistinguishing: for though she had courage to forgive, she had sense to discriminate: she therefore made a distinction between those who had only persecuted herself, and such as had persecuted the nation. When the bishops came in a body to make their obeisance to her, she expressed to all of them sentiments of regard, except to Bonner, from whom she turned aside, as from a man polluted with blood, who was a just object of horror to every heart susceptible of humanity.

After arranging her domestic affairs, Elizabeth notified to foreign courts, her sister's death, and her own accession. She sent lord Cobham to the Low Countries, where Philip then resided; and took care to express to that monarch, her gratitude for the protection which he had afforded her, and her earnest desire of persevering in that friendship which had so happily subsisted between them. But the crafty and politic Philip, who was never known to do an act of apparent generosity without some interested object in view, had long foreseen this event, and still hoped, by means of Elizabeth, to obtain that dominion over England, of which he had failed in espousing Mary, immediately dispatched orders to the duke of Feria, his ambassador at London, to make proposals of marriage to the queen; and he offered to procure from Rome a dispensation for that purpose. But Elizabeth soon came to the resolution of declining the proposal. She knew that the nation had entertained an extreme aversion to the Spanish alliance during her sister's reign; and that one great cause of the popularity which she now enjoyed, was the firm hopes which the people entertained of being completely freed, by her means, from the danger of foreign subjection. She was sensible, that her affinity with Philip would have been exactly similar to that of her father with Catherine of Arragon; and that her marrying with that monarch would be equivalent to a declaration of her own illegitimacy, and consequent incapacity of succeeding to the throne. And, though the power of the Spanish monarchy might still be sufficient, in opposition to all pretenders, to support her title, her spirit disdained such precarious dominion, which, as it would depend solely on the power of another, must be exercised according to his inclinations. But, while these views prevented her from entertaining any thoughts of a marriage with Philip, she gave him an obliging, though evasive, answer; and he still retained such hopes of success, that he sent a messenger to Rome, with orders to solicit the dispensation.

The queen too, on her sister's death, had written to sir Edward Carne, the English ambassador at Rome, requesting him to notify her accession to the pope; but the pride and temerity of Paul the Fourth compelled the young princess to the adoption of other measures than those which her prudence and caution led her to embrace. That haughty pontiff told Carne, that England was a fief of the holy see; and it was great temerity in Elizabeth to have dared to assume, without his participation, the title and authority of queen: that being illegitimate, she could not possibly inherit that kingdom; nor could he annul the sentence pronounced by Clement VII. and Paul III. with regard to Henry's marriage: that were he to proceed with rigour, he should punish this criminal invasion of his rights by rejecting all her applications; but, being willing to treat her with paternal indulgence, he would still keep the door of grace open to her; and that, if she would renounce all pretensions to the crown, and submit entirely to his will, she should experience the utmost lenity compatible with the dignity of the apostolic see. When this answer was reported to Elizabeth, she could not refrain from expressing her astonishment at the insolence of that aged pontiff; and, having recalled her ambassador, she continued with more determined resolution to pursue, unawed by the impotent menaces of an upstart priest, such measures as she deemed more conducive to the welfare and interests of the nation.

The queen, not to alarm the partizans of the catholic religion, had retained eleven of her sister's counsellors (i); but, in order to balance their authority, she added eight more, who were known to be inclined to the Protestant communion (k). With these counsellors, particularly sir William Cecil, she frequently deliberated concerning the expediency of restoring the Protestant religion, and the means of executing that important enterprize. Cecil told her, "that the greater part of the nation had, ever since her father's reign, inclined to the Reformation; and, though her sister had constrained them to profess the Catholic faith, the cruelties exercised by her ministers had still more alienated their affections from it: that happily the interests of the sovereign here concurred with the inclinations of the people; nor was her title to the crown compatible with the authority of the Roman pontiff: that a sentence, so solemnly pronounced by two popes against her mother's marriage, could not possibly be recalled, without inflicting a mortal wound on the credit of the see of Rome; and even, if she were allowed to retain the crown, it would only be on an uncertain and dependent footing: that this circumstance alone counterbalanced all dangers whatsoever; and these dangers themselves, if narrowly examined, would be found very little formidable: that the curses and execrations of the Romish church, when not seconded by military force, were, in the present age, more an object of ridicule than of terror, and had now as little influence in this world as in the next: that though the bigotry or ambition of Henry or Philip might incline them to execute a sentence of excommunication against her, their interests were so incompatible, that they never could concur in any plan of operations; and the enmity of the one would always ensure to her the friendship of the other: that if they encouraged the discontents of her Catholic subjects, their dominions also abounded with Protestants, and it would be easy to retaliate upon them: that even such of the English as seemed at present zealously attached to the Catholic faith, would, most of them, embrace the religion of their new sovereign; and the nation had of late been so much accustomed to these revolutions, that men had lost all idea of truth and falsehood in such subjects: that the authority of Henry VIII. so highly raised by many concurring circumstances, first inured the people to this submissive deference; and it was the less difficult for succeeding princes to continue the nation in a track to which it had so long been accustomed; and that it would be easy for her, by bestowing on Protestants all preferment in civil offices and the militia, the church and the universities, both to ensure her own authority, and to render her religion entirely predominant.

Elizabeth's education, as well as her interest, led her to favour the Reformation; and she remained not long in suspense with regard to the party which she should embrace. But though determined in her own mind, she prudently resolved to avoid the errors of her sister, and to proceed by gradual and secure steps, and not to encourage the bigots of her own party to make immediately a violent invasion on the established religion. She deemed it requisite, however, to discover such symptoms of her intentions, as might give encouragement to the Protestants, so much depressed by the late sanguinary persecutions. She immediately recalled all the exiles, and gave liberty to the prisoners who were confined on account of religion (l).

In pursuance of that prudent system of moderation which she had adopted, Elizabeth proceeded to exert, in favour of the Reformers, some acts of power which were authorized by the extent of royal prerogative during that age. Finding that the Protestant teachers, irritated by persecution, broke out in a furious attack on the Catholic superstition, and that the Romanists replied with no less zeal and acrimony, she published a proclamation, by which she inhibited all preaching without a special license; and though she dispensed with these orders in favour of some preachers of her own sect, she took care that they should be the most calm and moderate of the party. She also suspended the laws so far as to order a great part of the service, the litany, the Lord's prayer, the creed, and the gospels, to be read in English. And, having first published injunctions that all the churches should conform themselves to the practice of her own chapel, she forbade the host to be any more elevated in her presence; an innovation which, however frivolous it may appear, implied the most material consequences.

The declarations of her intentions, concurring with preceding suspicions, made the bishops foresee, with certainty, that a revolution in religion would now take place. They therefore refused to officiate at her coronation (m); and it was with some difficulty that Oglethorp, bishop of Carlisle, was at last prevailed on to perform the

(i) These were, Heathe, archbishop of York; William Paulet, marquis of Winchester and lord high treasurer; Henry Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel; Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury; Edward Stanley, earl of Derby; William Herbert, earl of Pembroke; Edmund Fynes, baron of Clinton and lord high admiral; William Lord Howard, of Effingham, lord chamberlain; sir Thomas Cheney, sir William Petre, sir John Mason, sir Richard Sacville, and Dr. Wotton, dean of Canterbury; who were all reputed zealous Catholics: but we may observe, that the queen was not afraid of their compliance with her intended reformation in the church, who had complied with all the changes of religion, backward and forward, since the latter end of king Henry the Eighth's reign; and done it so artfully, as in all those revolutions to be constantly employed.

(k) These were, William Parr, marquis of Northampton; Francis Russel, earl of Bedford; sir Thomas Parry, sir Edward Rogers, sir Ambrose Cave, sir Francis Knolles, sir Nicholas Bacon, whom she created lord keeper, and sir William Cecil, secretary of state.

(l) We are told of a pleasantry of one Rainsford on this occasion, who said to the queen, that he had a petition to present to her in behalf of some other prisoners called Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John: she readily replied, that it behoved her first to consult the prisoners themselves, and to learn of them whether they desired that liberty which he demanded for them. Heylin, p. 103.

(m) As the see of Canterbury was vacant by the death of cardinal Pole, the office of performing the ceremony belonged to the archbishop of York; but Heathe was so disgusted at Elizabeth's admitting Protestants into her council, &c. that he refused to officiate at the solemnity.

ceremony. When she was conducted through the streets of London, amidst the joyful acclamations of her subjects, a boy, who personated Truth, was let down from one of the triumphal arches, and presented to her a copy of the Bible; which she received with the most gracious deportment; placed it next her bosom; and declared, that, amidst all the costly testimonies which the city had that day given her of their attachment, this present was by far the most precious and most acceptable. Such were the innocent artifices by which the youthful princess insinuated herself into the affections of her subjects. Open in her address, gracious and affable in all public appearances, she rejoiced in the concourse of her subjects, entered into all their pleasures and amusements; and, without departing from her dignity, which she knew well how to preserve, she acquired a popularity beyond what any of her predecessors or successors ever could attain. Her own sex exulted to see a woman hold the reins of empire with such prudence and fortitude: and while a young princess of twenty-five years of age, who possessed all the graces and insinuation, though not all the beauty of her sex, courted the affections of individuals by her civilities, of the public by her services, her authority, though corroborated by the strictest bands of law and religion, appeared to be derived entirely from the choice and inclination of the people.

A sovereign possessed of such a disposition was not likely to offend her subjects by any useless or violent exertions of power; and Elizabeth, though she threw out such hints as encouraged the Protestants, delayed the change of religion till the meeting of the parliament, which was summoned to assemble on the 25th of January, 1559. The elections had gone entirely against the Catholics, who seem not indeed to have made any great struggle for the superiority (n); and the houses met, in a disposition of gratifying the queen in every particular which she could desire of them. They began the session with an unanimous declaration, "that queen Elizabeth was, and ought to be, as well by the word of God, as the common and statute laws of the realm, the lawful, undoubted, and true heir to the crown, lawfully descended from the blood-royal, according to the order of succession settled in the 35th of Henry VIII. (o)" This act of recognition was probably dictated by the queen herself and her ministers; and she shewed her magnanimity, as well as moderation, in the terms which she employed on that occasion. She did not follow the example of her sister Mary, in declaring the validity of her mother's marriage, or in expressly repealing the act formerly made against her own legitimacy: she knew that this attempt must be attended with reflections on her father's memory, and on the birth of her deceased sister; and as all the world was sensible, that Henry's divorce from Anne Boleyn was merely the effect of his usual violence and caprice, she scorned to found her title on any act of an assembly which had too much prostituted its authority by its former variable, servile, and iniquitous decisions. Satisfied therefore in the general opinion entertained with regard to this fact, which appeared the more undoubted, the less anxiety she discovered in fortifying it by votes and enquiries; she took possession of the throne, both as her birthright, and as ensured to her by former acts of parliament; and she never appeared anxious to distinguish these titles.

The first bill brought into parliament, with a view of trying their disposition on the head of religion, was that for suppressing the monasteries lately erected, and for restoring the tenths and first-fruits to the queen. This point being gained with much difficulty, a bill was next introduced, annexing the supremacy to the crown; and though the queen was there denominated governess, not head, of the church, it conveyed the same extensive power, which, under the latter title, had been exercised by her father and brother. All the bishops who were present in the upper house strenuously opposed this law; and by dint of their superior learning over the temporal peers, they had the advantage in the course of the debate; but their advantage extended no farther, for the majority of voices in that house, as well as among the commons, was decidedly against them (p). Their proceedings indeed were not only consistent with absolute monarchy; but were entirely suitable to the genius of the act on which they were established; an act that at once gave the crown alone all the power which had formerly been claimed by the popes, but which even these usurping prelates had never been able fully to exercise, without some concurrence of the national clergy.

Whoever refused to take an oath, acknowledging the queen's supremacy, was incapacitated from holding any office; whoever denied the supremacy, or attempted to deprive the queen of that prerogative, forfeited, for the first offence, all his goods and chattels; for the second, was subjected to the penalty of a premunire; but the third offence was declared treason. These punishments, however severe, were less rigorous than those which were formerly, during the reigns of her father and brother, inflicted in similar cases.

A law was passed, confirming all the statutes enacted in king Edward's time with regard to religion (q): the nomination of bishops was given to the crown without any election of the chapters: the queen was empowered, on the vacancy of any see, to seize all the temporalities, and to bestow on the bishop-elect an equivalent in the impropriations belonging to the crown. This pretended equivalent was commonly much inferior in value; and thus the queen, amidst all her concern for religion, followed the example of the preceding Reformers, in committing depredations on the ecclesiastical revenues.

The bishops and all incumbents were prohibited from alienating their revenues, and from granting leases longer than twenty-one years or three lives. This law seemed to be intended as a security for the property of the church; but as an exception was left in favour of the crown, great abuses still prevailed. It was usual for the courtiers during this reign to make an agreement with a bishop or incumbent, and to procure a fictitious alienation to the queen, who afterwards transferred the lands to the person agreed on. This method of pillaging the church was not remedied till the beginning of the reign of James I. The present depression of the clergy exposed them to all injuries; and the laity never stopped, till they had reduced the church to such poverty, that her plunder was no longer a compensation for the odium incurred by it.

A solemn and public disputation was held during this session, in presence of Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper, between the divines of the Protestant and those of the Catholic communion. The champions, appointed to defend the religion of the sovereign, were, as in all former instances, completely triumphant; and the popish disputants, being pronounced refractory and obstinate, were even punished by imprisonment. Emboldened by this victory, the Protestants ventured on the last and most important step, and brought into parliament a bill (r) for abolishing the mass, and re-establishing the liturgy of king Edward. Penalties were enacted, as well against those who departed from this mode of worship, as against those who absented themselves from the church and the sacraments. And thus in one session, without any violence, tumult, or clamour, was the whole system of religion altered, on the very commencement of a reign, and by the will of a young woman, whose title to the crown was by many thought liable to great objections: an event which, though it may appear surprizing to men in the present age, was every where expected on the first intelligence of Elizabeth's accession.

(n) Notwithstanding the bias of the nation towards the Protestant sect, it appears, that some violence was used in these elections: five candidates were nominated by the court to each borough and three to each county; and, by the sheriff's authority, the members were chosen from among these candidates. See State Papers collected by Edward earl of Clarendon, p. 92. We must not, however, judge of this violent exertion of power according to our present ideas; but should recollect, that the royal prerogative was, at this time, imperfectly defined; and had, indeed, been long too successfully opposed to those feeble barriers which the laws had raised up against the incroachments of the crown.

(o) 1 Elizabeth, cap. 3.

(p) By this act the crown, without the concurrence either of the parliament, or even of the convocation, was vested with the whole spiritual power; might repress all heresies, might establish or repeal all canons, might alter every point of discipline, and might ordain or abolish any religious rite or ceremony. 1 Eliz. cap. 1. This last power was anew recognized in the act of uniformity, 1 Eliz. cap. 2. In determining heresy, the sovereign was only limited to such doctrines as had been adjudged heresy, by the authority of the Scripture, by the first four general councils, or by any general council which followed the Scripture as their rule, or to such other doctrines as should hereafter be denominated heresy by the parliament and convocation. In order to exercise this authority, the queen, by a clause of the act, was empowered to name commissioners, either laymen or clergymen, as she should think proper; and on this clause was afterwards founded the court of ecclesiastical commission; which assumed large discretionary, not to say arbitrary powers, totally incompatible with any exact boundaries in the constitution.

This session the commons made a sacrifice to the queen, more difficult to obtain than that of any articles of faith: they voted her a subsidy of four shillings in the pound on land, and two shillings and eight pence on moveables, together with two fifteenths. The house in no instance departed from the most respectful deference and complaisance towards the queen. Even the importunate address which they made her on the conclusion of the session, to fix her choice of a husband, could not, they supposed, be very disagreeable to one of her sex and age. The address was couched in the most respectful expressions; yet met with a refusal from the queen (s).

On the prorogation of the parliament (t), May 8, 1559, the laws enacted with regard to religion were put in execution, and met with little opposition from any quarter. The liturgy was again introduced in the vulgar tongue, and the oath of supremacy was tendered to the clergy. The number of bishops had been reduced to fourteen by a sickly season, which preceded; and all these, except the bishop of Llandaff, having refused compliance, were degraded from their sees: but of the inferior clergy throughout all England, where there are near ten thousand parishes, only eighty rectors and vicars, fifty prebendaries, fifteen heads of colleges, twelve archdeacons, and as many deans, sacrificed their livings to their religious principles. Those in high ecclesiastical stations, being exposed to the eyes of the public, seem chiefly to have placed a point of honour in their perseverance; but on the whole, the Protestants, in the former change introduced by Mary, appear to have been much more rigid and conscientious (u).

The rites and ceremonies still preserved in the English liturgy, bearing some resemblance to the ancient service, tended in some measure to reconcile the Catholics to the established religion; and as the queen permitted no other mode of worship, and at the same time struck out every thing that could be offensive to them in the new liturgy, even those who were addicted to the Romish communion made no scruple of attending the established church. Had Elizabeth gratified her own inclinations, the exterior appearance, which is the chief circumstance with the people, would have been still more similar between the new and the ancient form of worship. Her love of state and magnificence, which she affected in every thing, inspired her with an inclination towards the pomp of the Catholic religion; and it was merely in compliance with the prejudices of her party, that she gave up either images or the addresses to saints, or prayers for the dead. Some foreign princes interposed to procure the Romanists the privilege of separate assemblies in particular cities, but the queen would not comply with their request; and she represented the manifest danger of disturbing the national peace by a toleration of different religions.

While the queen and parliament were employed in settling the public religion, the negociations for a peace with France were still conducted, first at the abbey of Cercamp, then at Chateau-Cambresis, between the ministers of France, Spain, and England; and Elizabeth, though equally prudent, was not equally successful in this transaction. Nothing indeed retarded its conclusion but the determined obstinacy of the French commissioners in refusing to restore Calais to the queen; who, on the other hand, declared that she would not listen to a peace, unless the restitution of that important place was agreed on as a preliminary article. Philip employed his utmost efforts to procure the restitution of Calais, both as bound in honour to indemnify England, which, merely on his account, had been drawn into the war, and as engaged in interest to remove France to a distance from his frontiers in the Low Countries.

Though all his own terms with France were settled, he seemed willing to continue the war till she should obtain satisfaction; provided she would stipulate to adhere to the Spanish alliance, and continue hostilities against Henry during the course of six years: but Elizabeth, after consulting with her ministers, wisely rejected this proposal. She was sensible of the low state of her finances; the great debts contracted by her father, brother, and sister; the disorders introduced into every part of the administration; the divisions by which her people were agitated; and she was convinced that nothing but tranquillity during some years could bring the kingdom again into a flourishing condition, or enable her to act with dignity and vigour in her transactions with foreign nations. Well acquainted with the value which Henry justly put upon Calais, and the impossibility, during the present emergency, of recovering it by treaty, she was willing rather to suffer that loss, than submit to such a dependence on Spain, as she must expect to fall into, if she continued pertinaciously in her present demand. So long as Philip entertained hopes of espousing the queen, he continued his efforts, and refused to conclude a peace with Henry; but, by Elizabeth's recent regulations with regard to religion having at length convinced him of the fallacy of his hopes, his zeal began to abate. She ordered, therefore, her ambassadors, lord Effingham, the bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton, to conclude the negociation, and to settle a peace with Henry, on any reasonable terms. Henry offered to stipulate a marriage between the eldest daughter of the dauphin, and the eldest son of Elizabeth; and to engage for the restitution of Calais as the dowry of that princess; but as the queen was sensible that this treaty would appear to the world a palpable evasion, she insisted upon more equitable, at least more plausible conditions. It was at last agreed, that Henry should restore Calais at the expiration of eight years; that, in case of failure, he should pay five hundred thousand crowns, and the queen's title to Calais still remain; that he should find the security of seven or eight foreign merchants, not natives of France, for the payment of this sum; that he should deliver five hostages till that security were provided; that if Elizabeth broke the peace with France or Scotland during the interval, she should forfeit all title to Calais; but if Henry made war on Elizabeth, he should be obliged immediately to restore that fortress. It was easy to perceive that these stipulations were nothing but a colourable pretence for abandoning Calais; but they excused the queen on account of the necessity of her affairs; and they even extolled her prudence, in submitting, without farther struggle, to that necessity. A peace with Scotland was a necessary consequence of that with France.

The peace concluded between Philip and Henry was highly advantageous to the former, who recovered all the places which the French generals had taken during the war; and, besides securing very beneficial terms for his allies, acquired to himself the sovereignty of the county of Charolois. This treaty was strengthened by a double marriage: Philip espoused the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter to the king of France, formerly betrothed to his son, Don Carlos. The duke of Savoy married Margaret, Henry's sister, and obtained a restitution of all his domi-

(s) She told the speaker, that, as the application from the house was conceived in general terms, only recommending marriage, without pretending to direct her choice of a husband, she could not take offence at the address, or regard it otherwise than as a new instance of their affectionate attachment to her: that any farther interposition on their part would have ill become either them to make as subjects, or her to bear as an independent princess: that even while she was a private person, and exposed to much danger, she had always declined that engagement, which she regarded as an incumbrance; much more, at present, would she persevere in this sentiment, when the charge of a great kingdom was committed to her, and her life ought to be entirely devoted to promoting the interests of religion and the happiness of her subjects: that as England was her husband, wedded to her by this pledge (and here she shewed her finger with the same gold ring upon it, with which she had solemnly betrothed herself to the kingdom at her inauguration), so all Englishmen were her children; and while she was employed in rearing or governing such a family, she could not deem herself barren, or her life useless and unprofitable: that if she ever entertained thoughts of changing her condition, the care of her subjects' welfare would still be uppermost in her thoughts; but should she live and die a virgin, she doubted not but divine Providence, seconded by their counsels and her own measures, would be able to prevent all dispute with regard to the succession, and secure them a sovereign, who, perhaps better than her own issue, would imitate her example in loving and cherishing her people: and that, for her part, she desired that no higher character or fairer remembrance of her should be transmitted to posterity, than to have this inscription engraved on her tomb-stone, when she should pay the last debt to nature: "Here lies Elizabeth, who lived and died a virgin."

(t) It is thought remarkable by Camden, that though this session was the first of the reign, no person was attainted; but, on the contrary, some restored in blood by the parliament: a good symptom of the lenity, at least of the prudence, of the queen's government; and that it should appear remarkable, is a proof of the rigour of preceding reigns.

(u) Though the Catholic religion, adapting itself to the senses, and enjoining observances which enter into the common train of life, does at present lay faster hold on the mind than the reformed, which, being chiefly spiritual, resembles more a system of metaphysics; yet was the proportion of zeal, as well as of knowledge, during the first ages after the reformation, much greater on the side of the Protestants. The Catholics continued, ignorantly and supinely, in their ancient belief, or rather their ancient practices: but the Reformers, obliged to dispute on every occasion, and enflamed to a degree of enthusiasm by novelty and persecution, had strongly attached themselves to their tenets; and were ready to sacrifice their fortunes, and even their lives, in support of their principles.

nions of Savoy, Piedmont, and Busse, except a few towns retained by France. And thus general tranquillity seemed to be restored to Europe.

But though peace was concluded between France and England, there soon appeared a ground of quarrel, of the most serious nature, and which was afterwards attended with the most important consequences. The two marriages of Henry VIII. that with Catherine of Arragon, and that with Anne Boleyn, were incompatible with each other; and it seemed impossible, that both of them could be regarded as valid and legal: but still the birth of Elizabeth lay under some disadvantages, to which that of her sister, Mary, was not exposed. Henry's first marriage had obtained the sanction of all the powers, both civil and ecclesiastical, which were then acknowledged in England; and it was natural for Protestants, as well as Catholics, to allow, on account of the sincere intention of the parties, that their issue ought to be regarded as legitimate. But his divorce and second marriage had been concluded in direct opposition to the see of Rome; and though they had been ratified by the authority both of the English parliament and convocation, those who were strongly attached to the Catholic communion, and who reasoned with great strictness, were led to regard them as entirely invalid, and to deny altogether the queen's right of succession (v). Elizabeth, alarmed at the danger, conceived a violent jealousy against the queen of Scots; and was determined, as far as possible, to incapacitate Henry from the execution of his project. The sudden death of that monarch, who was killed in a tournament at Paris, while celebrating the espousals of his sister with the duke of Savoy, altered not her views. Being informed that his successor, Francis II. still continued to assume, without reserve, the title of king of England, she began to consider him and his queen as her greatest enemies; and the present situation of affairs in Scotland afforded her a favourable opportunity, not only of revenging the injury, but of providing for her own future safety.

The murder of cardinal Beaton, at St. Andrews, had deprived the Scottish Catholics of a head, whose severity had rendered him extremely formidable to the innovators in religion; and the execution of the laws against heresy began thenceforth to be more remiss. The queen-regent governed the kingdom with prudence and moderation; and as she was not disposed to sacrifice the civil interests of the state to the bigotry or interests of the clergy, she deemed it more expedient to temporize, and to connive at the progress of a doctrine which she had not power to repress. When informed of the death of Edward, and the accession of Mary to the English throne, she entertained hopes, that the Scottish reformers, deprived of the countenance which they received from that powerful kingdom, would lose their ardour with their prospect of success, and would gradually return to the faith of their ancestors: but herein she was disappointed; for many of the English preachers, terrified with the severity of Mary's government, took shelter in Scotland, where they found more protection, and a milder administration, and while they propagated their theological tenets, they filled the whole kingdom with a just horror against the cruelties of the bigoted Catholics, and showed their disciples the fate which they must expect, if ever their adversaries should attain an uncontrolled authority over them.

A hierarchy, moderate in its acquisitions of power and riches, may safely grant a toleration to sectaries; and the more it softens the zeal of innovators by lenity and liberty, the more securely will it possess those advantages which the legal establishments bestow upon it. But where superstition has raised a church to such an exorbitant height as that of Rome, persecution is less the result of bigotry in the priests, than of a temporising policy; and the rigour of law is the only method of repelling the attacks of men, who, besides religious zeal, have so many other motives, derived both from public and private interest, to engage them on the side of innovation. But though such overgrown hierarchies may long support themselves by such violent expedients, the time generally arrives when severities tend only to enrage the new sectaries, and make them break through all bounds of reason and moderation. This crisis was now visibly approaching in Scotland; and those who consider merely the transactions resulting from it, will be inclined to throw the blame equally on both parties; whoever enlarges his view, and reflects on the situations, will remark the necessary progress of human affairs, and the operation of those principles which are inherent in the breasts of mankind in general.

Some heads of the reformers in Scotland, such as the earl of Argyle, his son lord Lorne, the earls of Morton and Glencairne, Erskine of Dun, and others, observing the danger to which they were exposed, and desirous to propagate their principles, entered privately into a bond or association; and called themselves the Congregation of the Lord, in contradistinction to the established church, which they denominated the Congregation of Satan (w). Had the subscribers of this zealous league been temperate in their measures, and content only to demand a toleration of the new opinions; however incompatible their pretensions might have been with the policy of the church of Rome, they would have had the praise of opposing tyrannical laws, enacted to support an establishment prejudicial to civil society: but it is evident that they did not mean to confine themselves within moderate bounds; and their practice immediately discovered the spirit by which they were actuated. Supported by the authority which they thought belonged to them as the congregation of the Lord, they ordained, that prayers in the vulgar tongue (x) should be used in all the parish churches of the kingdom; and that preaching, and the interpretation of the scriptures, should be practised in private houses, till God should move the prince to grant public preaching by faithful and true ministers. Such bonds of association are wholly inconsistent with every principle of civil government; and this violent invasion of the established religion was the actual commencement of rebellion.

Before this league was publicly known or avowed, the clergy, alarmed at the progress of the reformation, attempted to recover their lost authority by a violent exercise of power, which tended still farther to augment the zeal and number of their enemies. Hamilton, the primate, seized Walter Mill, a priest of an irreproachable life, who had embraced the new doctrines; and having tried him at St. Andrews, condemned him to the flames for heresy. The cruelty of this impolitic measure excited such general aversion, that it was some time before the bishops could prevail on any one to act the part of a civil judge, and pronounce sentence upon Mill; and even after the time of his execution was fixed, all the shops of St. Andrews being shut, no one would sell a rope to tie him to the stake, and the primate himself was obliged to furnish this implement. The man bore the torture with that courage which, though usual on these occasions, always appears supernatural and astonishing to the multitude. The people, to express their abhorrence against the cruelty of the priests, raised a monument of stones on the place of his execution; and as fast as the stones were removed by order of the clergy, they were again supplied from the voluntary zeal of the populace. The impolicy, as well as inutility, of thus punishing a man for pursuing the dictates of his conscience, being now rendered manifest, by the united motives of religion and public applause, this was the last barbarity of the kind which the Catholics had the power to exercise in Scotland.

(v) The next heir of blood, says Hume, was the queen of Scots, now married to the dauphin; and the great power of that princess, joined to her plausible title, rendered her a formidable rival to Elizabeth. The king of France had secretly been soliciting at Rome a bull of excommunication against the queen; and she had here been beholden to the good offices of Philip, who, from interest more than either friendship or generosity, had negociated in her favour, and had successfully opposed the pretensions of Henry. But the court of France was not discouraged with this repulse: the duke of Guise, and his brothers, thinking that it would much augment their credit if their niece should bring an accession of England, as she had already done of Scotland, to the crown of France, engaged the king not to neglect the claim; and, by their persuasion, he ordered his son and daughter-in-law to assume openly the arms as well as title of England, and to quarter these arms on all their equipages, furniture, and liveries. When the English ambassador complained of this injury, he could obtain nothing but an evasive answer; that as the queen of Scots was descended from the blood royal of England, she was entitled, by the example of many princes, to assume the arms of that kingdom. But besides that this practice had never prevailed without permission being first obtained, and without making a visible difference between the arms, Elizabeth plainly saw, that this pretension had not been advanced during the reign of her sister Mary; and that therefore the king of France intended, on the first opportunity, to dispute her legitimacy, and her title to the crown.

(w) The tenour of the bond was as follows: "We perceiving how Satan, in his members, the antichrist of our time, do cruelly rage, seeking to overthrow and to destroy the gospel of Christ and his congregation, ought, according to our bounden duty, to strive, in our Master's cause, even unto the death, being certain of the victory in him. We do therefore promise, before the majesty of God and his congregation, that we, by his grace, shall with all diligence continually apply our whole power, substance, and our very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the most blessed word of God and his congregation; and shall labour, by all possible means, to have faithful ministers, truly and purely to minister Christ's gospel and sacraments to his people: we shall maintain them, nourish them, and defend them, the whole congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, by our whole power, and at the hazard of our lives, against Satan, and all wicked power, who may intend tyranny and trouble against the said congregation; unto which holy word and congregation we do join ourselves; and we forsake and renounce the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitious abomination and idolatry thereof; and moreover shall declare ourselves manifestly enemies thereto, by this faithful promise before God, testified to this congregation by our subscriptions. At Edinburgh, the third of December, 1557." Keith, p. 66. Knox, p. 101.

Some time after, the people discovered their sentiments in such a manner as was sufficient to prognosticate to the priests the fate which awaited them. It was usual on the festival of St. Giles, the tutelar saint of Edinburgh, to carry in procession the image of that saint; but the Protestants, in order to prevent the ceremony, found means, on the eve of the festival, to purloin the statue from the church; and they pleased themselves with anticipating the surprize and disappointment of his votaries. The clergy, however, framed hastily a new image, which, in derision, was called by the people young St. Giles; and they carried it through the streets, attended by all the ecclesiastics in the town and neighbourhood. The multitude abstained from violence so long as the queen-regent continued a spectator, but the moment she retired, they attacked the idol, threw it in the mire, and broke it in pieces. The flight and terror of the priests and friers, who, it was remarked, deserted in his greatest distress the object of their worship, was the source of universal laughter and mockery.

Encouraged by all these appearances, the Congregation proceeded to solicit subscriptions to their league; and the death of Mary of England, with the accession of Elizabeth, which happened about this time, contributed to increase their hopes of ultimate success in their undertaking. They presented a petition to the regent, craving a reformation of the church, and of the wicked, scandalous, and detestable lives of the prelates and ecclesiastics. They framed a petition, which they intended to present to parliament, and in which, after premising that they could not communicate with the damnable idolatry and intolerable abuses of the papistical church, they desired, that the laws against heretics should be executed by the civil magistrate alone, and that the scripture should be the sole rule in judging of heresy. They even petitioned the convocation, and insisted that prayers should be said in the vulgar tongue, and that bishops should be chosen with the consent of the gentry of the diocese, and priests with the consent of the parishioners. The regent prudently temporized between the parties; and was unwilling to proceed to extremities with either of the contenders.

After this concession was obtained, she received instructions from France to proceed with rigour against the reformers, and to restore the royal authority by some signal act of power. The members, surprized at her conduct, reminded her, in another address, of the promise she had given them; but, deaf to their remonstrance, and incensed at their late presumption, she so far forgot the respect which she owed to herself, as to tell them, according to Spotswood, "That the promises of princes should always be rendered subservient to their convenience."— "If," answered they coolly, "you have adopted the resolution of violating the promises which you made to your subjects, we can no longer acknowledge your authority, nor pay you obedience." The firmness of this answer surprized the regent, who immediately checked her indignation; and replied, that she would endeavour to choose the mildest remedy for those evils, which she foresaw would speedily occur. But still she deemed it necessary to repress the progress of the Reformers; and she caused the more eminent of the Protestant teachers to be cited to appear before the council at Stirling; but when their followers were marching thither in great multitudes, in order to protect and countenance them, she entertained apprehensions of an insurrection, and, it is said, dissipated the people by a promise, that nothing should be done to the prejudice of the ministers. Sentence, however, was passed, by which all the ministers were pronounced rebels, on account of their not appearing: a measure which enraged the people, and made them resolve to oppose the regent's authority by force of arms, and to proceed to extremities against the clergy of the established religion.

About this time, John Knox arrived from Geneva, where he had passed some years in banishment, and where he had imbibed, from his commerce with Calvin, the religious opinions of that celebrated reformer. He had been invited back to Scotland by the leaders of the reformation; and mounting the pulpit at Perth, on the 11th of May, he declaimed with vehemence against the idolatry and abominations of the church of Rome, and incited his audience to exert their utmost zeal for its subversion. After this sermon, a priest was so imprudent as to open his repository of images and reliques, and prepare himself to say mass. The audience, exalted to a disposition for any furious enterprize, were as much enraged as if the spectacle had not been quite familiar to them: they attacked the priest with fury, broke the images in pieces, tore the pictures, overthrew the altars, scattered about the sacred vases; and left no implement of idolatrous worship entire or undefaced. They thence proceeded, with additional numbers and greater fury, to the monasteries of the grey and black friers, which they pillaged in an instant: the Carthusians underwent the same fate: and the populace, not content with robbing and expelling the monks, vented their rage on the buildings which had been the receptacles of such abomination; and in a little time nothing but the walls of these edifices were left standing. The inhabitants of Couper, in Fife, soon after imitated the example.

The queen-regent, provoked at these acts of violence, assembled an army, and prepared to chastise the rebels. She had about two thousand French under her command, with a few Scottish troops; and being assisted by such of the nobility as were well affected to her, she pitched her camp within ten miles of Perth. Even the earl of Argyle, and lord James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, the queen's natural brother, though deeply engaged with the reformers, attended the regent in this enterprize, either because they blamed the fury of the populace, or hoped, by their own influence and authority, to mediate some agreement between the parties. The Congregation, on the other hand, made preparations for defence; and being joined by the earl of Glencairne from the west, and countenanced by many of the nobility and gentry, they appeared formidable from their numbers, as well as from the zeal by which they were animated. They sent an address to the regent, in which they plainly insinuated, that if they were pursued to extremities by the cruel beasts the churchmen, they would have recourse to foreign powers for assistance; and they subscribed themselves her faithful subjects in all things not repugnant to God, assuming, at the same time, the name of the faithful congregation of Christ Jesus. They applied to the nobility attending her, and maintained, that their own past violences were justified by the word of God, which commands the godly to destroy idolatry, and all the monuments of it; and though all civil authority was sacred, yet there was a great difference between the authority and the persons who exercised it; and that it ought to be considered, whether or not those those abominations, called by the pestilent papists Religion, and which they defend by fire and sword, be the true religion of Christ Jesus. They remonstrated with such of the regent's army as had formerly embraced their party, and told them, "That as they were already reputed traitors by God, they should likewise be excommunicated from their society, and from the participation of the sacraments of the church, which God by his mighty power had erected among them; whose ministers have the same authority which Christ granted to his apostles in these words, Whose sins ye shall forgive shall be forgiven, and whose sins ye shall retain shall be retained." We may here see, that these new saints were no less lofty in their pretensions than the ancient hierarchy; and, since they were rivals both in power and in profit, no wonder their enmity was violent and inveterate. They joined to these declarations an address to the established church, and affixed this title to it: "To the generation of antichrist, the pestilent prelates and their shavelings (y) in Scotland, the Congregation of Christ Jesus within the same sayeth; As ye by tyranny intend not only to destroy our bodies, but also by the same to hold our souls in bondage of the devil, subject to idolatry; so shall we, with all the force and power which God shall grant unto us, execute just vengeance and punishment upon you: yea, we shall begin that same war which God commanded Israel to execute against the Canaanites; that is, contract of peace shall never be made till you desist from your open idolatry and cruel persecution of God's children. And this, in the name of the eternal God, and of his son Christ Jesus, whose verity we profess, and gospel pel we have preached, and holy sacraments rightly administered, we signify unto you, to be our intent, so far as God will assist us, to withstand your idolatry. Take this for warning, and be not deceived." With these outrageous symptoms, says Hume, who knew his country well, commenced in Scotland that cant, hypocrisy, and fanaticism, which long infested that kingdom, and which, though now mollified by the lenity of the civil power, is still ready to break out on all occasions.

The queen-regent, finding the obstinacy and zeal of the rebels difficult to be subdued, was content to embrace the counsels of Argyle and the prior of St. Andrews, and to agree to an accommodation with them. She was received into Perth, which submitted, on her promise of indemnity for past offences, and her engagement not to leave any French garrison in the place. Complaints immediately arose concerning the infraction of this capitulation. Some of the inhabitants, it was pretended, were molested on account of the late violences; and some companies of Scotch soldiers, supposed to be in French pay, were quartered in the town; which step, though taken on very plausible grounds, was loudly exclaimed against by the Congregation. It is asserted, that the regent, to justify these measures, declared that princes ought not to have their promises too strictly urged upon them; nor was any faith to be kept with heretics: and that for her part, could she find as good a colour, she would willingly bereave all these men of their lives and fortunes. But it is no wise likely that such expressions ever dropped from this prudent and virtuous princess. On the contrary, it appears, that all these violences were disagreeable to her; that she was in this particular over-ruled by the authority of the French counsellors placed about her; and that she often thought, if the management of those affairs had been entrusted wholly to herself, she could easily, without force, have accommodated all differences.

Such is the account given by Mr. Hume, who has attempted to vindicate the conduct of the queen-regent, and to deny the charges that have been exhibited against her; but as his vindication is couched in general terms, and supported on his assertion of her prudence and virtue, we see no reason to admit it in contradiction to the concurring testimonies of Keith, Spotswood, Knox, and Buchanan. On the evidence of Buchanan and Knox, indeed, we place but little reliance. The former, in his account of these and the subsequent transactions during the reign of Mary, has been guilty of the most gross and culpable falsehoods; and the latter, being under the influence of his own peculiar notions, is seldom worthy of implicit credit. But the veracity of Keith and Spotswood cannot reasonably be doubted; and, in this instance, their account is specific and circumstantial. They say, that the regent, having introduced a French garrison into the city of Perth, contrary to the tenour of the treaty, one of the soldiers passing by the house of a citizen, named Patrick Murray, who was known to favour the doctrine of the Reformers, killed his son, a boy of thirteen; but whether through accident or design, is not known. When the regent, however, was informed of it, she coolly replied, that the evil was the greater, as it had fallen on the son instead of the father; but that she knew of no remedy for it. These authors farther assert, that, before three days were expired, many of the leaders of the Congregation were put to death; the principal inhabitants banished; others sentenced to pay heavy fines; the magistrates deposed; new regulations introduced; and four companies of French troops left in Perth, with strict orders to suffer the celebration of no other service than that of the Romish church. This gross infraction of the late treaty induced the earl of Argyle and the lord James, through whose mediation it had been effected, to withdraw themselves from the queen's army, and join the Reformers. The Congregation also, encouraged by this accession of force, renewed at Crail, Anstruther, and other places in Fife, like depredations on the churches and monasteries with those formerly committed at Perth and Couper. The regent, who marched against them with her army, finding their power so much increased, was glad to conclude a truce for a few days, and to pass over with her forces to the Lothians. The reformers besieged and took Perth; proceeded thence to Stirling, where they exercised their usual fury; and finding nothing able to resist them, they bent their march to Edinburgh, the inhabitants of which, as they had already anticipated the zeal of the Congregation against the churches and monasteries, gladly opened their gates to them. The regent, with a few forces which remained with her, took shelter in Dunbar, where she fortified herself, in expectation of a reinforcement from France.

In the meantime the regent employed her partizans in representing to the people the dangerous consequences of this open rebellion; and she endeavoured to convince them, that the lord James, under pretence of religion, had formed the scheme of wresting the sceptre from her hands, and of ascending the throne in her place. By these considerations many were engaged to desert the army of the Congregation; but much more by the want of pay or any means of subsistence; and the regent, observing the malcontents to be much weakened, ventured to march to Edinburgh, with a design of suppressing them. On the interposition of the duke of Chatelrault, who still adhered to her, she agreed to a capitulation, in which she granted them a toleration of their religion, and they engaged to commit no farther depredations on the churches. Soon after they evacuated the city; and, before they left it, they proclaimed the articles of agreement; but they took care to publish only such articles as were favourable to themselves, and they were guilty of an imposture, in adding one to the number, namely, that idolatry should not again be erected in any place where it was at that time suppressed.

It is not probable that an agreement between parties actuated by such inveterate animosity against each other, as were the Catholics and Reformers, could be durable; and both sides endeavoured to strengthen themselves as much as possible, against the ensuing rupture, which appeared inevitable. The regent, having obtained a reinforcement of one thousand men from France, began to fortify Leith, where she was soon after joined by fresh supplies from the continent; and the Congregation seduced to their party the duke of Chatelrault, who had long appeared inclined to join them, and who was at last determined by the arrival of his son, the earl of Arran, from France, where he had escaped many dangers, from the jealousy, as well as bigotry, of Henry and the duke of Guise. More French troops soon after disembarked under the command of La Brosse, who was followed by thn bishop of Amiens, and three doctors of Sorbonne. These last were supplied with store of syllogisms, authorities, citations, scholastic arguments, which they intended to oppose to the Scottish preachers, and which, they justly presumed, would acquire force, and produce conviction, by the influence of the French arms and artillery.

The constable Montmorency had always opposed the marriage of the dauphin with the queen of Scots, and had foretold, that, by forming such close connexions with Scotland, the ancient league would be dissolved; and the natives of that kingdom, jealous of a foreign yoke, would soon become, instead of allies attached by interest and inclination, the most inveterate enemies to the French government. But though the event seemed now to have justified the prudence of that aged minister, it is not improbable, considering the violent counsels by which France was governed, that the insurrection was deemed a favourable event; as affording a pretence for sending over armies, for entirely subduing the country, for attainting the rebels, and for preparing means thence to invade England, and support Mary's title to the crown of that kingdom. The leaders of the Congregation, well acquainted with these views, were not insensible of their danger, and saw that their only safety consisted in the vigour and success of their measures. They were encouraged by the intelligence which had been received of the sudden death of Henry II.; and having passed an act from their own authority, depriving the queen-dowager of the regency, and ordering all the French troops to depart the kingdom, they collected forces to put their edict in execution against them. They again became masters of Edinburgh; but found themselves unable to keep possession of that city for any considerable length of time. Their tumultuary armies, assembled in haste, and supported by no pay, soon separated upon the least disaster, or even any delay of success; and were incapable of resisting such veteran troops as the French, who were also seconded by some of the Scottish nobility, among whom the earl of Bothwel distinguished himself. Hearing that the marquis D'Elbeuf, brother to the regent, was levying an army against them in Germany, they thought themselves justified in applying to England for assistance; and as the sympathy of religion, as well as regard to national liberty, had now counterbalanced the ancient animosity against that kingdom, this measure was the result of inclination, no less than of interest. Maitland, of Lidington, therefore, and Robert Melvil, were secretly dispatched by the Congregation to sollicit succours from Elizabeth.

The council of Elizabeth did not long deliberate in agreeing to this request, which concurred so well with the views and interests of their mistress. Cecil in particular represented to the queen, "that the union of the crowns of Scotland and France, both of them the hereditary enemies of England, was ever regarded as a pernicious event; and her father, as well as protector Somerset, had employed every expedient, both of war and negociation, to prevent it: that the claim, which Mary advanced to the crown, rendered the present situation of England still more dangerous, and demanded, on the part of the queen, the greatest vigilance and precaution: that the capacity, ambition, and exorbitant views of the family of Guise, who now governed the French counsels, were sufficiently known; and they themselves made no secret of their design to place their niece on the throne of England: that, deeming themselves secure of success, they had already, somewhat imprudently and prematurely, taken off the mask: that they only waited till Scotland should be entirely subdued; and having thus deprived the English of the advantages resulting from their situation and naval power, they prepared means for subverting the queen's authority: that the zealous catholics in England, discontented with the present government, and satisfied in the legality of Mary's title, would bring them considerable reinforcement, and would disturb every measure of defence against that formidable power: that the only expedient for preventing these designs was to seize the present opportunity, and take advantage of a like zeal in the protestants of Scotland; nor could any doubt be entertained with regard to the justice of a measure, founded on such evident necessity, and directed only to the ends of self-preservation: that though a French war, attended with great expence, seemed the necessary consequence of supporting the malcontents of Scotland, that power, if removed to the continent, would be much less formidable; and a small disbursement at present would in the end be found the greatest frugality: and that the domestic dissensions of France, which every day augmented, together with the alliance of Philip, who, notwithstanding his bigotry and hypocrisy, would never permit the entire conquest of England, were sufficient to secure the queen against the dangerous ambition and resentment of the house of Guise."

Cecil added, that the prudent counsels of the constable Montmorency had alone prevented the dreadful consequences of their unjust proceedings; but that the death of Henry the Second, who was accidentally killed at a tournament, having now given a free scope to the temerity of the house of Guise, there was every reason to believe that those ambitious princes, armed with sovereign power, would accelerate the execution of those plans which they had long since formed against this kingdom. "Scotland," said he, "is the place from whence England may be attacked to the greatest advantage; the French have nothing to dread from that quarter, but the government of England may be overturned by a single battle; the queen cannot hesitate a moment in repelling the attacks of an enemy who seeks to open a passage into the very heart of her kingdom; the only step to be pursued, is to march against them while they are yet at a distance, and unprovided with forces sufficient to make a formidable resistance." Cecil concluded by observing that, in a matter of so much importance, every plan should be adopted with wisdom, and executed with prudence, since delays might be attended with the most serious danger.

All the facts advanced in this manifesto were fully substantiated by the letters and dispatches of sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and his emissaries Killigrew and Jones. In fact, the house of Guise had violated the most solemn oaths; and had, in particular, broken the late treaty of peace in many points of importance. This haughty family treated Elizabeth with contempt; they scarcely deigned to consider her as queen of England, or to conceal from her ambassadors their intrigues at the courts of Rome and Madrid, in Germany, and even in Denmark, where they were endeavouring to levy troops, and were solliciting succours against her. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton's correspondence with sir William Cecil; the circumstances he learned through his own vigilance and that of his emissaries; the exact knowledge he acquired of the contents of letters sent by the duke of Guise and his brother, the cardinal of Lorraine, as well to the princes who were in alliance with them, as to neutral powers; all prove what a despicable opinion those princes entertained of the power of Elizabeth.

Elizabeth, overcome by these powerful motives, prepared herself to support, by arms and money, the declining affairs of the Congregation in Scotland. She equipped a fleet, which consisted of thirteen ships of war; and giving the command of it to Winter, she sent it to the Frith of Forth: she appointed the young duke of Norfolk her lieutenant in the northern counties, and she assembled at Berwick an army of eight thousand men under the command of lord Grey, warden of the east and middle marches. Though the court of France offered her to make immediate restitution of Calais, provided she would not interpose in the affairs of Scotland; she resolutely replied, that she never would put an inconsiderable fishing-town in competition with the safety of her dominions; and she still continued her preparations. She concluded a treaty of mutual defence with the Congregation, which was to last during the marriage of the queen of Scots with Francis, and a year after; and she promised never to desist till the French had entirely evacuated Scotland. And having thus taken all proper measures for success, and received from the Scots six hostages for the performance of articles, she ordered her fleet and army to begin their operations.

On the 15th of January, 1560, queen Elizabeth's fleet appeared in the Frith, which so disconcerted the French army, who were at that time ravaging the county of Fife, that they were obliged to make a circuit by Stirling, in order to reach Leith, where they prepared themselves for defence. The English army, reinforced by five thousand Scots, sat down before the place; and after two skirmishes, in the former of which the English had the advantage, in the latter the French, they began to batter the town; and, though repulsed with considerable loss in an ill-conducted assault, they reduced the garrison to great difficulties (z). The French, who found it impossible to subsist for want of provisions, and who saw that the English were continually reinforced by fresh numbers, were obliged to capitulate on the 5th of July: and soon after a treaty was concluded at Edinburgh, by the bishops of Valence and Amiens, and the count de la Rochefoucault de Randan, plenipotentiaries from France; and sir William Cecil, Dr. Wotton, sir Ralph Sadler, and others, whom Elizabeth had sent thither for that purpose (a). In order to hasten the execution of this important treaty, Elizabeth sent ships, by which the French forces were transported into their own country.

Thus did Europe perceive, in the first transaction of this reign, the genius and capacity of the queen and her ministers. She discerned at a distance the danger which threatened her; and instantly took vigorous measures to prevent it. Making all possible advantages of her situation, she proceeded with celerity to a decision; and was not diverted by any offers, negociations, or remonstrances of the court of France. She stopped not till she had brought the matter to a final issue; and had converted that very power, to which her enemies trusted for her destruction, into her firmest support and security. By exacting no improper conditions from the Scottish malcontents, even during their greatest distresses, she established an entire confidence with them; and having cemented the union by all the ties of gratitude, interest, and religion, she now possessed an influence over them

(z) Their distress was augmented by two events; the dispersion by a storm of d'Elbeuf's fleet, which carried a considerable army on board, and the death of the queen-regent, who expired about this time in the castle of Edinburgh.

(a) It was there stipulated, that the French should instantly evacuate Scotland; that the king and queen of France and Scotland should thenceforth abstain from bearing the arms of England, or assuming the title of that kingdom; that farther satisfaction for the injury already done in that particular should be granted Elizabeth; and the commissioners should meet to settle this point, or if they could not agree, that the king of Spain should be umpire between the crowns. Besides these stipulations, which regarded England, some concessions were granted to the Scots; namely, that an amnesty should be published for all past offences; that none but natives should enjoy any office in Scotland; that the states should name twenty-four persons, of whom the queen of Scots should chuse seven, and the states five, and in the hands of these twelve should the whole administration be placed during their queen's absence; and that Mary should neither make peace nor war without consent of the states.

beyond what remained even with their native sovereign. The regard, which she acquired by this spirited conduct, gave her every where, abroad as well as at home, more authority than had attended her sister, though supported by all the power of the monarch of Spain.

The subsequent measures of the Scottish reformers tended still more to cement their union with England. Being now entirely masters of Scotland, they made no farther ceremony or scruple in fully effecting their purpose. In compliance with the treaty of Edinburgh, though it had not been ratified by the queen, a parliament convention was assembled; and the leaders of the Congregation thought themselves fully entitled, without the sovereign's authority, immediately to summon a parliament. The reformers presented a petition to this assembly; in which, not content with desiring the establishment of their doctrine, they also applied for the punishment of the catholics, whom they called vassals to the Roman harlot; and they asserted, that, among "all the rabble of the clergy," such is their expression, there was not one lawful minister; but that they were, all of them, thieves and murderers; yea, rebels and traitors to civil authority; and therefore unworthy to be suffered in any reformed commonwealth. The parliament seem to have been actuated by the same spirit of rage and persecution. After ratifying a confession of faith agreeable to the new doctrines, they passed a statute against the mass, and not only abolished it in all the churches, but enacted, that whoever, any where, either officiated in it, or was present at it, should be chastised, for the first offence, with confiscation of goods and corporal punishment, at the discretion of the magistrate; for the second, with banishment; and for the third, with death. A law was also voted for abolishing the papal jurisdiction in Scotland: the Presbyterian form of discipline was settled, leaving only at first some shadow of authority to certain ecclesiastics, whom they called Superintendants. The Catholic prelates appeared, in order to complain of great injustice committed on them by the arbitrary invasion of their property, but the parliament took no notice of them; till, at last, these ecclesiastics, tired with fruitless attendance, departed the town. They were then cited to appear; and as none of them obeyed the citation, it was voted by the parliament, that the ecclesiastics were entirely satisfied, and found no reason for complaint.

Sir James Sandilands, prior of St. John, was sent over to France to obtain the ratification of the acts which had been passed; but was very ill received by Mary, who denied the validity of a parliament summoned without the royal consent; and she refused her sanction to those statutes; as was to be expected, because their tendency was to abolish the religion she professed. But the Protestants gave themselves little concern about their queen's refusal. They immediately put the statutes in execution: they abolished the mass; they settled their ministers; they committed every where furious devastations on the monasteries, and even on the churches, which they thought profaned by idolatry; and deeming the property of the clergy lawful prize, they took possession, without ceremony, of by far the greater part of the ecclesiastical revenues. Their new preachers, who had authority sufficient to incite them to war and insurrection, could not restrain their rapacity; and fanaticism concurring with avarice, an incurable wound was given to the papal authority in that country. The Protestant nobility and gentry, united by the consciousness of such unpardonable guilt, alarmed for their new possessions, well acquainted with the imperious character of the house of Guise, saw no safety for themselves but in the protection of England; and they dispatched Morton, Glencairne, and Lidington, to express their sincere gratitude to the queen for her past favours, and represent to her the necessity of continuing them. In order to render the alliance which subsisted between them still more binding, their ambassadors were ordered to propose a marriage between Elizabeth and the earl of Arran, who was nearly allied to the royal family of Scotland, and, after Mary, was presumptive heir to the throne. The queen, however, rejected their proposal; but accompanied her refusal with the most flattering marks of esteem, as well for the earl as for the Scottish nobles, to whom she promised a continuation of friendship and every necessary assistance; exhorting them at the same time, to support the rights of the nation with vigour and effect.

The house of Guise, notwithstanding their former disappointments, had not laid aside the design of contesting Elizabeth's title; and subverting her authority. Francis and Mary, whose counsels were wholly directed by them, refused to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh; and shewed no disposition to give her any satisfaction for that affront, which they had put upon her, by openly assuming the title and arms of England. She was sensible of the danger attending such pretensions; and it was with pleasure she heard of the violent factions which prevailed in the French government, and of the opposition which had arisen against the measures of the duke of Guise. That ambitious prince, supported by his four brothers, the cardinal of Lorraine, the duke of Aumale, the marquis of Elbeuf, and the grand prior, men no less ambitious than himself, had engrossed all the authority of the crown; and as he was possessed of the most splendid and seducing qualities, there appeared no end of his acquisitions and pretensions. The constable, Montmorency, who had long balanced his credit, was deprived of all power: the princes of the blood, the king of Navarre, and his brother, the prince of Condé, were entirely excluded from offices and favour: the queen-mother herself, Catherine de Medicis, found her influence every day declining: and as Francis, a young prince, infirm both in mind and body, was wholly governed by his consort, who knew no law but the pleasure of her uncles, men despaired of ever obtaining freedom from the dominion of that aspiring family. It was the contests of religion which first inspired the French with courage openly to oppose the dangerous influence of this aspiring family.

The theological disputes, first started in the north of Germany, next in Switzerland, countries at that time wholly illiterate, had long since penetrated into France; and as they were assisted by the general discontent against the court and church of Rome, and by the zealous spirit of the age, the proselytes to the new religion were secretly increasing in every province; though its progress had been opposed by Francis the First, and still more rigorously by his son Henry the Second, whose unprincipled bigotry led him to inflict the severest punishments on the most eminent of the party. Indeed a point of honour seemed to have arisen, whether the one sect could exercise, or the other suffer, most barbarity. The death of Henry put some stop to the flames of persecution; and the people, who had admired the constancy of the new preachers, now heard with favour their doctrines and arguments. But the cardinal of Lorraine, as well as his brothers, who were possessed of the legal authority, thought it their interest to support the established religion; and when they revived the execution of the penal statutes, they necessarily drove the malcontent princes and nobles to embrace the protection of the new religion. The king of Navarre, a man of mild dispositions, but of a weak character, and the prince of Condé, who possessed many great qualities, having declared themselves in favour of the Protestants, that sect acquired new force from their countenance; and the admiral, Coligni, with his brother Andelot, no longer scrupled to make open profession of their principles. The integrity of the admiral, whose sincerity in his attachment to the new doctrine could not be doubted, and his great reputation both for valour and conduct, for the arts of peace as well as of war, brought credit to the Reformers; and after a frustrated attempt of the malcontents to seize the king's person at Amboise, of which Elizabeth had probably been apprized (b), every place was full of distraction, and matters hastened to an open rupture between the parties. But the house of Guise, though these factions had obliged them to remit their efforts in Scotland, and had been one chief cause of Elizabeth's success, were determined not to relinquish their authority in France, or yield to the violence of their enemies. They found an opportunity of seizing the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé; they threw the former into prison; they obtained a sentence of death against the latter; and they were proceeding to put the sentence into execution, when the sudden death of Francis the Second, (by some supposed to have been poisoned,) saved the noble prisoner, and interrupted the prosperity of the duke of Guise. The queen-mother, Catharine de Medicis, was appointed regent to her son Charles IX. now in his minority: the king of Navarre was named lieutenant-general of the kingdom: the sentence against Condé was annulled: the constable was recalled to court: and the family of Guise, though they still enjoyed great offices and great power, found a counterpoise to their authority. Indeed it seemed to be the intention of the regent to support her power by occasionally opposing one faction to another, without suffering either to predominate.

Elizabeth was determined to make advantage of these events against the queen of Scots, whom she still regarded as a dangerous rival. She saw herself freed from the perils attending an union of Scotland with France, and from the pretensions of so powerful a prince as Francis; but she considered, at the same time, that the English Catholics, who were numerous, and who were generally prejudiced in favour of Mary's title, would now adhere to that princess with more zealous attachment, when they saw that her succession no longer endangered the liberties of the kingdom, and was rather attended with the advantage of effecting an entire union with Scotland. She gave orders, therefore, in the beginning of 1561, to her ambassador, Throgmorton, a vigilant and able minister, to renew his applications to the queen of Scots, and to require her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh. But though Mary had desisted, after her husband's death, from bearing the arms and title of queen of England, she still declined gratifying Elizabeth in this important article; and being swayed by the ambitious suggestions of her uncles, she refused to make a resignation of her pretensions in any formal manner.

Meanwhile, the queen-mother of France, who imputed to Mary all the mortifications which she had met with during Francis's life-time, took care to retaliate on her by like injuries; and the queen of Scots, finding herself treated with coolness, and her abode in France disagreeable, began to think of returning to her native country. Her brother, lord James, had been sent to her by the Reformers; but before his departure, they exacted from him a promise that he would prevent the queen, on her return, from countenancing the celebration of the mass, either in public or private. The Catholics had deputed John Lesley, afterwards bishop of Ross; who, arriving before lord James, first saw Mary at Vitry, in Champagne, where she then resided. The artful insinuations of this prelate conveyed to Mary an idea of the detestable character of her brother, whom he represented as a man under the sole guidance of ambition, capable of aspiring even to the crown itself, and disposed to the exertion of every possible means that could lead to the attainment of his object. Lesley warned her, that lord James would advise her by no means to suffer any French troops to accompany her to Scotland, lest their known petulance should urge them to attempt any innovation in religious affairs, which would tend to disturb her repose; but that his real designs, though concealed beneath the specious pretext of affection to his sister, and zeal for her service, only tended to remove from about her person all such as by their presence might raise insurmountable obstacles to his own acquisition of the sovereignty. He farther advised her to detain her brother in France till such time as she should have established peace and good order throughout her dominions; and he concluded by telling her it would be prudent to enter Scotland by the northern provinces, where she would find an army of twenty thousand men ready to conduct her to Edinburgh. Though Mary was not inclined to enter her kingdom, like a conqueror alarmed for the safety of his person, she nevertheless expressed her satisfaction with the zeal of Lesley; and charged him to assure the Scottish nobles of the extreme pleasure with which this mark of their attachment inspired her, and to tell them that she would expedite her departure from France as soon as possible. The very next day lord James arrived at St. Dizier, where he saw his sister and his sovereign. The ties of blood, the winning eloquence of her brother, his insinuating address, and his strong professions of implicit obedience to her will, operated so powerfully in his favour, that all those prejudices which the insinuations of Lesley had tended to excite in her mind were instantly dissipated. Mary having accompanied him to Joinville, there promised, as the reward of his fidelity, to bestow on him the title of earl of Murray; and then dismissed him, laden with presents, to prepare the Scotch for her arrival; and she applied to Elizabeth, by D'Oisel, for a safe-conduct, in case she should be obliged to pass through England: but she received for answer, that, till she had given satisfaction, by ratifying the treaty of Edinburgh, she could expect no favour from a person whom she had so much injured: this denial excited her indignation; and she made no scruple of expressing her sentiments to Throgmorton, when he reiterated his applications to gratify his mistress in a demand which he represented as so reasonable (c). Having cleared the room of her attendants, she said to him, "How weak I may prove, or how far a woman's frailty may transport me, I cannot tell: however, I am resolved not to have so many witnesses of my infirmity as your mistress had at her audience of my ambassador D'Oisel. There is nothing disturbs me so much, as the having asked, with so much importunity, a favour which it was of no consequence for me to obtain. I can, with God's leave, return to my own country without her leave; as I came to France, in spite of all the opposition of her brother, king Edward: neither do I want friends both able and willing to conduct me home, as they have brought me hither; though I was desirous rather to make an experiment of your mistress's friendship, than of the assistance of any other person. I have often heard you say, that a good correspondence between her and myself would conduce much to the security and happiness of both our kingdoms: were she well convinced of this truth, she would hardly have denied me so small a request. But, perhaps, she bears a better inclination to my rebellious subjects than to me, their sovereign, her equal in royal dignity, her near relation, and the undoubted heir of her kingdoms. Besides her friendship, I ask nothing at her hands: I neither trouble her, nor concern myself in the affairs of her state: not that I am ignorant, that there are now in England a great many malcontents, who are no friends to the present establishment. She is pleased to upbraid me as a person little experienced in the world: I freely own it; but age will cure that defect. However, I am already old enough to acquit myself honestly and courteously to my friends and relations, and to encourage no reports of your mistress, which would misbecome a queen and her kinswoman. I would also say, by her leave, that I am a queen as well as she, and not altogether friendless: and, perhaps, I have as great a soul too; so that methinks we should be upon a level in our treatment of each other. As soon as I have consulted the states of my kingdom, I shall be ready to give her a reasonable answer; and I am the more intent on my journey, in order to make the quicker dispatch in this affair. But she, it seems, intends to stop my journey; so that either she will not let me give her satisfaction, or is resolved not to be satisfied; perhaps, on purpose to keep up the disagreement between us. She has often reproached me with my being young; and I must be very young indeed, and as ill-advised, to treat of matters of such great concern and importance without the advice of my parliament. I have not been wanting in all friendly offices to her; but she disbelieves or overlooks them. I could heartily wish, that I were as nearly allied to her in affection as in blood: for that, indeed, would be a most valuable alliance."

This spirited reply, notwithstanding the obliging terms interspersed in it, was but ill fitted to conciliate friendship between these rival princesses, or put a stop to those mutual jealousies which had already taken place. Elizabeth equipped a fleet, on pretence of pursuing pirates,

(c) It was not the ratification of the treaty between France and Scotland which Elizabeth was so eager to obtain, but of that in which her right to the crown of England was acknowledged, and in which Mary resigned all her pretensions to the title and arms of that kingdom. Though the queen had very properly disdained to prove the legitimacy of her birth when threatened with papal censures, and the Spanish arms; yet the English Catholics, it was thought, might conspire with those of Scotland in favour of Mary, and excite troubles which it would be difficult to appease. It was therefore an object of importance to Elizabeth that Mary should ratify this treaty, in which she expressly recognised her right, and promised never to infringe on it. But Mary apprehended that, by consenting to ratify it, her own claims as presumptive heir to the throne, in case of Elizabeth's death, would be lost; since that princess, she thought, might, in imitation of her father, alter the order of succession by an act of parliament. A trifling alteration in the terms of the treaty might indeed have easily reconciled the interests of both; as the queen might have secured the acknowledgement of her own right, and that of her descendants, by requiring Mary to renounce the title and arms of England only during the lives of Elizabeth and her lawful heirs; but the jealousy which subsisted between the two sovereigns prevented the adoption of this accommodating system.

but probably with an intention of intercepting the queen of Scots in her return homewards. Mary embarked at Calais; and passing the English fleet in a fog, arrived safely at Leith, on the 19th of August, attended by her three uncles, the duke of Aumale, the grand prior, and the marquis of Elbeuf, together with the marquis of Damville, and other French courtiers. This change of abode and situation was very little agreeable to that princess. Besides her natural prepossessions in favour of a country in which she had been educated from her earliest infancy, and where she had borne so high a rank, she could not forbear both regretting the society of that people, so celebrated for their humane disposition, and their respectful attachment to their sovereign, and reflecting on the disparity of the scene which lay before her. It is said that, after she was embarked at Calais, she kept her eyes fixed on the coast of France, and never turned them from that beloved object, till darkness fell, and intercepted it from her view. She then ordered a couch to be spread for her on the deck; and charged the pilot, that if in the morning the land were still in sight, he should awake her, and afford her one parting view of that country, in which all her affections were centered. The weather proved calm, so that the ship made little way in the night-time: and Mary had once more an opportunity of seeing the French coast. She sat up on her couch, and still looking towards the land, often repeated these words: "Farewell France, farewell: I shall never see thee more." The first aspect, however, of things in Scotland was more favourable, if not to her pleasure and happiness, at least to her repose and security, than she had reason to apprehend. No sooner did the French gallies appear off Leith, than people of all ranks, who had long expected their arrival, flocked towards the shore with an earnest impatience to behold and receive their young sovereign. Some were led by duty, some by interest, some by curiosity; and all combined to express their attachment to her, and to insinuate themselves into her confidence, on the commencement of her administration. She had now reached her nineteenth year; and the bloom of her youth and amiable beauty of her person were farther recommended by the affability of her address, the politeness of her manners, and the elegance of her genius. Well accomplished in all the superficial, but engaging graces of a court, she afforded, when better known, still more promising indications of her character; and men prognosticated both humanity from her soft and obliging deportment, and penetration from her taste in all the refined arts of music, eloquence, and poetry. And as the Scots had long been deprived of the presence of their sovereign, whom they once despaired ever more to behold among them, her arrival seemed to give universal satisfaction; and nothing appeared about the court, but symptoms of affection, joy, and festivity.

The first measures which Mary embraced confirmed all the prepossessions entertained in her favour. In compliance with the advice given her in France by D'Oisel and the bishop of Amiens, as well as her uncles, she bestowed her confidence entirely on the leaders of the reformed party, who had the greatest influence over the people, and who, she found, were alone able to support her government. Her brother, lord James, whom she soon after created earl of Murray, obtained the chief authority; and after him Lidington, secretary of state, a man of great sagacity, had a principal share in her confidence. By the vigour of these men's measures she endeavoured to establish order and justice in a country divided by public factions and private feuds; and that fierce, intractable people, unacquainted with laws and obedience, seemed, for a time, to submit peaceably to her gentle and prudent administration.

But there was one circumstance which blasted all these promising appearances, and bereaved Mary of that general favour which her agreeable manners and judicious deportment gave her just reason to expect. She was still a papist; and though she published soon after her arrival, a proclamation, enjoining every one to submit to the established religion, the preachers and their adherents could neither be reconciled to a person polluted with so great an abomination, nor lay aside their jealousies of her future conduct. It was with great difficulty she could obtain permission for saying mass in her own chapel: and had not the people apprehended, that, if she had here met with a refusal, she would instantly have returned to France, the zealots never would have granted her even that indulgence. The cry was, "Shall we suffer that idol to be again erected within the realm?" It was asserted in the pulpit, that one mass was more terrible than ten thousand armed men landed to invade the kingdom; lord Lindesey, and some gentlemen of Fife, exclaimed, "That the idolator should die the death;" such was their expression. One that carried tapers for the ceremony of that worship, was attacked and insulted in the court of the palace. And if lord James, and some popular leaders, had not interposed, the most dangerous uproar was apprehended, from the ungoverned fury of the multitude. Public prayers were offered up in the churches to this purpose: That God would turn the queen's heart, which was obstinate against him and his truth; or if his holy will be otherwise, that he would strengthen the hearts and hands of the elect, stoutly to oppose the rage of all tyrants. Nay, it was openly called in question, whether that princess, being an idolatress, was entitled to any authority, even in civil matters?

The queen was every moment exposed to contemptuous and indignant treatment, which she bore with benignity and patience. Soon after her arrival she dined in the castle of Edinburgh, and it was there contrived, that a boy, six years of age, should be let down from the roof, and should present her with a bible, a psalter, and the keys of the castle. Lest she should be at a loss to understand this insult on her as a papist, all the decorations of the apartment expressed the burning of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and other punishments inflicted by God upon idolatry. The town council of Edinburgh had the assurance to arrogate to themselves the power of issuing a proclamation, banishing from their district "all the wicked rabble of antichrist, the pope; such as priests, monks, friers, together with adulterers and fornicators." And because the privy-council suspended the magistrates for their insolence the passionate historians of that age have inferred, that the queen was engaged, by a sympathy of manners, to take adulterers and fornicators under her protection. It appears probable, that the magistrates were afterwards reinstated in their office, and that their proclamation was confirmed.

The assembly of the church framed an address, in which, after telling Mary, that her mass was a bastard service of God, the fountain of all impiety, and the source of every evil which abounded in the realm; they expressed their hopes, that she would, ere this time, have preferred truth to her own pre-conceived opinion, and have renounced her religion, which, they assured her, was nothing but abomination and vanity. They said, that the present abuses of government were so enormous, that, if a speedy remedy were not provided, God would not fail in his anger to strike the head and the tail, the disobedient prince and sinful people. They required, that severe punishment should be inflicted on adulterers and fornicators; and they concluded with demanding for themselves some addition both of power and property.

The ringleader in these insults on majesty was John Knox; who possessed an uncontrolled authority in the church, and even in the civil affairs of the nation. His usual appellation for the queen was Jezebel; and though she endeavoured, by great condescension, to gain his favour, all her efforts proved fruitless. She promised him access to her whenever he demanded it; and she even desired him, if he found her blameable in any thing, to reprehend her freely in private, rather than vilify her in the pulpit before the whole people: but he plainly told her, that he had a public ministry entrusted to him; that if she would come to church, she should there hear the gospel of truth; and that it was not his business to apply to every individual, nor had he leisure for that occupation. His political principles were as full of sedition as his theological were of bigotry. Though he once condescended so far as to tell the queen, that he would submit to her, in the same manner as Paul did to Nero; he remained not long in this dutiful strain. He said to her, that "Samuel feared not to slay Agag, the fat and delicate king of Amalek, whom king Saul had saved: neither spared Elias Jezebel's false prophets, and Baal's priests, though king Ahab was present. Phineas," added he, "was no magistrate; yet feared he not to strike Cosbi and Zimri in the very act of filthy fornication. And so, Madam, your grace may see, that others than chief magistrates may lawfully inflict punishment on such crimes as are condemned by the law of God." Knox had formerly, during the reign of Mary of England, written a book against female succession to the crown: the title of it is, "The first blast of the trumpet against the monstrous regimen of women."

He

He was too proud either to recant or to apologize; and his conduct shewed, that he thought neither loyalty nor decency due to the female sex.

The life of Mary was thus filled with bitterness and sorrow. This rustic apostle scruples not, in his history, to inform us, that he once treated her with such severity, that she lost all command of temper, and dissolved in tears before him. The pulpits had become mere scenes of railing against the vices of the court; among which were always noted as the principal, feasting, finery, dancing, balls, and whoredom, their necessary attendant. Some ornaments, which the ladies at that time wore upon their petticoats, excited mightily the indignation of the preachers; and they affirmed, that such vanity would provoke God's vengeance, not only against these foolish women, but against the whole realm.

On account of the severity of these reformers, Mary had reason to regret her leaving France; and soon after her two uncles, the duke of Aumale, and the grand prior, with the other French nobility, took leave of her: the marquis of Elbeuf remained some time longer; but after his departure, she was left to the society of her own subjects; men unacquainted with the pleasures of conversation, ignorant of arts and civility, and corrupted, beyond their usual rusticity, by a dismal fanaticism, which rendered them incapable of all humanity or improvement. Though Mary had made no attempt to restore the ancient religion, her popery was a sufficient crime.

An adventure happened to the marquis of Elbeuf, before his departure, which enabled him to give Mary's friends in France a melancholy idea of her situation. This nobleman, with the earl of Bothwel, and some other young courtiers, had been engaged, after a debauch, to pay a visit to a woman called Alison Craig, who was known to be liberal of her favours; and because they were denied admittance, they broke the windows, thrust open the door, and committed some disorders, in searching for the damsel. The assembly of the church was sitting at that time, and immediately took cognizance of the matter. In conjunction with several of the nobility, they presented an address to the queen, which was introduced with this pompous prelude: "To the queen's majesty, and to her secret and great council, her grace's faithful and obedient subjects, the professors of Christ Jesus's holy evangile, wish the spirit of righteous judgement." The tenor of the petition was, that the fear of God, the duty which they owed her grace, and the terrible threatenings denounced by God against every city or country where horrible crimes were openly committed, compelled them to demand the severe punishment of such as had done what in them lay to kindle the wrath of God against the whole realm: that the iniquity of which they complained, was so heinous and so horrible, that they should esteem themselves accomplices in it, if they had been engaged by worldly fear, or servile complaisance, to pass it over in silence, or bury it in oblivion: that as they owed her grace obedience in the administration of justice, so were they entitled to require of her, in return, the sharp and condign punishment of this enormity, which might draw down the vengeance of God on the whole kingdom: and that they maintained it to be her duty to lay aside all private affections towards the actors in so heinous a crime and so enormous a villany; and they requested her without delay to bring them to a trial, and inflict the severest penalties upon them. The queen received this peremptory address with courtesy; but because she probably thought, that breaking the windows of a brothel merited not such severe reprehension, she only replied, that her uncle was a stranger, and that he was attended by a young company: but she would put such order to him and to all others, that her subjects should henceforth have no reason to complain. Her passing over this incident in so slight a manner was the source of great discontent, and was regarded as a proof of the most profligate manners (d).

During the queen's absence, some of the populace of Edinburgh broke into her chapel, and committed outrages; for which two of them were indicted, and it was intended to bring them to a trial; but Knox wrote circular letters to the most considerable zealots of the party, and charged them to appear in town, and protect their brethren. These violent measures for opposing justice were little short of rebellion; and Knox was summoned before the council to answer for his offence. His courage was equal to his insolence; and he scrupled not to tell the queen, that the pestilent papists, who had inflamed her against these holy men, were the sons of the devil; and must therefore obey the directions of their father, who had been a liar and a manslayer from the beginning. Knox, however, notwithstanding his insolent behaviour was acquitted.

We have related the above incidents at greater length than the necessity of our subject may seem to require: but even trivial circumstances, which show the manners of the age, are often more instructive, as well as entertaining, than the great transactions of wars and negociations, which are nearly similar in all periods and in all countries.

The reformed clergy in Scotland had, at that time, a natural reason for their ill-humour; namely, the poverty to which they were reduced. The nobility and gentry had at first laid their hands on all the property of the regular clergy, without making any provision for the friers and nuns, whom they turned out of their possessions. The secular clergy of the Catholic communion, though they lost all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, still held some of the temporalities of their benefices; and either became laymen themselves, and converted them into private property, or made conveyance of them at low prices to the nobility, who thus enriched themselves by the plunder of the church. The new teachers had hitherto subsisted chiefly by the voluntary oblations of the faithful; and in a poor country, divided in religious sentiments, this establishment was regarded as very scanty and precarious. Repeated applications were made for a legal settlement to the preachers; and though almost every thing in the kingdom was governed by their zeal and caprice, it was with difficulty that their request was at last complied with. But the necessities of the crown, the rapacity of the courtiers, and the small affection which Mary bore to the Protestant ecclesiastics, rendered their revenues contemptible as well as uncertain; and the preachers, finding that they could not rival the gentry, or even the middling rank of men, in opulence and plenty, betook themselves to other expedients for supporting their authority. They affected a furious zeal for religion, morose manners, a vulgar and familiar, yet mysterious cant; and though the liberality of subsequent princes put them afterwards on a better footing with regard to revenue, and thereby corrected in some degree those bad habits; it must be confessed, that, while many other advantages attend presbyterian government, these inconveniencies are not easily separated from the genius of that ecclesiastical polity.

Mary, destitute of all force, possessing a narrow revenue, surrounded with a factious nobility, a bigoted people, and insolent ecclesiastics, soon found, that her only expedient for maintaining tranquillity was to preserve a good correspondence with Elizabeth, who, by former services, had acquired great authority over these ranks of men. Soon after her arrival in Scotland, secretary Lidington was sent to London, to pay her compliments to Elizabeth, and express her desire of friendship and good correspondence; and he received a commission from her, as well as from the nobility of Scotland, to demand that Mary should, by act of parliament or by proclamation, be declared successor to the crown. No request could be more unreasonable, or made at a more improper juncture. The queen replied, "that Mary had once discovered her intention not to wait for the succession, but had openly, without ceremony or reserve, assumed the title of queen of England, and had pretended a superior right to her throne and kingdom: that though her ambassadors, and those of her husband, the French king, had signed a treaty, in which they renounced that claim, and promised satisfaction for so great an indignity, she was so intoxicated with this imaginary right, that she had rejected the most earnest solicitations, and even had incurred some danger in crossing the seas, rather than ratify that equitable treaty: that her partizans every where had still the assurance to insist on her title, and had presumed to talk of her own birth as illegitimate: that while affairs were on this footing; while a claim thus openly made, so far from being openly renounced, was only suspended till a more favourable opportunity, it would, in her, be the most egregious imprudence to fortify the hands of a pretender to her crown, by declaring her the successor: that no expedient could be worse imagined for cementing friendship than such a declaration; and kings were often found to bear no good will to their successors, even though their own children; much more when the connexion was less intimate, and when such cause of disgust and jealousy had already been given, and indeed was still continued, on the part of Mary: that though she was willing, from the amity which she bore her kinswoman, to ascribe her former pretensions to the advice of others, by whose direction she was then governed; her present refusal to relinquish them could proceed only from her own prepossessions, and was a proof that she still harboured some dangerous designs against her: that it was the nature of all men to be disgusted with the present, to entertain flattering views of futurity, to think their services ill rewarded, to expect a better recompence from the successor; and she should esteem herself scarcely half a sovereign over the English, if they saw her declare her heir, and arm her rival with authority against her own repose and safety: that she knew the inconstant nature of the people; she was acquainted with the present divisions in religion; she was not ignorant that the same party which expected greater favour during the reign of Mary, did also imagine that the title of that princess was superior to her own: that for her part, whatever claims were advanced, she was determined to live and die queen of England; and after her death, it was the business of others to examine who had the best pretensions, either by the laws or by the right of blood, to the succession: that she hoped the claim of the queen of Scots would then be found solid; and, considering the injury which she herself had received, it was sufficient indulgence, if she promised, in the mean time, to do nothing which might, in any respect, weaken or invalidate it: and that Mary, if her title were really preferable, a point which, for her own part, she had never enquired into, possessed all advantages above her rivals; who, destitute both of present power, and of all support by friends, would only expose themselves to inevitable ruin, by advancing any weak, or even doubtful, pretensions."

These views of Elizabeth were so prudent and judicious, that there was no likelihood of her ever departing from them: but that she might put the matter to a fuller proof, she offered to explain the words of the treaty of Edinburgh, so as to leave no suspicion of their excluding Mary's right of succession; and in this form she again required her to ratify that treaty. Mary at length agreed to the proposal, and offered to renounce all present pretensions to the crown of England, provided Elizabeth would agree to declare her the successor. But such was the jealous character of this latter princess, that she never would consent to strengthen the interest and authority of any claimant, by fixing the succession; much less would she make this concession in favour of a rival queen, who possessed such plausible pretensions for the present, and who, though she might verbally renounce them, could easily resume her claim on the first opportunity. Mary's proposal, however, bore so specious an appearance of equity and justice, that Elizabeth, sensible that reason would, by superficial thinkers, be deemed to lie entirely on that side, made no more mention of the matter; and, though farther concessions were never made by either princess, they put on the appearance of a cordial reconciliation and friendship with each other.

Elizabeth observed that, even without her interposition, Mary was sufficiently depressed by the mutinous spirit of her own subjects; and, instead of giving Scotland any inquietude or disturbance, she employed herself, more usefully and laudably, in regulating the affairs of her own kingdom, and promoting the happiness of her people. She made some progress in paying those great debts which lay upon the crown; she regulated the coin, which had been much debased by her predecessors; she furnished her arsenals with great quantities of arms from Germany and other places; engaged her nobility and gentry to imitate her example in this particular; introduced into the kingdom the art of making gunpowder and brass cannon; fortified her frontiers on the side of Scotland; made frequent reviews of the militia; encouraged agriculture, by allowing a free exportation of corn; promoted trade and navigation; and so much increased the shipping of her kingdom, both by building vessels of force herself, and suggesting like undertakings to the merchants, that she was styled the restorer of naval glory, and the queen of the northern seas. The natural frugality of her temper, so far from incapacitating her from these great enterprizes, only enabled her to execute them with greater certainty and success; and every one saw in her conduct the happy effects of a vigorous perseverance in judicious and well-concerted plans.

Notwithstanding Elizabeth's public declarations in favour of a single life, few believed that she would persevere for ever in that resolution. The archduke Charles, second son of the emperor, as well as Casimir, son of the elector Palatine, made applications to her; and as this latter prince professed the reformed religion, he entertained the idea of succeeding. Eric, king of Sweden, and Adolphus, duke of Holstein, were encouraged, by the same views, to become suitors: and the earl of Arran, heir to the crown of Scotland, was, by the states of that kingdom, recommended as a suitable marriage. Even some of her own subjects, though they did not openly declare their pretensions, entertained hopes of success. The earl of Arundel, descended from an ancient and noble family, as well as possessed of great riches, flattered himself with this prospect; as did also sir William Pickering, a man much esteemed for his personal merit. But the person most likely to succeed, was a younger son of the late duke of Northumberland, lord Robert Dudley, who had become, in a manner, her declared favourite, and had great influence in all her counsels. The less worthy he appeared of this distinction, the more was his great favour ascribed to some violent affection, which could thus seduce the judgment of his penetrating sovereign; and men long expected that he would obtain the preference above so many princes and monarchs. But the queen gave all these suitors a gentle refusal, which still encouraged their pursuit; and she thought that she should the better attach them to her interests if they were still allowed to entertain hopes of succeeding in their pretensions.

A singular circumstance in the conduct and character of Elizabeth is, that though she determined never to have any heir of her own body, she was not only averse to fix any successor to the crown; but seems also to have resolved, that no one who had pretensions to the succession should ever have any heirs or successors. If the exclusion given by the will of Henry VIII. to the posterity of Margaret, queen of Scotland was allowed to be valid, the right to the crown devolved on the house of Suffolk; and the lady Catherine Grey, younger sister to the lady Jane, was now the heir of that family. This lady had been married to lord Herbert, son of the earl of Pembroke; but, having been divorced from that nobleman, she made a private marriage with the earl of Hertford, son of the protector; and her husband, soon after consummation, travelled into France. In a little time she appeared to be pregnant, which so enraged Elizabeth, that she threw her into the Tower, and summoned Hertford to appear, in order to answer for his conduct. He made no scruple of acknowledging the marriage, which, though concluded without the queen's consent, was suitable to both parties; and for this offence he was also committed to the Tower. Elizabeth's severity stopped not here: she issued a commission to enquire into the matter; and as Hertford could not, within the time limited, prove the nuptials by witnesses, the commerce between him and his consort was declared unlawful, and their posterity illegitimate. They were still detained in custody; but, by bribing their keepers, they found means to have farther intercourse; and another child appeared to be the fruit of their commerce. This was a fresh source of vexation to the queen; who made a fine of fifteen thousand pounds be set on Hertford by the Star-chamber, and ordered his confinement to be thenceforth more rigid and severe. He lay in this condition for nine years, till the death of his wife, by freeing Elizabeth from all fears, procured him his liberty. This shameful exertion of despotic power, repugnant to every principle of justice, and subversive of all laws, both human and divine, betrayed a diabolical malignity in Elizabeth; and sufficiently proved that she was prepared to sacrifice the most important considerations to the gratification of her leading passions—envy and revenge.

About this time, there happened some other events in the royal family, where the queen's conduct was more laudable. Arthur Pole, and his brother, nephews to the late cardinal, and descended from the duke of Clarence, together with Anthony Fortescue, who had married a sister of these gentlemen, and some other persons, were brought to their trial for intending to withdraw into France, with a view of soliciting succours from the duke of Guise, of returning thence into Wales, and of proclaiming Mary queen of England, and Arthur Pole duke of Clarence. They confessed the indictment, but asserted, that they never never meant to execute these projects during the queen's life-time: they had only deemed such precautions requisite in case of her demise, which some pretenders to judicial astrology had assured them they might with certainly look for before the year expired. They were condemned by the jury; but pardoned by the queen.

After the commencement of the religious wars in France, which rendered that flourishing kingdom, for nearly forty years, a scene of horror and devastation, the great rival powers in Europe were Spain and England; and it was not long before an animosity, first political, then personal, broke out between the sovereigns of these countries. Philip II. of Spain, though he reached not any enlarged views of policy, was endowed with great industry and sagacity, a remarkable caution in his enterprizes, and an unusual foresight in all his measures. But prejudices had on him as pernicious effects as ever passion had on any other monarch; and the spirit of bigotry and tyranny by which he was actuated, with the fraudulent maxims which governed his counsels, excited the most violent agitation among his own people, engaged him in acts of the most enormous cruelty, and threw all Europe into combustion.

After Philip had concluded the peace at Chateau-Cambresis, and had remained some time in the Netherlands, to settle the government of that country, he embarked for Spain. Having met with a violent tempest on his voyage, in which part of his fleet was shipwrecked, and above a thousand men perished, he no sooner arrived in the harbour of Loredo, than he fell on his knees; and, after giving thanks for his deliverance, he vowed that his life, which was thus providentially saved, should thenceforth be entirely devoted to the defence of the Catholic faith, and the extirpation of heresy. His subsequent conduct corresponded to these professions. Finding that the new doctrines had penetrated into Spain, and were openly embraced by great numbers of his subjects, among whom were both priests and nuns, he let loose the rage of persecution against all who professed them, or were suspected of adhering to them; and by his violence he gave new edge, even to the usual cruelty of priests and inquisitors. He confined the archbishop of Toledo, Bartlemi di Caranza y Miranda, on suspicion of favouring the doctrine of the Reformation, founded on certain propositions contained in a catechism which he published; and, but for the interference of the pope, that prelate would have been brought to trial, and probably executed. He threw into prison Constantine Ponce, who had been confessor to his father, the emperor Charles; who had attended him during his retreat; and in whose arms that great monarch had terminated his life: and after this ecclesiastic died in confinement, he still ordered him to be tried and condemned for heresy, and his statue to be committed to the flames. He even deliberated whether he should not exercise like severity against the memory of his father, who was suspected, during his later years, to have indulged a propensity towards the Lutheran principles: in his unrelenting zeal for orthodoxy, he spared neither age, sex, nor condition. He attended the most barbarous executions: he was present, at Valladolid, at an Auto de fè; where, among the condemned Protestants, there was a nobleman of the name of Don Carlos di Sessa, who, when the executioners were conducting him to the stake, called out to the king for mercy; saying, "And canst thou thus, O king! witness the torments of thy subjects? Save us from this cruel death; we do not deserve it!"—"No!" Philip sternly replied; "I would myself carry wood to burn my own son, were he such a wretch as thou!" After which, he beheld the horrid spectacle that ensued with a composure and tranquillity that bespoke the most savage and ferocious heart. He issued rigorous orders for the prosecution of heretics in Spain, Italy, the Indies, and the Low Countries: and, having founded his determined tyranny on maxims of civil policy, as well as on principles of religion, he made it apparent, to all his subjects, that there was no method, except the most entire compliance, or most obstinate resistance, to escape or elude the severity of his vengeance.

During that extreme animosity which prevailed between the adherents of the opposite religions, the civil magistrate, who found it difficult, if not impossible, for the same laws to govern such enraged adversaries, was naturally led, by specious rules of prudence, in embracing one party, to declare war against the other, and to exterminate, by fire and sword, those persons, who, from abhorrence of his religion, had proceeded to an opposition of his power, and to a hatred of his person. If any prince possessed such enlarged views as to foresee that a mutual toleration would in time abate the fury of religious prejudices, he yet met with difficulties in reducing this principle to practice; and might deem the malady too violent to await a remedy which, though certain, must necessarily be slow in its operation. But Philip, though a profound hypocrite, and governed by self-interest, seems also to have been himself actuated by an imperious bigotry. By placing himself at the head of the Catholic party, he converted the zealots of the Romish faith into partizans of Spanish greatness; and by employing the powerful allurement of religion, he seduced, every where, the subjects from that allegiance which they owed to their native sovereign.

The course of events, guiding and concurring with choice, had placed Elizabeth in a situation diametrically opposite; and had raised her to be the glory, the bulwark, and the support of the numerous, though still persecuted, Protestants throughout the continent of Europe. More moderate in her temper than Philip, she found that the principles of her sect required not such extreme severity in her domestic government as was exercised by that monarch; and, having no object but self-preservation, she united her interests in all foreign negociations with those who were every where struggling under oppression, and guarding themselves against ruin and extermination.

During the life-time of Henry II. of France, and of his successor, the force of these principles was somewhat restrained, though not overcome; and the dread of uniting England with the French monarchy, engaged Philip to maintain a good correspondence with Elizabeth. Yet, even during this period, he rejected the garter which she sent him; he refused to ratify the ancient league between the house of Burgundy and England; he furnished ships to transport French forces into Scotland; he endeavoured to intercept the earl of Arran, who was hastening to join the malcontents in that country; and the most sagacious ministers of the queen still regarded his friendship as doubtful and precarious. But no sooner did the death of Francis II. put an end to Philip's apprehensions with regard to Mary's succession, than his animosity against Elizabeth began more openly to appear; and the interests of Spain and those of England were found opposite in every negociation and transaction.

The two great monarchies of the continent, France and Spain, were now possessed of nearly equal force, and were therefore naturally antagonists; and England, from its power and situation, was entitled to support its own dignity, as well as tranquillity, by holding the balance between them. Whatever incident tended too much to depress one of these rival powers, as it left the other without control, might be deemed contrary to the interests of England; yet so much were these great maxims of policy over-ruled by the disputes of theology, that Philip found an advantage in supporting the established government and religion of France; and Elizabeth in protecting the Protestant cause.

Catharine de Medicis, queen-regent of France, when reinstated in authority by the death of her son, Francis, had formed a plan of administration more subtle than judicious; and, balancing the Catholics with the Hugonots, the duke of Guise with the prince of Condé, she endeavoured to render herself necessary to both, and to establish her own dominion on their constrained obedience. But the equal counterpoise of power, which, among foreign nations, is the source of tranquillity, proves always the ground of quarrel between domestic factions. The constable, Montmorency, moved by zeal for the Catholic faith, joined himself to the duke of Guise: the king of Navarre, from the natural inconstancy of his temper, and his jealousy of the superior genius of his brother, embraced the same party: and Catharine, finding herself depressed by this combination, had recourse to Condé and the Hugonots, who were happy in the opportunity of fortifying themselves by her countenance and protection. An edict had been published, granting a toleration to the Protestants; but the interested violence of the duke of Guise broke through this agreement; and the two parties, after the fallacious tranquillity of a moment, renewed their mutual insults and injuries. Condé, Coligni, and D'Andelot, assembled their friends, and flew to arms: Guise and Montmorency got possession of the king's person, and constrained the queen-regent to embrace their party: fourteen armies were levied and put in motion in different parts of France: each province, each city, each family, was was agitated with intestine rage and animosity. The father was divided against the son; brother against brother; and women themselves, sacrificing the natural softness of their sex, and their humanity as well as their timidity to religious fury, distinguished themselves by acts of ferocity and valour. Wherever the Hugonots prevailed, the images were broken, the altars pillaged, the churches demolished, the monasteries consumed with fire: where success attended the Catholics, they burned the bibles, re-baptized the infants, constrained married persons to pass anew through the nuptial ceremony: and plunder, desolation, and bloodshed attended equally the triumph of both parties. The parliament of Paris itself, the seat of law and justice, instead of employing its authority to compose these fatal quarrels, increased the fury of the populace by publishing an infamous edict, by which it put the sword into the hands of the enraged multitude, and empowered the Catholics every where to massacre the Hugonots: and it was during this period, when men began to emerge from a state of ignorance; and in this nation, renowned for suavity of manners, that the theological rage, which had long been boiling in men's veins, appears to have attained its last stage of virulence and ferocity.

The king of Spain, alarmed at the progress which the Hugonots made in France, and dreading that the contagion would spread into the Low Countries, where he had lately established an iniquitous tribunal, similar to that of the inquisition, entered into a secret alliance with the princes of Guise, and had formed a league for the protection of the Catholic faith, and the total suppression of heresy. He now sent six thousand men, with a supply of money, to reinforce the Catholic party; and the prince of Condé, finding himself unequal to so great a combination, countenanced by the royal authority, was obliged to dispatch the Vidame of Chartres and Briguemaut to London, in order to crave the assistance and protection of Elizabeth. The greater part of the province of Normandy was possessed by the Hugonots: and Condé offered to put Havre de Grace into the hands of the English; on condition that, together with three thousand men for the garrison of that place, the queen should likewise send over three thousand to defend Dieppe and Rouen, and should furnish the prince with a supply of a hundred thousand crowns.

It was well known that Elizabeth, besides the general and essential interest of supporting the Protestants, and opposing the rapid progress of her enemy the duke of Guise, had other motives which engaged her to accept the proposal of the prince of Condé. When she concluded the peace at Chateau-Cambresis, she had good reason to suspect that France never would voluntarily fulfil the article which regarded the restitution of Calais; and many subsequent incidents had tended to confirm this suspicion. Considerable sums of money had been expended on the fortifications; long leases had been granted of the lands; and many inhabitants had been encouraged to build and settle there, by assurances that Calais should never be restored to the English. The queen therefore wisely concluded, that by obtaining possession of Havre, a place which commanded the mouth of the Seine, and was of greater importance than Calais, she should easily constrain the French to execute the treaty, and should have the glory of restoring to the crown that ancient possession, so much the favourite of the nation.

No measure could be more odious in France, than the conclusion of this treaty with Elizabeth. All men were naturally led to compare the conduct of Guise, who had finally expelled the English, and had debarred these dangerous and destructive enemies from all access into France, with the treasonable politics of Condé, who had again granted them an entrance into the heart of the kingdom. But how trivial and insignificant would have appeared even the most dreadful ravages of the hostile English troops, when compared with the bloody massacres of Amboise, Vassy, and Guillac, and with all the horrors which preceded and followed them! The prince of Condé was doubtless culpable for giving an enemy a free entrance into the heart of the kingdom; though impelled by necessity, and a well-founded dread of the artifices of the queen-regent, to the adoption of that dangerous measure: but the duke of Guise, with all the talents of a general, neither possessed the sentiments of a citizen, nor the feelings of a man; and, had success attended the conduct of his illustrious rival, his memory would never have been polluted by the malignant voice of turbulent envy.

In compliance with the treaty, three thousand English immediately took possession of Havre and Dieppe, under the command of sir Edward Poinings; but the latter place was found so little capable of defence, that it was immediately abandoned. The siege of Rouen was already formed by the Catholics, under the command of the king of Navarre and Montmorency; and it was with difficulty that Poinings could throw a small reinforcement into the place. Though these English troops behaved with gallantry, and though the king of Navarre was mortally wounded during the siege, the Catholics still continued the siege of the place, and carrying it at last by assault, put the whole garrison to the sword. The earl of Warwick, eldest son of the late duke of Northumberland, arrived soon after at Havre, with another body of three thousand English, and took on him the command of the place.

It was expected that the French Catholics, flushed with their success at Rouen, would immediately have formed the siege of Havre, which was not as yet in any condition of defence; but the intestine disorders of the kingdom soon diverted their attention to another part of the country. D'Andelot, seconded by the negociations of Elizabeth, had levied a considerable body of troops in Germany; and having arrived at Orleans, the seat of the Hugonots' power, he enabled the prince of Condé and the admiral to take the field, and oppose the progress of their enemies. After threatening Paris during some time, they directed their march towards Normandy, with a view of engaging the English to act in conjunction with them, and of fortifying themselves by the farther assistance which they expected from the zeal and vigour of Elizabeth. The Catholics, commanded by Montmorency, and under him by the duke of Guise, followed close on their rear; and, overtaking them at Dreux, compelled them to give battle. The contest was maintained with great obstinacy on both sides; and the action was distinguished by this singular event, that Condé and Montmorency, the commanders of the opposite armies, fell both of them prisoners into the hands of their enemies. The appearances of victory remained with Guise; but the admiral, whose fate it ever was to be defeated, and still to rise more terrible after his misfortunes, collected the remains of the army; and inspiring every bosom with his own unconquerable courage and constancy, kept them in a body, and subdued some considerable places in Normandy, which had fallen into the hands of the Catholics. Elizabeth, the better to support his cause, sent him a new supply of a hundred thousand crowns; and offered, if he could find merchants to lend him the money, to give her bond for another sum of equal amount.

The queen had emptied the coffers of her exchequer by the expences incurred by assisting the French Hugonots; and, in order to obtain a supply, she was under a necessity of summoning a parliament: an expedient to which she never willingly had recourse. The parliament accordingly met on the 12th of January, 1563 (e). The commons, on the opening of the session, by reason of the queen's illness, voted an address to her majesty; in which, after enumerating the dangers attending a broken and doubtful succession, and mentioning the evils which their forefathers had experienced from the contending titles of York and Lancaster, they entreated the queen to put an end to their apprehensions, by choosing some husband, whom they promised, whoever he were, gratefully to receive, and faithfully to serve, honour, and obey: or, if she had entertained any reluctance to the married state, they desired that the lawful successor might be named, at least appointed by act of parliament. They remarked that, during all the reigns which had passed since the conquest, the nation had never before been so unhappy as not to know the person who, in case of the sovereign's death, was legally entitled to fill the vacant throne. And they observed, that the fixed order which took place in inheriting the French monarchy, was one chief source of the usual tranquillity, as well as of the felicity of that kingdom (f).

(e) A little before the meeting of this assembly, the queen had fallen into a dangerous illness, the small-pox; and as her life, during some time, was despaired of, the people became more sensible of their perilous situation, derived from the uncertainty which, in case of her demise, attended the succession of the crown. The partizans of the queen of Scots, and those of the house of Suffolk, already divided the nation into factions; and every one foresaw, that, though it might be possible at present to determine the controversy by law, yet, if the throne were vacant, nothing but the sword would be able to fix a successor.

Among other laws which passed this session, was one which bore the title of "Assurance of the queen's royal power over all the states and subjects within her dominions." By this act, the asserting twice, by writing, word, or deed, the pope's authority, was subjected to the penalties of treason. All persons in holy orders were bound to take the oath of supremacy; as likewise were all who were advanced to any degree, either in the universities, or in common law; as well as all school-masters, officers in court, or members of parliament: and the penalty of their second refusal was declared to be treason. The first offence, in both cases, was punished by banishment and forfeiture. This rigorous statute was not extended to any of the degree of a baron; because it was not supposed that the queen could entertain any doubt with regard to the fidelity of persons possessed of such high dignity; though both example and common sense might have told her, that from them alone was any danger to the state to be apprehended. Lord Montacute made opposition to the bill; and asserted, in favour of the Catholics, that they disputed not, they preached not, they disobeyed not the queen, they caused no trouble, no tumults among the people. It is however probable that some suspicions of their secret conspiracies had made the queen and parliament increase their rigour against them; though it is also more than probable that they were mistaken in the remedy. Lord Montacute's remonstrances proved ineffectual, and the law was passed.

There was another point of discussion in which the parliament, this session, shewed more the goodness of their intention, than the soundness of their judgement. They passed a law against fond and fantastical prophecies, which had been observed to seduce the people into rebellion and disorder: but at the same time they enacted a statute, which was most likely to increase these and such like superstitions: it was levelled against conjurations, enchantments, and witchcraft: crimes which are never so effectually suppressed as by being totally neglected. After the parliament had granted the queen a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths, the session was finished by a prorogation. The convocation likewise voted the queen a subsidy of six shillings in the pound, payable in three years.

In the interim, the French factions, enflamed to the highest degree of animosity, continued that cruel war, which their intemperate zeal, actuated by the ambition of their leaders, had kindled in the kingdom. The admiral was successful in reducing the towns of Normandy which held out for the king; but he frequently complained, that the numerous garrison of Havre remained totally inactive, and was not employed in any military operation against the common enemy. Elizabeth, in taking possession of that place, had published a manifesto, in which she pretended, that her concern for the interests of the French king had engaged her in that measure, and that her sole intention was to oppose her enemies of the house of Guise, who held their prince in captivity, and employed his power to the destruction of his most worthy and loyal subjects. It was chiefly her desire to preserve appearances, joined to the great frugality of her temper, which made her, at this critical juncture, keep her soldiers in garrison, and restrain them from committing farther hostilities upon the enemy. The duke of Guise, in the mean time, was aiming a mortal blow at the power of the Hugonots, in direct opposition to the advice of his most experienced officers; and had commenced the siege of Orleans, of which D'Andelot was governor, and where the constable was detained prisoner. He had the prospect of speedy success in this undertaking; when he was assassinated by Poltrot, a young gentleman of Angouanois, whose zeal led him to attempt that criminal enterprize. The death of this gallant, but unprincipled nobleman, was a sensible loss to the Catholic party; and though the cardinal of Lorraine, his brother, still supported the interests of his family, the danger of their progress appeared not so imminent either to Elizabeth or to the French Protestants. The union, therefore, between these allies, which had been cemented by their common fears, began thenceforth to be less intimate; and the leaders of the Hugonots were persuaded to hearken to terms of a separate accommodation with Catherine de Medicis. Condé and Montmorency held conferences for settling the peace; and as they were both of them impatient to relieve themselves from captivity, they soon came to an agreement with regard to the conditions. The character of the queen-regent, whose ends were always violent, but who endeavoured, by subtilty and policy, rather than by force, to attain them, led her to embrace any plausible terms; and, in spite of the protestations of admiral Coligny, whose sagacity could easily discover the treachery of the court, the articles of agreement were finally settled between the parties. A toleration, under some restrictions, was again granted to the Protestants; a general amnesty was published; Condé was reinstated in his offices and governments; and after money was advanced for the payment of arrears due to the German troops, they were dismissed the kingdom and sent home.

According to the agreement between Elizabeth and the prince of Condé it had been stipulated, that neither party should conclude peace without the consent of the other; but this article was at present but little regarded by the leaders of the French Protestants. They only comprehended her so far in the treaty, as to obtain a promise, that, on her relinquishing Havre, her charges, and the money which she had advanced them, should be repaid her by the king of France, and that Calais, on the expiration of the term, should be restored to her. But she disdained to accept of these conditions; and thinking the possession of Havre a much better pledge for effecting her purpose, she sent Warwick orders to prepare himself against an attack from the now united power of the French.

The earl of Warwick, who commanded a garrison of six thousand men, besides seven hundred pioneers, had no sooner got possession of Havre, than he employed every means for putting it in a proper posture of defence; and after expelling the French from the town, he encouraged his soldiers to make the most desperate defence against the enemy. The constable Montmorency commanded the French army; the queen-regent herself, and the king, were present in the camp; even the prince of Condé joined the king's forces, and gave countenance to the siege; the admiral and D'Andelot alone, anxious still to preserve the friendship of Elizabeth, kept at a distance, and prudently refused to join their ancient enemies in an attack upon their allies.

(f) This subject, though extremely interesting to the nation, was not agreeable to the queen; and she was sensible that difficulties would attend every decision. A declaration in favour of the queen of Scots would form a settlement perfectly legal; because that princess was commonly allowed to possess the right of blood; and the exclusion given by Henry's will, deriving its weight chiefly from an act of parliament, would lose all authority, whenever the queen and parliament had made a new settlement, and restored the Scottish line to its place in the succession. But she dreaded giving encouragement to the Catholics by this declaration. She was sensible that every heir was, in some degree, a rival; but much more so one who enjoyed a claim for the present possession of the crown, and who had already advanced, in a very open manner, these dangerous pretensions. The power of Mary, both from the favour of the Catholic princes, and her connections with the house of Guise, not to mention the force and situation of Scotland, was well known to her; and she saw no security that this princess, if fortified by a sure prospect of succession, would not revive claims which she could never yet be prevailed on formally to relinquish. On the other hand, the title of the house of Suffolk was supported by the more zealous Protestants only; and it was very doubtful, whether even a parliamentary declaration in its favour would bestow on it such validity as to give satisfaction to the people. The republican part of the constitution had not yet acquired such an ascendant as to control, in any degree, the ideas of hereditary right; and as the legality of Henry's will was still disputed, though founded on the utmost authority which a parliament could confer; no one could be assured that a more recent act would be acknowledged to have greater validity. In the frequent revolutions which had of late taken place, the right of blood had still prevailed over religious prejudices; and the nation had ever shewn itself disposed rather to change its faith than the order of succession. This was sufficiently clear from the successions of Edward the Sixth and Mary, persons of very opposite sentiments. Even many Protestants declared themselves in favour of Mary's claim of inheritance; and nothing would occasion more general disgust, than to see the queen, openly and without reserve, take part against it. The Scottish princess also, finding herself injured in so sensible a point, would thenceforth act as a declared enemy; and, uniting together her foreign and domestic friends, the partizans of her present title and of her eventual succession, would soon bring matters to extremities against the present establishment. The queen, weighing all these inconveniencies, was determined to keep both parties in awe, by maintaining still an ambiguous conduct; and she rather chose that the people should run the hazard of contingent events, than that she should visibly endanger her throne, by employing expedients, which, at best, would not bestow entire security on the nation. She gave, therefore, an evasive answer to the applications of the commons; and when the house, at the end of the session, desired, by the mouth of their speaker, farther satisfaction on that head, she could not be prevailed on to make her reply more explicit. She only told them, contrary to her declarations in the beginning of her reign, that she had fixed no absolute resolution against marriage: and she added, that the difficulties attending the question of the succession were so great, that she would be contented, for the sake of her people, to remain some time longer in this vale of misery; and never should depart life with satisfaction, till she had laid some solid foundation for their future security.

From the force, and dispositions, and situations of both sides, it was expected that the siege would be attended with some memorable event; yet did France make a much easier acquisition of this important place, than was at first apprehended. The plague creeping in among the English soldiers; and being increased by their fatigue and bad diet (for they were but ill supplied with provisions,) it made such ravages, that sometimes a hundred men died of it in a day, and there remained not at last fifteen hundred in a condition to do duty. The French, meeting with such feeble resistance, carried on their attacks successfully; and having made two breaches, each of them sixty feet wide, they prepared for a general assault, which must have terminated in the slaughter of the whole garrison. Warwick, who had frequently warned the English counsel of the danger, and who had loudly demanded a supply of men and provisions, found himself obliged to capitulate, on the 28th of July, and to content himself with the liberty of withdrawing his garrison. The articles were no sooner signed, than lord Clinton, the admiral, who had been detained by contrary winds, appeared off the harbour with a reinforcement of three thousand men; and found the place surrendered to the enemy. To increase the misfortune, the infected army brought the plague with them into England, where it swept off great multitudes, particularly in the city of London. Above twenty thousand persons there died of it in one year.

Elizabeth, whose usual vigour and foresight had not appeared in this transaction, was now glad to conclude an inglorious war by a disadvantageous peace; and as the queen-regent desired to obtain leisure, in order to prepare measures for the extermination of the Hugonots, she readily hearkened to any reasonable terms of accommodation with England. It was agreed, on the 2nd of April, that the hostages which the French had given for the restitution of Calais, should be restored for two hundred and twenty thousand crowns; and that both sides should retain all their claims and pretensions.

Peace, however, still continued with Scotland; and Mary, whose tranquillity had been recently interrupted by a rebellion of the house of Gordon, (originating in a plot, real or pretended, to assassinate the earl of Murray,) evinced a serious anxiety to establish a solid and permanent friendship with the queen of England. Elizabeth, deeply versed in the arts of dissimulation, embraced with great apparent eagerness Mary's offer of amity, and artfully disguised the inveterate hatred which reigned in her bosom beneath the specious mask of courtesy and esteem. They wrote amicable letters every week to each other; and had adopted, in all appearance, the sentiments as well as style of sisters. Elizabeth punished one Hales, who published a book against Mary's title, in favour of the claims of the house of Suffolk; and, as the lord keeper Bacon was thought to have encouraged Hales in this undertaking, he fell under her displeasure, and it was with some difficulty he was able to give her satisfaction, and recover her favour. The two queens had agreed in the foregoing summer to an interview at York; that they might remove all difficulties with regard to Mary's ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh, and consider of the proper method for settling the succession to the crown of England. Elizabeth appeared so hearty in the cause of meeting Mary, that she gave orders that every preparation might be made for that purpose; she caused all the forms and ceremonies to be observed at York to be written down; and sent a passport for the Scottish queen and a thousand of her attendants. But she had been careful to premise, that her going to the appointed place should depend on the amicable termination of her disputes with France; and, at the time that she prescribed this condition, she had entered into a league with the prince of Condé, and was actually preparing to send troops to the continent. When the day arrived, she sent a message to Mary, to inform her that the extreme attention which the actual state of her affairs required, rendered it impossible for her to leave London: therefore delayed till next year the intended interview. The truth indeed seems to be, that Elizabeth never intended to allow Mary to enter her dominions.

Mary's close connections with the house of Guise, and her devoted attachment to her uncles, by whom she had been early educated and constantly protected, was the ground of just and unsurmountable jealousy to Elizabeth, who regarded them as her mortal and declared enemies, and was well acquainted with their dangerous character and ambitious projects. As sufficient time had now elapsed since the death of Mary's husband, several persons entertained an idea of espousing her; and Mary herself was sensible of the necessity of fixing her choice. Her uncles therefore made an offer of their niece to don Carlos, Philip's son; to the king of Sweden, the king of Navarre, the archduke Charles, the duke of Ferrara, the cardinal of Bourbon, who had only taken deacon's orders, from which he might easily be freed by a dispensation; and they were ready to marry her to any one who could strengthen their interests, or give inquietude and disturbance to Elizabeth. Elizabeth on her part was equally vigilant to prevent the execution of their schemes, and was particularly anxious, lest Mary should form any powerful foreign alliance, which might tempt her to revive her pretensions to the crown, and to invade the kingdom on the side where it was weakest and lay most exposed. As she believed that the marriage with the archduke Charles was the one most likely to take place, she used every expedient to prevent it; and besides remonstrating against it to Mary herself, she endeavoured to draw off the archduke from that pursuit, by giving him some hopes of success in his pretensions to herself, and by inviting him to a renewal of the former treaty of marriage. She always told the queen of Scots, that nothing would satisfy her but her espousing some English or Scottish nobleman, who would remove all grounds of jealousy, and cement the union between the kingdoms; and she offered, on this condition, to have her title examined, and to declare her successor to the crown. After keeping the matter in these general terms during a twelvemonth, she at last named lord Robert Dudley, now created earl of Leicester, as the person on whom she wished Mary would fix her choice, telling her that she looked upon him as a person fully deserving that dignity.

The earl of Leicester was a perfect courtier, supple, insinuating, polite, and attentive. In his address, he was easy and elegant; in his manners, polished and refined; in his conversation, light, airy, and amusing; in his form and countenance, open and engaging; with such an absolute command over his muscles and temper, as to be able to accommodate his gestures and opinions so as to afford pleasure and extort applause from men of the most opposite dispositions and sentiments. He was possessed, in short, of every external accomplishment which could captivate the eye or delude the senses. But, beneath this seducing exterior was concealed a soul, in whose dark circle was concentrated every weakness which can degrade, and almost every vice which can pollute humanity. He was equally destitute of talents and of virtue; unendowed with a single sentiment of honour, probity, or religion. Leicester, however, had acquired an entire ascendency over the sagacious and penetrating mind of Elizabeth, who was so prodigal of her favours and affection towards him, that he was encouraged to aspire to her bed; and, in the full hope of attaining the summit of his ambition, had qualified himself for that dignity, by throwing his wife, the heiress of one Robesart, down a pair of stairs, at Cumnor, near Oxford, and breaking her neck with the fall (g). The warm attachment of Elizabeth to a man of this description has by most been deemed extraordinary, and by many unaccountable: but it should be recollected, that Leicester (as Sir Robert Naunton says, in his "Fragmenta Regalia,") "was a very goodly person, and singular well featured, and all his youth well favoured, and of a sweet aspect:" and that the queen, with some few exceptions, "always took personage in the way of her election!"

Randolph and the earl of Bedford were appointed by the queen to settle the preliminaries of Leicester's marriage with Mary. The Scottish princess, as might be supposed, was highly offended at the insult, in asking her hand for a private gentleman, the subject of a sovereign whose equal she was; and particular for Leicester, a man notoriously vicious, and whose father and grandfather had perished on a scaffold. But she concealed her indignation from Randolph; contenting herself with observing that, in the proposed marriage, there was an extreme disproportion of rank; and that she could perceive, in such an alliance, no prospect of advantages sufficiently great to justify the degradation of her dignity. Elizabeth indeed had no intention of sacrificing to Mary the claims she had acquired over the person of Leicester: but as she was desirous that the queen of Scots should continue to live in a state of celibacy, she named a man whom she believed would be rejected; hoping by that means to gain time, and to elude the project of any other alliance. Mary herself, though extremely credulous and unsuspicious, soon perceived the duplicity and insincerity of her conduct; and, as Camden informs us, "suspected that she was deceitfully dealt withall; and that queen Elizabeth propounded this marriage to no other purpose, but to chuse for herself the best of all the suitors; or else to marry with Leicester the more excusably, if she, being an absolute queen, did first consent to the marriage of Leicester."

The proposal, however, was not more agreeable to Leicester than to Mary; and he always ascribed it to the contrivance of secretary Cecil, his avowed enemy, who he thought intended, by that artifice, to make him lose the friendship of the queen of Scotland, from the temerity of his pretensions; and that of Elizabeth, from jealousy of his attachment to another woman. "He therefore," says Camden, "in hopes of enjoying queen Elizabeth, secretly warned Bedford, by private letters, that he should not be eager in the matter."

Elizabeth's purpose of delay being fully answered, she receded from her offers, and withdrew the bait which she had thrown out to her rival. This duplicity of conduct, joined to some appearance of an imperious superiority, assumed by her, had drawn a peevish letter from Mary; and the seemingly amicable correspondence between the two queens was, during some time, interrupted. In order to make up the breach, the queen of Scots dispatched sir James Melvil to London; who has given us in his memoirs a particular account of his negociation.

Melvil was an agreeable courtier, a man of address and conversation; and it was recommended to him by his mistress, that, besides grave reasonings concerning politics and state-affairs, he should introduce more entertaining topics of conversation, suitable to the sprightly character of Elizabeth; and should endeavour by that means to insinuate himself into her confidence. Melvil, having been before introduced to Elizabeth, on his return from Germany, and most favourably received by her, found little difficulty in obeying the commands of his mistress; and he succeeded so well, that he threw the artful Elizabeth entirely off her guard; and made her discover the bottom of her heart, full of those levities and follies and ideas of rivalship, which possess the youngest and most frivolous of her sex. He talked to her of his travels, and forgot not to mention the different dresses of the ladies in different countries, and the particular advantages of each, in setting off the beauties of the shape and person. But as the glaring picture of her vanity will better appear from the pencil of Melvil himself, we shall make such extracts as will place it in the most striking point of view.

"In declaring my observations," says that ambassador, "of the customs of Duchland, Poland, and Italy, the buskins of the women was not forgot, and what countrey weed I thought best becoming gentlewomen. The queen (who was now in her thirty-second year) said she had clothes of every sort; which every day thereafter, so long as I was there, she changed. She asked me which of them became her best? I answered, in my judgement, the Italian dress: which answer, I found, pleased her well; for she delighted (afterwards) to shew her golden-coloured hair, wearing a caul and bonnet, as they do in Italy. Her hair (indeed) was more reddish than yellow, curled in appearance naturally. She desired to know of me what colour of hair was reputed best, and whether my queen's hair or her's was best, and which of them two was fairest (h). "I answered," says Melvil, "the fairness of them both was not their worst faults: but she was earnest with me to declare, which of them I judged fairest. I said, she was the fairest queen in England, and mine the fairest queen in Scotland. Yet she appeared earnest. I answered, they were both the fairest ladies in their countries; that her majesty was whiter, but my queen was very lovely. She enquired which of them was of highest stature? I said, My queen. Then, saith she, she is too high; for I myself am neither too high, nor too low. Then she asked what kind of exercises she used? I answered, that, when I received my dispatch, the queen was lately come from a Highland hunting; that when her more serious affairs permitted, she was taken up with reading histories; that sometimes she recreated herself upon the lute and virginals. She asked if she played well? I said, Reasonably, for a queen. That same day, after dinner, my lord of Hunsdean (Hunsdon) drew me up to a quiet gallery, that I might hear some music; and—but, he said, he durst not avow it—where I might hear the queen play upon the virginals. After I had hearkened awhile, I took by the tapestry that hung before the door of the chamber, and, seeing her back was towards the door, I entered within the chamber, and stood a pretty space, hearing her play excellently well. But she left off immediately, as soon as she turned about and saw me. She appeared to be surprized to see me; and came forward, seeming to strike me with her hand; alledging, she used not to play before men, but when she was solitary, to shun melancholy. She asked how I came there? I answered, As I was walking with my lord of Hunsdean, as we past by the chamber door, I heard such a melody as ravished me; whereby I was drawn in ere I knew how: excusing my fault of homeliness, (familiarity,) as being brought up in the court of France, where such freedom was allowed; declaring myself willing to endure what kind of punishment her majesty should be pleased to inflict upon me for so great an offence. Then she sate down upon a low cushion, and I upon my knees by her: but, with her own hand, she gave me a cushion to lay under my knees, which I at first refused; but she compelled me to take it. She then called for my lady Strafford out of the next chamber; for the queen was alone. She inquired whether my queen or she played best? In that, I found myself obliged to give her the praise. Here I took occasion to press earnestly my dispatch. She said, I was weary sooner of her company than she was of mine. I told her majesty, that, though I had no reason of being weary, I knew my mistress her affairs called me home. Yet I was stayed two days longer, that I might see her dance; as I was afterwards informed: which being done, she inquired of me, whether she or my queen danced best? I answered, the queen danced not so high and disposedly as she did."

From this singular display of a restless passion, in the gratification of which even the delicacy of her sex and the dignity of her rank were forgotten, Melvil thought himself justified in assuring his mistress, on his return to Scotland, that she had no reason ever to expect any cordial friendship from Elizabeth; and that all her professions of amity were full of falsehood and dissimulation."

After two years had been spent in evasions and artifices, Mary's subjects and counsellors, and probably herself, began to think it full time that some marriage was concluded; and lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lenox, was the person in whom most men's opinions and wishes centered. He was Mary's cousin-german, by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII. and daughter of the earl of Angus, by Margaret, queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where the earl of Lenox had constantly resided, since he had been banished by the prevailing power of the house of Hamilton: and as Darnley was now in his twentieth year, and was a very comely person, tall and delicately shaped, it was hoped that he might soon render himself agreeable to the queen of Scots. He was also by his father a branch of the same family with herself; and would, in espousing her, preserve the royal dignity in the house of Stuart: he was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and those who pretended to exclude her on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to recommend his title, and give it the preference. It seemed no inconsiderable advantage, that she could, by marrying, unite both their claims; and as he was by birth an Englishman, and could not, by his power or alliances, give any ground of suspicion to Elizabeth, it was hoped that the proposal of this marriage would not be unacceptable to that jealous princess.

Elizabeth was well informed of these intentions: and was secretly not displeased with the projected marriage between Darnley and the queen of Scots. She would (h) Elizabeth thus overshot two of her objects, as an acute and spirited writer has observed, by her eagerness in aiming at three in the same moment. Not waiting for an answer concerning hair in general, she added, instantly, another concerning Mary's hair in particular; and she subjoined a third to both, before either was answered, concerning the beauty of Mary. So much was her vanity on the wing in quest of its food, and so livelily flattering was it, from one expected scene of compliment to another! and she lost all reply from Melvil to her two questions concerning hair, by his naturally replying only to the concluding question concerning beauty.

rather have wished that Mary had continued for ever in a single life: but finding little probability of rendering this scheme effectual, she was satisfied with a choice, which freed her at once from the dread of a foreign alliance, and from the necessity of parting with Leicester, her favourite. In order to pave the way to Darnley's marriage, she secretly desired Mary to invite Lenox into Scotland, to reverse his attainder, and to restore him to his honours and fortune. And when her request was complied with, she took care, in order to preserve the friendship of the Hamiltons and her other partizans in Scotland, to blame openly this conduct of Mary. Hearing that the negociation for Darnley's marriage advanced apace, she gave that nobleman permission, on his first application, to follow his father into Scotland: but no sooner did she learn that the queen of Scots was taken with his figure and person, and that all measures were fixed for espousing him, than she exclaimed against the marriage; sent sir Nicholas Throgmorton to order Darnley, immediately, upon his allegiance, to return to England; threw the countess of Lenox and her second son into the Tower, in 1564, where they suffered a rigorous confinement; seized all Lenox's English estate; and though it was impossible for her to assign one single reason for her displeasure, she menaced, and protested, and complained, as if she had suffered the most grievous injury (i).

Nothing can be more unhappy for a people than to be governed by a sovereign attached to a religion different from the established; and it is scarcely possible that mutual confidence can ever, in such a situation, have place between the prince and his subjects. Mary's conduct had been hitherto, in every respect, unexceptionable, and even laudable; yet had she not made such progress in acquiring popularity, as might have been expected from her gracious deportment and agreeable accomplishments. Suspicions every moment prevailed on account of her attachment to the Catholic faith, and especially to her uncles, the open and avowed promoters of the scheme for exterminating the professors of the Reformed religion throughout all Europe. She still refused to ratify the acts of parliament which had established the Reformation; she made attempts for restoring to the Catholic bishops some part of their civil jurisdiction; and she wrote a letter to the council of Trent, in which, besides professing her attachment to the Catholic faith, she took notice of her title to succeed to the crown of England, and expressed her hopes of being able, in some period, to bring back all her dominions to the bosom of the church. The zealots among the Protestants were not wanting, in their turn, to exercise their virulence against her, which tended still more to alienate her from their faith. A law was enacted, making it capital, on the very first offence, to say mass any where, except in the queen's chapel; and it was with difficulty that even this small indulgence was granted her: the general assembly importuned her afresh to change her religion; and to renounce the blasphemous idolatry of the mass, with the tyranny of the Roman Antichrist; and to embrace the true religion of Christ Jesus. As she answered with temper, that she was not yet convinced of the falsity of her religion or the impiety of the mass; and that her apostacy would lose her the friendship of her allies on the continent; they replied, by assuring her, that their religion was undoubtedly the same which had been revealed by Jesus Christ, which had been preached by the apostles, and which had been embraced by the faithful in the primitive ages; that neither the religion of Turks, Jews, nor Papists, was built on so solid a foundation as theirs; that they alone, of all the various sects of religion spread over the face of the earth, were so happy as to be possessed of the truth; that those who hear, or rather who gaze on the mass, allow sacrilege, pronounce blasphemy, and commit most abominable idolatry; and that the friendship of the King of kings was preferable to all the alliances in the world.

The marriage of the queen of Scots had kindled afresh the zeal of the reformers, because the family of Lenox was believed to adhere to the Catholic faith; and though Darnley, who now bore the name of king Henry, went often to the established church, he could not, by this exterior compliance, gain the confidence and regard of the ecclesiastics. They rather laid hold of the opportunity to insult him to his face; and Knox scrupled not to tell him from the pulpit, "that God, for punishment of the offences and ingratitude of the people, was wont to commit the rule over them to boys and women." The populace of Edinburgh, instigated by such doctrines, began to meet and to associate themselves against the government. But what threatened more immediate danger to Mary's authority, were the discontents which prevailed among some of the principal nobility.

The duke of Chatelrault was displeased with the restoration, and still more with the aggrandizement, of the family of Lenox, his hereditary enemies; and entertained fears lest his own eventual succession to the crown of Scotland should be excluded by his rival, who had formerly advanced some pretensions to it. The earl of Murray found his credit at court diminished by the interest of Lenox and his son; and began to apprehend the revocation of some considerable grants, which he had obtained from Mary's bounty. The earls of Argyle, Rothes, and Glencairne, the lords Boyde and Ochiltry, Kirkaldy of Grange, Pittarow, were instigated by like motives; and as these were the persons who had most zealously promoted the Reformation, they were disgusted to find that the queen's favour was entirely ingrossed by a new cabal, the earls of Bothwel, Athol, Sutherland, and Huntley; men who were esteemed either lukewarm in religious controversy, or inclined to the Catholic party. The malcontent lords, when they found the queen's marriage entirely resolved on, entered into a confederacy for taking arms against their sovereign. They met at Stirling; pretended an anxious concern for the security of religion; framed engagements for mutual defence; and made applications to Elizabeth for assistance and protection (k). That princess, after publishing the expressions of her displeasure against the marriage, had secretly ordered her ambassadors Randolph and Throgmorton, to give in her name some promises of support to the malcontents; and had even sent them a supply of ten thousand pounds, to enable them to begin an insurrection.

No sooner was Mary informed of the meeting at Stirling, and the movements of the lords, than she summoned them to appear in court, in order to answer for their conduct; and having levied some forces to execute the laws, she obliged the rebels to leave the low countries, and take shelter in Argyleshire. That she might more effectually cut off their resources, she proceeded with the king to Glasgow, and forced them from their retreat. They appeared at Paisley in the neighbourhood with about a thousand horse; and passing the queen's army, proceeded to Hamilton, thence to Edinburgh, which they entered without resistance. They expected great reinforcements in this place, from the efforts of Knox and the seditious preachers; and they beat their drums, desiring all men to enlist, and to receive wages for the defence of God's glory. But the nation was in no disposition for rebellion: Mary was esteemed and beloved: her marriage was not generally disagreeable to the people: and the interested views of the malcontent lords were so well known, that their pretence of zeal for religion had little influence even on the ignorant populace. The king and queen advanced to Edinburgh at the head of their army: the rebels were obliged to retire into the south; and being pursued by a force which now amounted to eighteen thousand men, they were obliged to take shelter in England.

Elizabeth being disappointed in her expectations, disavowed all connection with the Scottish malcontents, and declared that she had neither given them encouragement nor assistance. She even carried farther her dissimulation and hypocrisy. Murray had come to London, with the abbot of Kilwinning, agent for Chatelrault; and she seduced them, by secret assurances of protection, to declare, before the ambassadors of France and Spain, that she had nowise contributed to their insurrection. No sooner had she extorted this confession from them, than she chased them from her presence, called them unwor-

(i) The politics of Elizabeth, though judicious, were usually full of duplicity and artifice; but never more so than in her transactions with the queen of Scots, where there entered so many little passions and narrow jealousies, that she durst not avow to the world the reasons of her conduct, scarcely to her ministers, and scarcely even to herself. But besides a womanish rivalship and envy against the marriage of this princess, she had some motives of interest for feigning a displeasure on the present occasion. It served her as a pretence for refusing to acknowledge Mary's title to the succession of England; a point to which, for good reasons, she was determined never to consent. And it was useful to her for a purpose still more unfriendly and dangerous, for encouraging the discontents and rebellion of the Scottish nobility and ecclesiastics.

(k) It appears from Randolph's letters that some offers had been made to that minister, of seizing Lenox and Darnley, and delivering them into queen Elizabeth's hands. Melvil confirms the same story, and says, that the design was acknowledged by the conspirators themselves.

thy traitors, declared that their detestable rebellion was of bad example to all princes; and assured them, that as she had hitherto given them no encouragement, so should they never thenceforth receive from her any assistance or protection. Throgmorton alone, whose honour was equal to his abilities, could not be prevailed on to conceal the part which he had acted in the enterprize of the Scottish rebels; and being apprised of the usual character of Elizabeth, he obtained an order of council to authorize the engagements which he had been obliged to make with them.

The banished lords, finding themselves so harshly treated by Elizabeth, had recourse to the clemency of their own sovereign; and after some solicitation and some professions of repentance, the duke of Chatelrault obtained his pardon, on condition that he should retire into France. Mary was more implacable against the earl of Murray and the other confederates, on whom she threw the blame of the enterprize; but as their friends continually applied to her, she agreed to give way to her natural temper, which inclined not to severity, and she seemed determined to restore them to favour. In this interval, Rambouillet arrived as ambassador from France, and brought her advice from her uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, in 1565, to whose opinion she always paid an extreme deference, by no means to pardon these Protestant leaders, who had been engaged in the rebellion.

The two opposite religions, in France, as well as other parts of Europe, were rather irritated than tired with their acts of mutual violence; and the peace granted to the Hugonots, as had been foreseen by the admiral Coligni, was intended only to lull them asleep, and prepare the way for their final and absolute destruction. The queen-regent made a pretence of travelling through the kingdom, in order to visit the provinces, and correct all the abuses arising from the late civil war; and after having held some conferences on the frontiers with the duke of Lorraine and the duke of Savoy, she came to Bayonne, where she was met by her daughter, the queen of Spain, and the duke of Alva. Nothing appeared in the congress of these two splendid courts, but gaiety, festivity, love, and joy; but amidst these smiling appearances were secretly fabricated schemes the most bloody, and the most destructive to the repose of mankind, that had ever been thought of in any age or nation. No less than a total and universal extermination of the Protestants by fire and sword was concerted by Philip and Catherine of Medicis; and Alva, agreeably to his fierce and sanguinary disposition, advised the queen-regent to commence the execution of this project, by the immediate massacre of all the leaders of the Hugonots. But that princess, though equally hardened against every humane sentiment, would not forego this opportunity of displaying her wit and refined politics; and she purposed, rather by treachery and dissimulation, which she called address, to lead the Protestants into the snare, and never to draw the sword till they were totally disabled from resistance. The cardinal of Lorraine, whose character bore a greater affinity to that of Alva, was a chief author of this barbarous association against the Reformers; and having connected hopes of success with the aggrandizement of his niece, the queen of Scots, he took care that her measures should correspond to those violent counsels which were embraced by the other Catholic princes. In consequence of this scheme, he turned her from the road of clemency, which she intended to have followed; and made her resolve on the total ruin of the banished lords. A parliament was summoned at Edinburgh, in 1566, for attainting them; and as their guilt was palpable and avowed, no doubt was entertained but sentence would be pronounced against them. It was by a sudden and violent incident, which, in the issue, brought on the ruin of Mary herself, that they were saved from the rigour of the law.

The matrimonial connexion of the queen of Scots with lord Darnley was so natural, and so inviting in all its circumstances, that it had been precipitately agreed to by that princess and her council; and while she was allured by his youth and beauty, and exterior accomplishments, she had at first overlooked the qualities of his mind, which by no means corresponded to the excellence of his outward figure. Violent, yet variable in his resolutions; insolent, yet credulous and easily governed by flatterers; he was destitute of all gratitude, because he thought no favours equal to his merit; and being addicted to low pleasures, he was equally incapable of all true sentiments of love and tenderness. The queen of Scots, in the first effusions of her fondness, says Hume, had taken a pleasure in exalting him beyond measure: she had granted him the title of king; she had joined his name with her own in all public acts; she intended to have procured him from the parliament a matrimonial crown; but having leisure afterwards to remark his weakness and vices, she began to see the danger of her profuse liberality, and was resolved thenceforth to proceed with more reserve in the trust which she should confer upon him. His resentment against this conduct served but the more to increase her disgust; and the young prince, enraged at her imagined neglects, pointed his vengeance against every one whom he deemed the cause of this change in her measures and behaviour.

There was in the court, one David Rizzio (l), who had of late obtained a very extraordinary degree of confidence and favour with the queen of Scots. Rizzio, who had connected his interests with the partizans of the church of Rome, was the declared enemy of the banished lords; and by promoting the prosecution against them, he had exposed himself to the animosity of their friends and retainers. A scheme was also thought to be formed for revoking some exorbitant grants made during the queen's minority; and even the nobility who had become possessed of the ecclesiastical benefices, began to think themselves less secure in the possession of them. The earl of Morton, chancellor, was affected by all these considerations, and still more by a rumour spread abroad, that Mary intended to appoint Rizzio chancellor in his place, and to bestow that dignity on a mean and upstart foreigner, ignorant of the laws and language of the country. So indiscreet had this princess been in her kindness to Rizzio, that even that strange report met with credit, and proved a great means of accelerating the ruin of the favourite. Morton, insinuated himself into Henry's confidence, and employed all his art to inflame the discontent and jealousy of that prince: he even persuaded him, that the only mean of freeing himself from the indignities under which he laboured, was to bring the base stranger to the fate which he had so well merited, and which was so passionately desired by the whole nation. George Douglas, natural brother to the countess of Lenox, concurred in the same advice: and the lords Ruthven and Lindesey, being consulted, offered their assistance in the enterprize; nor was even the earl of Lenox, the king's father, averse to the design. But as these conspirators were well acquainted with Henry's levity, they engaged him to sign a paper, in which he avowed the undertaking, as tending to the glory of God and the advancement of religion, and promised to protect them against every consequence which might ensue upon the assassination of Rizzio. Their measures being concerted, a messenger was dispatched to the banished lords, who were hovering near the borders; and they were invited by the king to return to their native country.

(l) David Rizzio was a Piedmontese, of mean birth, son of a teacher of music, himself a musician; and finding it difficult to subsist by his art in his own country, he had followed into Scotland, with the hopes of bettering his fortunes, an ambassador, whom the duke of Savoy sent thither to compliment Mary on her accession, some time after her first arrival. He possessed a good ear and tolerable voice; and as that princess found him useful to complete her band of music, she retained him in her service after the departure of his master. Raulet, her secretary for French dispatches, having, some time after, incurred her displeasure, she promoted Rizzio to that office, which gave him frequent opportunities of approaching her person and insinuating himself into her favour. He was shrewd and sensible, as well as aspiring, much beyond his rank and education; and he made so good use of the access which fortune had procured him, that he was soon regarded as her chief confident, and even minister of the queen. It was likewise remarked, that he speedily acquired a splendid fortune. He was consulted on all occasions; no favours could be obtained but by his intercession; all suitors were obliged to gain him by presents and flattery; and the man, insolent from his new exaltation, as well as rapacious in his acquisitions, soon drew on himself the hatred of the nobility and of the whole kingdom. He had at first employed his credit to promote Darnley's marriage; and a firm friendship seemed to be established between them: but on the subsequent change of the queen's sentiments, it was easy for Henry's friends to persuade him that Rizzio was the real author of her indifference, and even to rouse in his mind jealousies of a more dangerous nature. The favourite was of a disagreeable figure, but was not past his youth; and though the opinion of his criminal correspondence with Mary might seem of itself unreasonable, if not absurd, a suspicious husband could find no other means of accounting for that lavish and imprudent kindness with which she honoured him. The rigid austerity of the ecclesiastics, who could admit of no freedoms, contributed to spread this opinion among the people; and as Rizzio was universally believed to be a pensionary of the pope's, and to be deeply engaged in all schemes against the Protestants, any story to his and Mary's disadvantage, received an easy credit among the zealots of that communion.

This design, so atrocious in itself, was rendered still more so by the circumstances which attended its execution. Mary, who was in the sixth month of her pregnancy, was supping in private, on the 9th of March, 1566, and had at table the countess of Argyle, her natural sister, with Rizzio, and others of her servants. The king entered the room by a private passage, and stood at the back of Mary's chair: Lord Ruthven, George Douglas, and other conspirators, being all armed, rushed in after him; and the queen of Scots, terrified with the appearance, demanded of them the reason of this rude intrusion. They told her, that they intended no violence against her person; but meant only to bring that villain, pointing at Rizzio, to his deserved punishment. Rizzio, aware of the danger, ran behind his mistress, and seizing her by the waist, called aloud to her for protection; while she interposed in his behalf, with cries, and menaces, and entreaties. The impatient assassins, regardless of her efforts, rushed upon their prey, and by overturning every thing which stood in their way, increased the horror and confusion of the scene. George Douglas, seizing Henry's dagger, thrust it in the body of Rizzio, who, screaming with fear and agony, was torn from Mary by the other conspirators, and pushed into the antichamber, where he was dispatched with fifty-six wounds. The unhappy princess, informed of his fate, immediately dried her tears, and said, she would weep no more, she would now think of revenge.

The assassins, apprehensive of Mary's resentment, detained her prisoner in the palace; and the king dismissed all who seemed willing to attempt her rescue, by telling them, that nothing was done without his orders, and that he would be careful of the queen's safety. Murray and the banished lords appeared two days after; and Mary, whose anger was now engrossed by injuries more recent and violent, was willingly reconciled to them; and she even received her brother with tenderness and affection. They obtained an acquittal from parliament, and were reinstated in their honours and fortunes. The accomplices also in Rizzio's murder applied to her for a pardon; but she artfully delayed compliance, and told them, that so long as she was detained in custody, and was surrounded by guards, any deed, which she should sign, would have no validity. Meanwhile, she had gained the confidence of her husband, by her persuasion and caresses; and no sooner were the guards withdrawn, than she engaged him to escape with her in the night-time, and take shelter in Dunbar. Many of her subjects here offered her their services; and Mary, having collected an army, of about eight thousand men, which the conspirators had no power to resist, advanced to Edinburgh, and obliged them to fly into England, where they lived in great poverty and distress. They made applications however to the earl of Bothwel, a new favourite of Mary's; and that nobleman, desirous of strengthening his party by the accession of their interest, was able to pacify her resentment; and soon after procured them liberty to return into their own country.

But Mary was implacable against her husband alone, whose person was before disagreeable to her, and who, by his violation of every tie of gratitude and duty, had now drawn on him her highest resentment. She engaged him to disown all connections with the assassins, to deny any concurrence in their crime, even to publish a proclamation containing a falsehood so notorious to the whole world; and having thus made him expose himself to universal contempt, and rendered it impracticable for him ever to acquire the confidence of any party, she threw him off with disdain and indignation. As if she had been making an escape from him, she suddenly withdrew to Alloa, a seat of the earl of Marre's; and when Henry followed her thither, she suddenly returned to Edinburgh; and gave him every where the strongest proofs of displeasure, and even of antipathy. She encouraged her courtiers in their neglect of him; and she was pleased, that his mean equipage and small train of attendants should draw on him the contempt of the very populace. He was permitted, however, to have apartments in the castle of Edinburgh, which Mary had chosen for the place of her delivery. She there brought forth a son, on the 19th of June; and immediately dispatched sir James Melvil to carry intelligence of the event to Elizabeth. Melvil tells us, that this princess, the evening of his arrival in London, had given a ball to her court at Greenwich, and was displaying all that spirit and alacrity, which usually attended her on these occasions; but when news arrived of the prince of Scotland's birth, all her joy was damped: she sunk into melancholy; she reclined her head upon her arm; and complained to some of her attendants, that the queen of Scots was mother of a fair son, while she herself was but a barren stock. Next day, however, at the reception of the ambassador, she resumed her former dissimulation, put on a joyful countenance, gave Melvil thanks for the haste he had made in conveying to her the agreeable intelligence, and expressed the utmost cordiality and friendship to her sister. Some time after, she dispatched the earl of Bedford, with her kinsman George Cary, son of lord Hunsdon, in order to officiate at the baptism of the young prince; and she sent by them some magnificent presents to Mary.

The birth of a son gave additional zeal to Mary's partizans in England; and even men of the most opposite parties began to call loudly for the settlement of the succession. This was manifest in a new session of parliament, which met on the 30th of September after six prorogations. The house of peers, which had hitherto forborne to touch on this delicate point, here took the lead; and the house of commons soon after imitated the zeal of the lords. Molineux opened the matter in the lower house, and proposed that the question of the succession and that of supply should go hand in hand; as if it were intended to constrain the queen, by constitutional means, to a compliance with the request of her parliament. The courtiers endeavoured to elude the debate: sir Ralph Sadler told the house, that he had heard the queen positively affirm, that, for the good of her people, she was determined to marry. Secretary Cecil and sir Francis Knollys gave their testimony to the same effect; as did also sir Ambrose Cave, chancellor of the duchy, and sir Edward Rogers, comptroller of the household. But few of the members, however, gave any credit to this intelligence; and it was considered merely as an artifice, by which she endeavoured to retract that positive declaration, which she had made in the beginning of her reign, "that she meant to live and die a virgin." The ministers, therefore, gained no other advantage than that of engaging the house, for the sake of decency, to join the question of the queen's marriage with that of a settlement of the crown; and the commons were proceeding with great earnestness in the debate, and had even appointed a committee to confer with the lords, when express orders were brought them from Elizabeth to proceed no farther in the matter. Cecil told them, that she pledged to the house the word of a queen for her sincerity in her intentions to marry; that the appointment of a successor would be attended with great danger to her person; that she herself had had experience, during the reign of her sister, how much court was usually paid to the next heir, and what dangerous sacrifices men were commonly disposed to make of their present duty to their future prospects; and that she was therefore determined to delay, till a more proper opportunity, the decision of that important question. The house was not satisfied with these reasons, and still less with the command, prohibiting them all debate on the subject. Paul Wentworth, a spirited member, went so far as to question whether such a prohibition were not an infringement of the liberties and privileges of the house. Some, particularly Bell and Monson, two eminent lawyers, and one Dutton; men whose names deserve to be recorded with that of Wentworth, for their attempts to defend the house from the attacks of despotism, even ventured to violate that profound respect which had hitherto been reserved to the queen. They maintained, as we learn from Camden, "That kings are bound to design a successor; that the love of the subjects is the strongest, yea, the impregnable fort of princes, and their only prop and pillar. But this love," said they, "princes cannot get, unless they provide that it may goe well with their subjects, not onely whilest they live themselves, but after their death also; and this can by no means be effected, unless there be a successor certainly known. That the queen, by not designing a successor, doth both provoke the wrath of God, and alienate the hearts of her people: but, that she may have God favourable towards her, and her people most loving and fast tied unto her, and that she may set up monuments for herself in men's minds which shall never decay, let her design a successor. If not, she may be reckoned of, not as a nurse, not as a mother, of her country; but as a step-mother, nay, as a parricide, of her country, which had rather that England, which now breathed with her breath, should expire together with her than survive her. That not princes but cowards, and such as are hated of their own people, and timorous women, have ever stood in fear of their successours; and the dangers of a designed successour are not to be feared of that prince which is fortified with the love of his people." This Camden calls "twitting the authority of the queen's majesty too much;" but we trust that, whenever an attempt shall be made to extend authority, whether sovereign or subordinate, beyond its constitutional bounds, it will meet with an opposition, equally bold, manly, and spirited. The queen, hearing of these debates, sent for the speaker, and after reiterating her former prohibition, she bade him inform the house, that if any member remained still unsatisfied, he might appear before the privy council, and there assign his reasons. As the members evinced a disposition, notwithstanding these peremptory orders, still to proceed upon the question, Elizabeth thought proper, by a message, to revoke them, and to allow the house liberty of debate. They were so mollified by this condescension, that they thenceforth conducted the matter with more calmness; and even voted her a supply, to be levied at three payments, of a subsidy and a fifteenth, without annexing any condition to it. On the 2nd of January, 1567, the queen dissolved the parliament, and told them, that their proceedings had contained much dissimulation and artifice; that, under the plausible pretences of marriage and succession, many of them covered very malevolent intentions towards her; but that she reaped this advantage from their attempts, that she could distinguish her friends from her enemies. "But do you think," added she, "that I am unmindful of your future security, or will be negligent in settling the succession? This is the chief object of my concern; as I know myself to be liable to mortality. Or do you apprehend, that I meant to encroach on your liberties? No: it was never my meaning; I only intended to stop you before you approached the precipice. All things have their time; and though you may be blessed with a sovereign more wise or more learned than I, yet I assure you, that no one will ever rule over you, who shall be more careful of your safety. And therefore, henceforward, whether I live to see the like assembly or no, or whoever holds the reins of government, let me warn you to beware of provoking your sovereign's patience, so far as you have done mine. But I shall now conclude, that, notwithstanding the disgusts I have received (for I mean not to part with you in anger), the greater part of you may assure themselves that they go home in their prince's good graces."

Elizabeth had received the subsidy without any condition; but as it was believed, that the commons had given her that gratuity with a view of engaging her to yield to their requests, she thought proper, on her refusal to settle the succession, voluntarily to remit the third payment; and she said, "that money in her subjects' purses was as good to her as in her own exchequer."

Though Elizabeth was able to elude, for the present, the applications of parliament, the friends of the queen of Scots daily multiplied in England; and besides the Catholics, many of whom kept a treasonable correspondence with her, and were ready to rise at her command; Elizabeth's court itself was full of her partizans. The duke of Norfolk, the earls of Leicester, Pembroke, Bedford, Northumberland, sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and many of the considerable men in England, except Cecil, seemed convinced of the necessity of declaring her the successor. None but the more zealous Protestants adhered either to the countess of Hertford, or to her aunt, Eleanor, countess of Cumberland; and as the marriage of the former seemed liable to some objections, and had been declared invalid, (though by a daring exertion of tyranny,) men were alarmed, even on that side, with the prospect of new disputes concerning the succession. Mary's behaviour also, so moderate towards the Protestants, and so gracious towards all men, had procured her universal respect; and the public was willing to ascribe any imprudences, into which she had fallen, to her youth and inexperience. All these flattering prospects were blasted by subsequent incidents; where her egregious indiscretions, or her atrocious crimes, threw her from the height of her prosperity, and involved her in infamy and in ruin.

The earl of Bothwel was a nobleman of high birth, extensive influence, and considerable property in Scotland; and though not distinguished by any talents either of a civil or military nature, he had made a figure in that party, which opposed the greatness of the earl of Murray, and the more rigid reformers. But he was a man of profligate manners; had involved his opulent fortune in great debts; and even reduced himself to beggary by his profuse expences; and seemed to have no resource but in desperate counsels and enterprizes. He had been accused more than once of an attempt to assassinate Murray; and though the frequency of these accusations on all sides diminish somewhat the credit due to any particular imputation, they prove sufficiently the prevalence of that detestable practice in Scotland, and may in that view serve to render such rumours the more credible. This man had of late acquired the favour and entire confidence of Mary; and all her measures were directed by his advice and authority. Reports were spread of more particular intimacies between them; and these reports gained ground from the continuance or rather increase of her hatred towards her husband. That young prince was reduced to such a state of desperation, by the neglects which he underwent from his queen and the courtiers, that he had once resolved to fly secretly into France or Spain, and had even provided a vessel for that purpose. Some of the most considerable nobility, on the other hand, observing her rooted aversion to him, had proposed some expedients for a divorce; and though Mary is said to have spoken honourably on the occasion, and to have embraced the proposal no farther than it should be found consistent with her own honour and her son's legitimacy, men were inclined to believe, that the difficulty of finding proper means for effecting that purpose, was the real cause of laying aside all farther thoughts of it. So far were the suspicions against her carried, that when Henry, discouraged with the continual proofs of her hatred, left the court and retired to Glasgow, an illness of an extraordinary nature, with which he was seized immediately on his arrival in that place, was universally ascribed by her enemies to a dose of poison, which, it was pretended, she had administered to him (m).

The queen, however, took a journey to Glasgow on purpose to visit him during his sickness; and it is said, that she behaved towards him with great tenderness, that she had brought him along with her, and that she appeared thenceforth determined to live with him on a footing more suitable to the connections between them. Henry, naturally uxorious, and not distrusting this sudden reconciliation, put himself implicitly into her hands, and attended her to Edinburgh. She lived in the palace of Holy-rood-house; but as the situation of the place was low, and the noise and bustle of a court might disturb him in his present infirm state of health, these reasons were assigned for fitting up an apartment for him in a solitary house, at some distance, called the Kirk of Field. Mary here gave him marks of kindness and attachment; she conversed cordially with him; and she lay some nights in a room below his; but on the ninth of February, she told him, that she would pass that night in the palace, because the marriage of one of her servants was there to be celebrated in her presence. About two o'clock in the morning of the 10th of February, 1567, the whole town was much alarmed at hearing a great noise; and was still more astonished, when it was discovered that the noise came from the king's house, which was blown up by gun-powder; that his dead body was found at some distance in a neighbouring field; and that no marks either of fire, contusion, or violence appeared upon it (n).

No doubt could be entertained but Henry was murdered; and general conjecture soon pointed towards the earl of Bothwel as the author of the crime. But as his favour with Mary was visible, and his power great, no one ventured to declare openly his sentiments; and all men remained in silence and mute astonishment. Voices, however, were heard in the streets, during the darkness of the night, (m) Although the idea of Darnley's being poisoned has been since combated by various historians; yet from all the subsequent events, as well as from the characters of Murray and Bothwel, Morton and Lidington, and the known prevalence of the dreadful practice of poisoning at this period in Scotland, there can be little reason to doubt that the king was actually poisoned; and that the conspirators had corrupted some of his domestics to take this method of destroying him. Whatever was the cause, the effects were violent, and had nearly proved fatal: he was racked with intolerable pains; he was covered with pustules of a black and putrid nature; and his life was in the most imminent danger. He, however, recovered from the violence of the disease.

(n) It was imagined that Henry had been strangled before the house was blown up. But this supposition is contradicted by the confession of the criminals; and there is no necessity to admit it in order to account for the condition of his body. There are many instances that men's lives have been saved who had been blown up in ships. Had Henry fallen on water he had not probably been killed. Hume.

night, proclaiming Bothwel, and even Mary herself, to be murderers of the king; bills were secretly affixed on the walls to the same purpose; offers were made, that, upon giving proper securities, his guilt should be openly proved. But after one proclamation from the court, offering a reward and indemnity to any one that would discover the author of that villainy, greater vigilance was employed in searching out the spreaders of the libels and reports against Bothwel and the queen, than in tracing the contrivers of the king's assassination, or detecting the regicides.

The news of the murder of Darnley reaching the earl of Lenox, who lived at a distance from court, in poverty and contempt, roused the indignation of that nobleman, who, enraged at the destruction of his son, wrote to the queen, imploring speedy justice against the assassins; among whom he named the earl of Bothwel, sir James Balfour, and Gilbert Balfour his brother, David Chalmers, and four others of the queen's household; all of them persons who had been mentioned in the bills affixed to the walls at Edinburgh. Mary took his demand of speedy justice in a very literal sense; and allowing only fifteen days for the examination of this important affair, she sent a citation to Lenox, requiring him to appear in court, and prove his charge against Bothwel. This nobleman, meanwhile, and all the other persons accused by Lenox, enjoyed their full liberty; Bothwel himself was continually surrounded with armed men; took his place in council; lived during some time in the house with Mary; and seemed to possess all his wonted confidence and familiarity with her. Even the castle of Edinburgh, a place of great consequence in this critical time, was entrusted to him, and under him, to his creature, sir James Balfour, who had himself been publicly charged as an accomplice in the king's murder. Lenox, who had come as far as Stirling, with a view of appearing at the trial, was informed of all these circumstances; and reflecting on the small train which attended him, he began to entertain very just apprehensions from the power, insolence, and temerity of his enemy. He wrote to Mary, desiring that the day of trial might be prorogued; and conjured her, by all the regard which she bore to her own honour, to employ more leisure and deliberation in determining a question of such extreme moment. No regard was paid to his application: the jury was enclosed, of which the earl of Caithness was chancellor; and though Lenox, foreseeing this precipitation, had ordered Robert Cuningham, one of his retinue, to appear in court, and protest, in his name, against the acquittal of the criminal, the jury proceeded to a verdict. The verdict was such as it behoved them to give, where neither accuser nor witness appeared; and Bothwel was absolved from the king's murder, on the 12th of April (o). The jury, however, apprehensive that their verdict would give great scandal, and perhaps expose them afterwards to some danger, entered a protest, in which they represented the necessity of their proceedings (p).

Two days after this extraordinary transaction, a parliament was held; and though the verdict in favour of Bothwel was attended with such circumstances as strongly confirmed, rather than diminished, the general opinion of his guilt, he was the person chosen to carry the royal sceptre on the first meeting of the national assembly. In this parliament, a rigorous act was made against those who set up defamatory bills; but no notice was taken of the king's murder. The favour which Mary openly bore to Bothwel, kept every one in awe; and the effects of this terror appeared more plainly in another transaction, which ensued immediately upon the dissolution of the parliament. A bond or association was framed; in which the subscribers, after relating the acquittal of Bothwel by a legal trial, and mentioning his offer to prove his innocence by single combat, oblige themselves, in case any person should afterwards impute to him the king's murder, to defend him with their whole power against such calumniators. After this promise, which implied no great assurance in Bothwel of his own innocence, the subscribers mentioned the necessity of their queen's marriage, in order to support the government; and, on the 19th of the same month, they recommended Bothwel to her as a husband. This paper was subscribed by all the considerable nobility there present. In a country divided by violent factions, such a concurrence in favour of one nobleman, nowise distinguished above the rest, except by his flagitious conduct, could never have been obtained, had not every one been certain, at least firmly persuaded, that Mary was fully determined on this measure (q). Nor would such a motive have sufficed to influence men, commonly so stubborn and intractable, had they not been taken by surprize, been ignorant of each other's sentiments, and overawed by the present power of the court, and by the apprehensions of farther violence, from persons so little governed by any principles of honour and humanity. Even with all these circumstances, the subscription to this paper may justly be regarded as a reproach to the nation.

The subsequent measures of Bothwel were equally precipitate, audacious, and base. Mary having gone to Stirling to pay a visit to her son, Bothwel assembled a body of eight hundred horse, on pretence of pursuing some robbers on the borders, and having waylaid her on her return, he seized her person near Edinburgh, on the 24th of April, and carried her to Dunbar, with an avowed design of forcing her to yield to his purpose. Sir James Melvil, one of her retinue, was carried along with her, and says not, that he saw any signs of reluctance or constraint: he was even informed, as he tells us, by Bothwel's officers, that the whole transaction was managed in concert with her. A woman, indeed, of that spirit and resolution, which is acknowledged to belong to Mary, does not usually, on these occasions, give such marks of opposition to real violence, as can appear anywise doubtful or ambiguous. Some of the nobility, however, in order to put matters to farther trial, sent her a private message; in which they told her, that if, in reality, she lay under force, they would use all their efforts to rescue her. Her answer was, "that she had indeed been carried to Dunbar by violence, but ever since her arrival had been so well treated, that she willingly remained with Bothwel." No one gave himself thenceforth any concern to relieve her from a captivity, which was believed to proceed entirely from her own connivance and approbation.

This unusual conduct was at first ascribed to Mary's sense of the infamy attending her purposed marriage; and her desire of finding some colour to gloss over the irregularity of her conduct. But a pardon, was given to Bothwel, a few days after, which made the public carry their conjectures somewhat farther. In this deed, Bothwel received a pardon for the violence committed on the queen's person; and for all other crimes: a clause, by which the murder of the king was indirectly forgiven. The rape was then conjectured to have been only a contrivance, in order to afford a pretence for indirectly remitting a crime, of which it would have appeared scandalous to make openly any mention.

There still, however, remained one difficulty, which it was not easy to foresee how the queen and Bothwel, determined as they were to execute their shameful purpose, could find expedients to overcome. The man who had procured the subscription of the nobility, recommending him as a husband to the queen, and who had acted this seeming violence on her person, in order to force her consent, had been married two years before to another woman; to a woman of merit, of a noble family, sister to the earl of Huntley. A suit was therefore commenced for a divorce between Bothwel and his wife; and this suit was opened at the same instant in two different, or rather opposite (o) Immediately after his acquittal, the earl of Bothwel, vain of his good fortune, disposed to make a shew of his prowess, or influenced by the maxims of chivalry, set up in a conspicuous place a writing, subscribed by himself, challenging to single combat any person of equal rank with himself, who should dare to affirm that he was guilty of the king's murder. To this challenge an answer was published; in which the defiance was accepted, upon the condition that security should be given for a fair and equal conflict: but no name being subscribed to this paper, it was not understood to correspond with the law of arms. No step therefore was taken to the celebration of this duel; and Bothwel had the honour of atchieving a feat which has been compared, not improperly, to the bravado of a champion at a coronation.

(p) It is remarkable, that on this occasion, the indictment was laid against Bothwel for committing the crime on the ninth of February, not the tenth, the real day on which Henry was assassinated. The interpretation generally put upon this error, too gross, it was thought, to have proceeded from mistake, was, that the secret council, by whom Mary was governed, not trusting entirely to precipitation, violence, and authority, had provided this plea, by which they ensured, at all adventures, a plausible pretence for acquitting Bothwel.

(q) Mary herself confessed, in her instructions to the ambassadors whom she sent to France, that Bothwel persuaded all the noblemen that their application in favour of his marriage was agreeable to her. Murray afterwards produced to queen Elizabeth's commissioners, a paper signed by Mary, by which she permitted them to make this application to her. This permission was a sufficient declaration of her intentions, and was esteemed equivalent to a command. They even asserted, that the house in which they met was surrounded with armed men.

posite courts; in the court of the archbishop of St. Andrews, which was Popish, and governed itself by the canon law; and in the new consistorial or commissariot court, which was Protestant, and was regulated by the principles of the reformed teachers. The plea, advanced in each court, was so calculated as to suit the principles which there prevailed: in the archbishop's court, the pretence of consanguinity was employed, because Bothwel was related to his wife in the fourth degree; in the commissariot court, the accusation of adultery was made use of against him. The parties too, who applied for the divorce, were different in the different courts: Bothwel was the person who sued in the former; his wife in the latter. And the suit in both courts was opened, pleaded, examined, and decided with the utmost precipitation; and a sentence of divorce was pronounced in four days.

The divorce being obtained, it was thought proper that Mary should be conducted to Edinburgh, and appear before the courts of judicature, and acknowledge herself restored to freedom. This was contrived with a view to obviate all doubts concerning the validity of her marriage. Orders were then given to publish in the church the banns between the queen and the duke of Orkney; (for that was the title which Bothwel now bore;) and Craig, a minister of Edinburgh, was applied to for that purpose, who positively refused to comply with their request (r).

Notwithstanding the remonstrances of Craig and others, the marriage was, on the 15th of May, solemnized by the bishop of Orkney, a Protestant, who was afterwards deposed by the church for this scandalous compliance. Few of the nobility appeared at the ceremony: they had, most of them, either from shame or fear, retired to their own houses. The French ambassador, Le Croc, an aged gentleman of honour and character, could not be prevailed on, though a dependent of the house of Guise, to countenance the marriage by his presence. Elizabeth remonstrated, by friendly letters and messages, against this matrimonial connection: the court of France made like opposition; but Mary, though on all other occasions she was extremely obsequious to the advice of her relations in that country, was here determined to pay no regard to their opinion. Thus did Mary confirm the idea which was entertained by the people respecting her concurring in the murder of her husband; and thus did she draw upon herself and the kingdom the odium of Europe (s).

Soon after the marriage, Bothwel, with the queen's consent, as asserted, made some attempts to get the young prince into his power. But this step excited the most serious attention; and the principal nobility, even many of those who had formerly been constrained to sign the application in favour of Bothwel's marriage, met at Stirling, and formed an association for protecting the prince, and punishing the king's murderers. The earl of Athol himself, a known Catholic, was the first author of this conspiracy: the earls of Argyle, Morton, Marre, Glencairne, the lords Boyd, Lindesey, Hume, Semple, Kirkaldy of Grange, Tulibardine, and secretary Liddington, entered zealously into it. The earl of Murray, foreseeing such turbulent times, and being desirous to keep free of these dangerous factions, had, some time before, desired and obtained Mary's permission to retire into France.

Lord Hume was first in arms; and, leading a body of eight hundred horse, suddenly environed the queen of Scots and Bothwel, in the castle of Borthwic. They, however, found means to make their escape to Dunbar; while the confederate lords were assembling their troops at Edinburgh, and taking measures to effect their purpose. Bothwel upon hearing that the associated lords were fallen into distress, imprudently took the field on the 15th of June, and advanced towards them. The armies met at Carberry Hill, about six miles from Edinburgh; and Mary (r) This clergyman, not content with having refused compliance, publicly in his sermons condemned the marriage; and exhorted all who had access to the queen, to give her their advice against so scandalous an alliance. Being called before the council, to answer for the liberty he took, he showed a courage, which might cover all the nobles with shame, on account of their tameness and servility. He said, that, by the rules of the church, the earl of Bothwel, being convicted of adultery, could not be permitted to marry; that the divorce between him and his former wife was plainly procured by collusion, as appeared by the precipitation of the sentence, and the sudden conclusion of his marriage with the queen; and that all suspicions which prevailed, with regard to the king's murder, and the queen's concurrence in the former rape, would thence receive undoubted confirmation. He therefore exhorted Bothwel, who was present, no longer to persevere in his present criminal enterprizes; and turning his discourse to the other counsellors, he charged them to employ all their influence with the queen, in order to divert her from a measure which would load her with eternal infamy and dishonour. Not satisfied even with this admonition, he took the first opportunity of informing the public from the pulpit, of the whole transaction, and expressed to them his fears, that, notwithstanding all remonstrances, their sovereign was still obstinately bent on her fatal purpose. "For himself," he said, "he had already discharged his conscience, and yet again would take heaven and earth to witness, that he abhorred and detested that marriage, as scandalous and hateful in the sight of mankind: but since the Great, as he perceived, either by their flattery or silence, gave countenance to the measure, he besought the Faithful to pray fervently to the Almighty, that a resolution, taken contrary to all law, reason, and good conscience, might, by the divine blessing, be turned to the comfort and benefit of the church and kingdom." These speeches gave great offence to the court; and Craig was again summoned before the council, to answer for his temerity in thus passing the bounds of his commission. But he told them, that the bounds of his commission were the word of God, good laws, and natural reason; and were the queen's marriage tried by any of these standards, it would appear infamous and dishonourable, and would be esteemed so by the whole world. The council were so overawed by this heroic behaviour in a private clergyman, that they dismissed him without farther censure or punishment. Spotswood, p. 203. Anderson, vol. ii. p. 280.

(s) The Scots, who resided abroad, met with such reproaches, that they durst nowhere appear in public; and they earnestly exhorted their countrymen at home to free them from the public hatred, by bringing to punishment the authors of such atrocious crimes. This intelligence, with a little reflection, roused men from their lethargy; and the rumours which, from the beginning, had been spread against Mary, as if she had been privy to the king's murder, seemed now to have received a strong confirmation and authority. It was every where said, that even though no particular and direct proofs had as yet been pronounced of the queen's guilt, the whole tenour of her late conduct was sufficient, not only to beget suspicion, but to produce conviction against her: that her sudden resolution of being reconciled to her husband, whom before she had long hated; her bringing him to court, from which she had banished him by neglect and rigorous behaviour; her fitting up separate apartments for him: were all circumstances which, when compared with the subsequent events, bore an unfavourable aspect for her: that the least which, after the king's murder, might have been expected in her situation, was a more than usual caution in her measures, and an extreme anxiety to punish the real assassins, in order to free herself from suspicion and reproach: that no woman, who had any regard to her character, would allow a man, publicly accused of her husband's murder, so much as to approach her presence, far less give him a share in her counsels, and endow him with favour and authority: that an acquittal, merely in the absence of accusers, was not well calculated to satisfy the public; especially if that absence proceeded from a designed precipitation of the sentence, and from the terror which her known friendship for the criminal had infused into every one: that the very mention of her marriage to such a person, in such circumstances, was horrible; and the contrivances of extorting a consent from the nobility, and of concerting a rape, were gross artifices, more proper to discover her guilt than prove her innocence: that where a woman thus shews a consciousness of merited reproach, and, instead of correcting, provides only thin glosses to cover, her exceptionable conduct, she betrays a neglect of fame, which must either be the effect or the cause of the most shameless enormities: that to espouse a man, who had, a few days before, been so scandalously divorced from his wife; who, to say the least, was believed to have, a few months before, assassinated her husband, was so contrary to the plainest rules of behaviour, that no pretence of indiscretion or imprudence could account for such a conduct: that a woman, who, so soon after her husband's death, though not attended with any extraordinary circumstances, contracts a marriage, which might in itself be the most blameless, cannot escape severe censure; but one who overlooks for her pleasure, so many other weighty considerations, was equally capable, in gratifying her appetites, to neglect every regard to honour and to humanity: that Mary was not ignorant of the prevailing opinion of the public with regard to her own guilt, and of the inferences which would every where be drawn from her conduct; and therefore, if she still continued to pursue measures which gave such just offence, she ratified, by her actions, as much as she could by the most formal confession, all the surmises and imputations of her enemies: that a prince was here murdered in the face of the world; Bothwel alone was suspected and accused; if he were innocent, nothing could absolve him, either in Mary's eyes or those of the public, but the detection and conviction of the assassin; yet no inquiry was made to that purpose, though a parliament had been assembled; the sovereign and wife was here plainly silent from guilt, the people from terror: that the only circumstance which opposed all these presumptions, or rather proofs, was the benignity and goodness of her preceding behaviour, which seemed to remove her from all suspicions of such atrocious inhumanity; but that the characters of men were extremely variable, and persons guilty of the worst actions were not always of the worst and most criminal disposition: that a woman who, in a critical and dangerous moment, had sacrificed her honour to a man of abandoned principle, might thenceforth be led blindfold by him to the commission of the most enormous crimes, and was in reality no longer at her own disposal: and that, though one supposition was still left to alleviate her blame, namely, that Bothwel, presuming on her affection towards him, had of himself committed the crime, and had never communicated it to her, yet such a sudden and passionate love to a man, whom she had long known, could not easily be accounted for, without supposing some degree of preceding guilt; and as it appeared that she was not afterwards restrained, either by shame or prudence, from incurring the highest reproach and danger, it was not likely that a sense of duty or humanity would have a more powerful influence over her.

Such are the observations of Hume, who seems to have considered these nefarious transactions in their proper colours, notwithstanding the panegyrical glosses of Mary's favourers.

soon became sensible that her own troops disapproved of her cause, and were averse to spill their blood in the quarrel. After some bravadoes of Bothwel, where he discovered very little courage, she saw no resource but that of holding a conference with Kirkaldy of Grange, and of putting herself, upon some general promises, into the hands of the confederates. She was conducted to Edinburgh, amidst the insults of the populace; who reproached her with her crimes; and even held before her eyes, which way soever she turned, a banner, on which were painted the murder of her husband, and the distress of her infant son. Mary, overwhelmed with her calamities, had recourse to tears and lamentations. Bothwel, during her conference with Grange, fled unattended to Dunbar; and fitting out a few small ships, set sail for the Orkneys, where he subsisted during some time by piracy. He was pursued thither by Grange, and his ship was taken, with several of his servants, who afterwards discovered all the circumstances of the king's murder, and were punished for the crime. Bothwel himself escaped in a boat, and found means to get a passage to Denmark, where he was thrown into prison, lost his senses, and died miserably about ten years after.

Mary, now in the hands of an enraged faction, met with such treatment as a sovereign may naturally expect from subjects who have their future security to provide for, as well as their present animosity to gratify. It is pretended, that she behaved with a spirit very little suitable to her condition, and avowed her inviolable attachment to Bothwel. The malcontents, for their own safety, thought themselves obliged to proceed with rigour against her; and they sent her next day under a guard to the castle of Lochleven, situated in a lake of that name. The mistress of the house was mother to the earl of Murray; and as she pretended to have been lawfully married to the late king of Scots, she naturally bore an animosity to Mary, and treated her with the utmost severity and harshness.

Elizabeth was made acquainted with all these incidents, and seemed touched with compassion towards the unfortunate queen; and all her fears and jealousies being now laid asleep, by the consideration of that ruin and infamy in which Mary's conduct had involved her, she began to reflect on the instability of human affairs, the precarious state of royal grandeur, the danger of encouraging rebellious subjects; and she resolved to employ her authority for alleviating the calamities of her unhappy kinswoman. She sent sir Nicholas Throgmorton ambassador to Scotland, in order to remonstrate both with Mary and the associated lords; and she gave him instructions, which, though mixed with some lofty pretensions, were full of that good sense which was so natural to her, and of that generosity which the present conjuncture had called forth. She empowered him to declare in her name to Mary, "that the late conduct of that princess, so enormous and in every respect so unjustifiable, had given her the highest offence; and though she felt the movements of pity towards her, she had once determined never to interpose in her affairs, either by advice or assistance, but to abandon her entirely, as a person whose condition was totally desperate, and honour irretrievable: that she was well assured that other foreign princes, Mary's near relations, had embraced the same resolution; but, for her part, the late events had touched her heart with more tender sympathy, and had made her adopt measures more favourable to the liberty and interests of the unhappy queen: that she was determined not to see her oppressed by her rebellious subjects, but would employ all her good offices, and even her power, to redeem her from captivity, and place her in such a condition as would at once be compatible with her dignity, and the safety of her subjects: that she conjured her to lay aside all thoughts of revenge, except against the murderers of her husband; and as she herself was his near relation, she was better entitled than the subjects of Mary to interpose her authority on that head, and she therefore besought that princess, if she had any regard to her own honour and safety, not to oppose so just and reasonable a demand: that after those two points were provided for, her own liberty, and the punishment of her husband's assassins, the safety of her infant son was next to be considered; and there seemed no expedient more proper for that purpose, than sending him to be educated in England: and that, besides the security which would attend his removal from a scene of faction and convulsions, there were many other beneficial consequences, which it was easy to foresee as the result of his education in that country."

Throgmorton's remonstrances with the associated lords, were conformable to the sentiments which Elizabeth entertained in Mary's favour. She empowered him to tell them, "that, whatever blame she might throw on Mary's conduct, any opposition to their sovereign was totally unjustifiable, and incompatible with all order and good government: that it belonged not to them to reform, much less to punish, the mal-administration of their prince; and the only arms which subjects could in any case lawfully employ against the supreme authority, were entreaties, counsels, and representations: that if these expedients failed, they were next to appeal by their prayers to Heaven; and to wait with patience till the Almighty, in whose hands are the hearts of princes, should be pleased to turn them to justice and to mercy: that she inculcated not this doctrine, because she herself was interested in its observance; but because it was universally received in all well-governed states, and was essential to the preservation of civil society: that she required them to restore their queen to liberty; and promised, in that case, to concur with them in all proper expedients for regulating the government, for punishing the king's murderers, and for guarding the life and liberty of the infant prince: and that if the services, which she had lately rendered the Scottish nation, in protecting them from foreign usurpation, were duly considered by them, they would repose confidence in her good offices, and would esteem themselves blame-worthy in having hitherto made no application to her."

Elizabeth, besides these remonstrances, sent, by Throgmorton, some articles of accommodation, which he was to propose to both parties, as expedients for the settlement of public affairs; and though these articles contained some important restraints on the sovereign power, they were in the main calculated for Mary's advantage, and were sufficiently indulgent to her. The associated lords, who determined to proceed with greater severity, were apprehensive of Elizabeth's partiality; and being sensible that Mary would take courage from the protection of that powerful princess, they thought proper, after several affected delays, to refuse the English ambassador all access to her. There were four different schemes proposed in Scotland, for the treatment of the captive queen (t). Throgmorton, as might naturally be supposed, supported the mildest of the four proposals; but though he promised his mistress's guarantee for the performance of articles, he threatened the ruling party with immediate vengeance in case of refusal, and warned them not to draw on themselves, by their violence, the public reproach, which now lay upon their queen; he found that, excepting secretary Lidington, he had not the good fortune to convince any of the leaders. All counsels seemed to tend towards the more severe expedients; and the preachers, in particular, drawing their examples from the maxims of the Old Testament, inflamed the minds of the people against their unhappy sovereign.

There arose several who pretended to have an interest in the regency of the young prince after the intended deposition of Mary. The earl of Lenox claimed that authority as grandfather to the prince: the duke of Chatelrault, who was absent in France, had pretensions as next heir to the crown: but the greatest number of the associated lords inclined to the earl of Murray, in whose capacity they had entire confidence, and who possessed the good-will of the preachers and more zealous Reformers. All measures being therefore concerted, three instruments were sent to Mary, by the hands of lord Lindesey and sir Robert Melvil; by one of which she was to resign the crown in favour of her son, by another to appoint Murray regent, by the third to name a council, which should administer the government till his arrival in Scotland. The queen of Scots, seeing no prospect of relief, lying under apprehensions for her life, and believing that no deed which she executed during her captivity could be valid, was prevailed on, after a plentiful effusion of tears, to sign sign these three instruments; and she took not the trouble of inspecting any one of them. In consequence of this forced resignation, the young prince was proclaimed king, by the name of James VI. He was crowned at Stirling, on the 29th of July, and the earl of Morton took in his name the coronation oath; in which a promise to extirpate heresy was not forgotten. Some republican pretensions in favour of the people's power were countenanced in this ceremony; and a coin was soon after struck, on which the famous saying of Trajan was inscribed, "Pro me; si merear, in me:" that is, "For me; if I deserve it, against me." Throgmorton had orders from his mistress not to assist at the coronation of the king of Scots.

(t) One, that she should be restored to her authority under very strict limitations: the second, that she should be obliged to resign her crown to the prince, be banished the kingdom, and be confined either to France or England; with assurances from the sovereign, in whose dominions she should reside, that she should make no attempts to the disturbance of the established government: the third, that she should be publicly tried for her crimes, of which her enemies pretended to have undoubted proof, and be sentenced to perpetual imprisonment: the fourth is still more severe, and required, that, after her trial and condemnation, capital punishment should be inflicted upon her.

The council of regency had not long occasion to exercise their authority. The earl of Murray soon after arrived from France, and took possession of his high office. He paid a visit to the captive queen; and treated her in so severe a manner, that she entirely alienated her affection from him. Murray proceeded afterwards to break, in a more public manner, all terms of decency with her. He summoned a parliament on the 15th of December; and that assembly, after voting that she was undoubtedly an accomplice in her husband's murder, condemned her to imprisonment, ratified her demission of the crown, and acknowledged her son for king, and Murray for regent. The regent, a man of vigour and abilities, employed himself successfully in reducing the kingdom. He bribed sir James Balfour to surrender the castle of Edinburgh: he constrained the garrison of Dunbar to open their gates; and he demolished that fortress.

Although every thing seemed to bear a favourable aspect to the new government, and all men seemed to acquiesce in Murray's authority; a violent revolution, however necessary, can never be effected without great discontents; and it was not likely that, in a country where the government, in its most settled state, possessed a very disjointed authority, a new establishment should meet with no interruption or disturbance. Few considerable men of the nation appeared willing to support Mary, so long as Bothwel was present; but the removal of that noxious nobleman had altered the sentiments of many. The duke of Chatelrault, being disappointed of the regency, bore no good-will to Murray; and the same sentiments were embraced by all his numerous retainers: several of the nobility, finding that others had taken the lead among the associators, formed a faction apart, and opposed the prevailing power: and besides their being moved by some remains of duty and affection towards Mary, the malcontent lords, observing every thing carried to extremity against her, were naturally led to embrace her cause, and shelter themselves under her authority. All who retained any propensity to the Catholic religion, were induced to join this party; and even many who detested Mary's crimes, were now inclined to compassionate her present situation. Animated by all these motives, some of the principal nobility, now adherents to the queen of Scots, met at Hamilton, and concerted measures for supporting the cause of that princess.

While these things were carrying on, Mary employed herself in concerting measures for effecting her escape; and she engaged, by her charms and caresses, a young gentleman, George Douglas, brother to the laird of Lochleven, to assist in that enterprize. She even went so far as to give hopes of espousing her, after her marriage with Bothwel should be dissolved on the plea of force; and she proposed this expedient to the regent, who rejected it. Douglas, however, persevered in his endeavours to free her from captivity; and having all opportunities of access to the house, he was at last successful in the undertaking. He conveyed her in disguise into a small boat, on the 2d of May, 1568, and himself rowed her ashore. She hastened to Hamilton; and the news of her arrival in that place being immediately spread abroad, many of the nobility flocked to her with their forces. A bond of association for her defence was signed by the earls of Argyle, Huntley, Eglington, Crawford, Cassilis, Rothes, Montrose, Sutherland, Errol, nine bishops, and nine barons, besides many of the most considerable gentry. And in a few days an army, to the number of six thousand men, was assembled under her standard.

No sooner was Elizabeth informed of Mary's escape, than she discovered her resolution of persevering in the same friendly measures which she had hitherto pursued; and with that view she proposed to the court of France an expedient, which, though less violent, would have been no less effectual for her service: she desired that France and England should by concert cut off all commerce with the Scots, till they should do justice to their injured sovereign. She now dispatched Leighton into Scotland to offer both her good offices, and the assistance of her forces, to Mary; but as she apprehended the entrance of French troops into the kingdom, she desired that the controversy between the queen of Scots and her subjects might by that princess be referred entirely to her arbitration, and that no foreign succours should be introduced into Scotland.

But Elizabeth had not leisure to exert her efforts in favour of Mary. The regent assembled forces; and, notwithstanding his army was inferior in number to that of the queen of Scots, he took the field against her on the 15th of the same month. A battle was fought at Langside near Glasgow, which was entirely decisive in favour of the regent; and though Murray, after his victory, stopped the bloodshed, yet was the action followed by a total dispersion of the queen's party. That unhappy princess fled southwards from the field of battle with great precipitation, and came, with a few attendants to the borders of England. Here she deliberated concerning her next measures, which would probably prove so important to her future happiness or misery: she found it impossible to remain in her own kingdom; she had an aversion, in her present condition, to return into France, the scene of her former splendour; and she was not provided with a vessel, which could safely convey her thither: the generous behaviour of Elizabeth made her hope for protection, and assistance, from that quarter; and therefore she embraced the resolution of taking shelter in England. She embarked on board a fishing-boat in Galloway, and landed the same day at Workington in Cumberland, about thirty miles from Carlisle; whence she immediately dispatched a messenger to London; notifying her arrival, desiring leave to visit Elizabeth, and craving her protection, in consequence of former professions of friendship made her by that princess.

Elizabeth was now obliged to make some decisive resolution with regard to her treatment of the queen of Scots; and as she had hitherto, contrary to the opinion of Cecil, attended more to the motives of generosity than of policy, she was engaged by that minister to weigh afresh all the considerations which occurred in this critical conjuncture. He represented, "that the party which had dethroned Mary, and had at present assumed the government of Scotland, was always attached to the English alliance, and was engaged by all the motives of religion and interest, to persevere in their connection with Elizabeth: that though Murray and his friends might complain of some unkind usage during their banishment in England, they would easily forget these grounds of quarrel, when they reflected that Elizabeth was the only ally on whom they could safely depend, and that their own queen, by her attachment to the Catholic faith, and by her other connections, excluded them entirely from the friendship of France, and even from that of Spain: that Mary, on the other hand, even before her violent breach with her Protestant subjects, was secretly governed by the counsels of the house of Guise; much more would she implicitly comply with their views, when, by her own ill conduct, the power of that family and of the zealous Catholics was become her sole resource and security: that her pretensions to the English crown would render her a dangerous instrument in their hands; and, were she once able to suppress the Protestants in her own kingdom, she would unite the Scottish and English Catholics, with those of all foreign states, in a confederacy against the religion and government of England: that it behoved Elizabeth, therefore, to proceed with caution in the design of restoring her rival to the throne; and to take care, both that this enterprize, if undertaken, should be effected by English forces alone, and that full securities should beforehand be provided for the Reformers and the reformation in Scotland: that above all, it was necessary to guard carefully the person of that princess; lest, finding this unexpected reserve in the English friendship, she should suddenly take the resolution of flying into France, and should attempt, by foreign force, to recover possession of her authority: that if she were once abroad, in the hands of Catholics, the attack on England would appear to her as easy as that on Scotland; and the only method of recovering her native kingdom, would be to acquire that crown, to which she should deem herself equally intitled: that a neutrality in such interesting situations, though it might be pretended, could never, without the most extreme danger, be upheld by the queen; and the detention of Mary was equally requisite, whether the power of England were to be employed in her favour, or against her: that nothing, indeed, was more becoming a great prince than generosity; yet the suggestions of this noble principle could never be consulted in such delicate circumstances as those in which the queen was at present placed; where her own safety and the interests of her people were intimately concerned in every resolution which she embraced: that Mary's imprudence had been so great, perhaps her crimes so enormous, that the insurrection of subjects, after such provocation, could no longer be regarded as a precedent against other princes: that it was first necessary for Elizabeth to ascertain, in a regular and satisfactory manner, the extent of Mary's guilt, and thence to determine the degree of protection which she ought to afford her against her discontented subjects: that as no glory could surpass that of defending oppressed innocence, it was equally infamous to patronize vice and murder on the throne; and the contagion of such dishonour would extend itself to all who countenanced or supported it: and that, if the crimes of the Scottish princess should, on inquiry, appear as great and certain as was affirmed and believed, every measure against her, which policy should dictate, would thence be justified; or if she should be found innocent, every enterprize, which friendship should inspire, would be acknowledged laudable and glorious."

Elizabeth now resolved to proceed in a seemingly generous, but really cautious, manner with Mary; and she immediately sent orders to lady Scrope, sister to the duke of Norfolk, who lived in the neighbourhood, to attend on that princess. Soon after, she dispatched to her lord Scrope himself, warden of the marches, and sir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain. They found Mary already lodged in the castle of Carlisle; and, after expressing the queen's sympathy with her in her late misfortunes, they told her, that her request of being allowed to visit their sovereign, and of being admitted to her presence, could not at present be complied with: till she had cleared herself of her husband's murder, of which she was so strongly accused, Elizabeth could not, without dishonour, show her any countenance, or appear indifferent to the assassination of so near a kinsman. This unexpected check threw Mary into tears; and the necessity of her situation extorted from her a declaration, that she would willingly justify herself to her sister from all imputations, and would submit her cause to the arbitration of so good a friend. Two days after she sent lord Herries to London with a letter to that purport.

This concession, which Mary could scarcely avoid without an acknowledgement of guilt, was the point expected and desired by Elizabeth: she immediately dispatched Midlemore to the regent of Scotland; requiring him both to desist from the farther prosecution of the queen's party, and send some persons to London to justify his conduct with regard to her. Murray might justly be startled at receiving a message so violent and imperious; but as his domestic enemies were numerous and powerful, and England was the sole ally which he could expect among foreign nations, he was resolved rather to digest the affront, than provoke Elizabeth by a refusal; and he declared, that he would himself take a journey to England, attended by other commissioners; and would willingly submit the determination of his cause to Elizabeth.

Lord Herries now perceived, that his mistress had advanced too far in her concessions: he endeavoured to maintain, that Mary could not, without diminution of her royal dignity, submit to a contest with her rebellious subjects before a foreign prince; and he required either present aid from England, or liberty for his queen to pass over into France. The queen of Scots herself discovered no less aversion to the trial proposed; and it required all the artifice and prudence of Elizabeth to make her persevere in the agreement to which she at first consented. But allured by the plausible professions of Elizabeth, she agreed to vindicate herself by her own commissioners before commissioners appointed by the queen of England.

During the above transactions lord Scrope and sir Francis Knolles, who resided with Mary at Carlisle, had leisure to study her character, and make report of it to Elizabeth. Unbroken by her misfortunes, resolute in her purpose, she aspired to nothing but victory; and was determined to undergo any difficulty, and to try every fortune, rather than abandon her cause, or yield the superiority to her enemies. She declared her fixed purpose to require aid of her friends all over Europe, and even to have recourse to infidels and barbarians, rather than fail of vengeance against her persecutors. But the court of England, under pretence of guarding her, had already, in effect, detained her prisoner, and were determined to watch her with greater vigilance on account of these declarations. As Carlisle, by its situation on the borders, afforded her great opportunities of contriving her escape, they removed her to Bolton, a seat of lord Scrope's in Yorkshire; and the issue of the controversy between her and the Scottish nation was regarded as a subject more momentous to Elizabeth's security and interests, than it had hitherto been apprehended.

In the beginning of October commissioners were appointed by the English court for the examination of this great cause. They were the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Sussex, and sir Ralph Sadler; and York was named as the place of conference. Lesley, bishop of Ross, the lords Herries, Levingstone, and Boyde, with three persons more, appeared as commissioners from the queen of Scots. The earl of Murray, regent, the earl of Morton, the bishop of Orkney, lord Lindesey, and the abbot of Dunfermling, were appointed commissioners from the king and kingdom of Scotland. Secretary Lidington, George Buchanan, the famous poet and historian, with some others, were named as their assistants (u). Mary's commissioners, before they gave in their complaints against her enemies in Scotland, entered a protest, that their appearance in the cause should nowise affect the independence of her crown, or be construed as a mark of subordination to England: the English commissioners received this protest, but with a reserve to the claim of England. The complaint of that princess was next read, and contained a detail of the injuries which she had suffered since her marriage with Bothwel: that her subjects had taken arms against her, on pretence of freeing her from captivity; that when she put herself into their hands, they had committed her to close custody in Lochleven; had placed her son, an infant, on her throne; had again taken arms against her after her deliverance from prison; had rejected all proposals for accommodation; had given battle to her troops; and had obliged her, for the safety of her person, to take shelter in England. The earl of Murray, in answer to this complaint, gave a summary account of the late transactions: the earl of Bothwel, the known murderer of the late king, had, a little after committing that crime, seized the person of the queen, and led her to Dunbar; that he acquired such influence over her as to gain her consent to marry him; and he had accordingly procured a divorce from his former wife, and had pretended to celebrate his nuptials with the queen; that the scandal of this transaction, the dishonour which it brought on the nation, the danger to which the infant prince was exposed from the attempts of that audacious man, had obliged the nobility to take arms, and oppose his criminal enterprizes; that after Mary, in order to save him, had thrown herself into their hands, she still discovered such attachment to him, that they found it necessary, for their own and the public safety, to confine her person till Bothwel and the other murderers of her husband could be tried and punished for their crimes; and that, during this confinement, she had voluntarily, without compulsion or violence, resigned her crown to her only son, and had appointed the earl of Murray regent during the minority. The queen's answer to this apology was obvious: that she did not know, and never could suspect, that Bothwel, who had been acquitted by a jury, and recommended to her by all the nobility for her husband, was the murderer of the king; that she ever was, and still continues, desirous that if he be guilty he may be brought to condign punishment; that her resignation of the crown was extorted from her by the well-grounded fears of her life, and even by direct menaces of violence; and that Throgmorton, the English ambassador, as well as others of her friends, had advised her to sign that paper, as the only means of saving herself from the last extremity, and had assured her that a consent, given under these circumstances, could never have any validity or force.

(u) It was a great circumstance in Elizabeth's glory, that she was thus chosen umpire between the factions of a neighbouring kingdom, which had, during many centuries, entertained the most violent jealousy and animosity against England; and her felicity was equally rare, in having the fortunes and fame of so dangerous a rival, who had long given her the greatest inquietude, now entirely at her disposal. Some circumstances of her late conduct had discovered a bias towards the side of Mary: her prevailing interests led her to favour the enemies of that princess: the professions of impartiality which she made, were open and frequent; and she had so far succeeded, that each side accused her commissioners of partiality towards their adversaries. She herself appears, by the instructions given them, to have fixed no plan for the decision; but she knew that the advantages which she should reap, must be great, whatever issue the cause might take. If Mary's crimes could be ascertained by undoubted proof, she could for ever blast the reputation of that princess, and might justifiably detain her for ever a prisoner in England: if the evidence fell short of conviction, it was intended to restore her to the throne, but with such strict limitations as would leave Elizabeth perpetual arbiter of all differences between the parties in Scotland, and render her in effect absolute mistress of the kingdom. Hume.

It is observable in this conference, that Murray did not bring forward against the queen any thing which might seem to impress the nation with an idea of her guilt. He was afraid, should she ever be restored, either by the power of Elizabeth, or the assistance of her other friends, he and his party must be exposed to her severe and implacable vengeance. He resolved, therefore, not to venture rashly on a measure which it would be impossible for him ever to recal; and he privately paid a visit to Norfolk and the other English commissioners, confessed his scruples, laid before them the evidence of the queen's guilt, and desired to have some security for Elizabeth's protection, in case that evidence should, upon examination, appear satisfactory. Norfolk was not secretly displeased with the regent's scruples. He had ever been a partizan of the queen of Scots: secretary Lidington, who began also to incline to that party, had engaged to embrace farther views in her favour, and even to think of espousing her: and though that duke confessed, that the proofs against Mary seemed to him unquestionable, he encouraged Murray in his resolution, not to produce them publicly in the conferences before the English commissioners. Norfolk, however, was obliged to transmit to court the queries proposed by the regent (v). And Elizabeth thereupon began to think that they pointed towards a conclusion more decisive and more advantageous than she had hitherto apprehended; she determined to bring the matter into full light. Under pretext that the distance from her person retarded the proceedings of her commissioners, she ordered them to come to London, and there continue the conferences. On their appearance, she joined in commission with them some of the most considerable of her council; sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper, the earls of Arundel and Leicester, lord Clinton, admiral, and sir William Cecil, secretary. The queen of Scots, who knew nothing of these secret motives, and who expected that fear or decency would still restrain Murray from proceeding to any violent accusation against her, expressed an entire satisfaction in this adjournment; and declared that the affair, being under the immediate inspection of Elizabeth, was now in the hands where she most desired to rest it. The conferences were accordingly continued at Hampton Court; and Mary's commissioners made no scruple to be present at them.

The queen, meanwhile, gave a satisfactory answer to all Murray's demands, and declared, that though she wished and hoped, from the present inquiry, to be entirely convinced of Mary's innocence, yet if the event should prove contrary, and if that princess should appear guilty of her husband's murder, she should, for her own part, deem her ever after unworthy of a throne. The regent, encouraged by this declaration, opened more fully his charge against the unfortunate queen; and proceeded to accuse her of participation in the assassination of the king. The earl of Lenox likewise appeared before the English commissioners; and imploring vengeance for the murder of his son, accused Mary as an accomplice with Bothwel in that enormous crime.

When this charge was so unexpectedly given in, and copies of it were transmitted to the bishop of Ross, lord Herreis, and the other commissioners of Mary, they absolutely refused to return an answer (w). The commissioners of the queen of Scots imagined by their refusal to answer the charge preferred by Murray, that there could be no farther proceedings in the conference; but though this silence might be interpreted as a presumption against her, it did not fully answer the purpose of those English ministers who were enemies to that princess. They still desired to have in their hands the proofs of her guilt; and in order to draw them with decency from the regent, a judicious artifice was employed by Elizabeth. Murray was called before the English commissioners; and reproved by them, in the queen's name, for the atrocious imputations which he had the temerity to throw upon his sovereign: but they told them, that Elizabeth desired to know what Murray and the other commissioners could say in their own justification. Murray, thus urged, made no difficulty in producing the proofs of his charge against the queen of Scots; and among the rest, some love-letters and sonnets of her's to Bothwel, written all in her own hand, and two other papers, one written in her own hand, another subscribed by her, and written by the earl of Huntley; each of which contained a promise of marriage with Bothwel, made before the pretended trial and acquittal of that nobleman (x). These papers contained incontestable proofs of Mary's criminal correspondence with Bothwel, of her consent to the king's murder, and of her concurrence in the violence which Bothwel pretended to commit upon her. Murray fortified this evidence, by some testimonies of correspondent facts; and added, some time after, the dying confession of one Hubert, a servant of Bothwel's, who had been executed for the king's murder, and who directly charged the queen with her being accessary to that criminal transaction.

Mary's commissioners had used every expedient to prevent the appearance of the casket just mentioned, which contained papers so much to the dishonour of their mistress. As soon as Murray opened his charge, they endeavoured to turn the conferences from an inquiry into a negociation; and though informed by the English commissioners that nothing could be more dishonourable for Mary, than to enter into a treaty with such undutiful subjects, before she had justified herself from those enormous imputations which had been thrown upon her, they still insisted that Elizabeth should settle terms of accommodation between Mary and her enemies in Scotland. They maintained that, till their mistress had given in her answer to Murray's charge, his proofs could neither be called for nor produced: and finding that the English commissioners were still determined to proceed in the method which had been projected, they finally broke off the conferences, and would not make the least reply (y).

Elizabeth, to convince the world of the equity of her proceedings, ordered her privy-council to be assembled; and, that she might render the matter more solemn and (v) These queries consisted of four particulars: Whether the English commissioners had authority from their sovereign to pronounce sentence against Mary, in case her guilt should be fully proved before them? Whether they would promise to exercise that authority, and proceed to an actual sentence? Whether the queen of Scots, if she were found guilty, should be delivered into the hands of the regent, or, at least, be so secured in England, that she never should be able to disturb the tranquillity of Scotland? and, Whether Elizabeth would also, in that case, promise to acknowledge the young king, and protect the regent in his authority?

(w) These persons grounded their silence on very extraordinary reasons. They had orders, they said, from their mistress, if any thing were advanced that might touch her honour, not to make any defence, as she was a sovereign princess, and could not be subject to any tribunal; and they required that she should previously be admitted to Elizabeth's presence, to whom, and to whom alone, she was determined to justify her innocence. They forgot that the conferences were at first begun, and were still continued, with no other view than to clear her from the accusations of her enemies; that Elizabeth had constantly pretended to enter into them only as her friend, by her own consent and approbation, not as assuming any jurisdiction over her; that this princess had, from the beginning, refused to admit her to her presence, till she should vindicate herself from the crimes imputed to her; that she had therefore discovered no new signs of partiality by her perseverance in that resolution; and that though she had granted an audience to the earl of Murray and his colleagues, she had previously conferred the same honour on Mary's commissioners; and her conduct was so far entirely equal to both parties.

(x) All these important papers had been kept by Bothwel in a silver box or casket, which had been given him by Mary, and which had belonged to her first husband, Francis; and though the princess had enjoined him to burn the letters as soon as he had read them, he had thought proper carefully to preserve them as pledges of her fidelity, and had committed them to the custody of sir James Balfour, deputy-governor of the castle of Edinburgh. When that fortress was besieged by the associated lords, Bothwel sent a servant to receive the casket from the hands of the deputy-governor. Balfour delivered it to the messenger; but as he had at that time received some disgust from Bothwel, and was secretly negociating an agreement with the ruling party, he took care, by conveying private intelligence to the earl of Morton, to make the papers be intercepted by him.

(y) These papers, at least translations of them, have been since published. The objections made to their authenticity are, in general, of small force: but were they ever so specious, they cannot now be hearkened to; since Mary, at the time when the truth could have been fully cleared, did, in effect, ratify the evidence against her, by recoiling from the inquiry at the very critical moment, and refusing to give an answer to the accusation.

authentic,

authentic, she summoned, along with them, the earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Huntingdon, and Warwick. All the proceedings of the English commissioners were read to them: the evidences produced by Murray were perused: a great number of letters, written by Mary to Elizabeth, were laid before them, and the hand-writing compared with that of the letters delivered in by the regent: the refusal of the queen of Scots' commissioners to make any reply, was related: and on the whole, Elizabeth told them, that as she had from the first thought it improper that Mary, after such horrid crimes had been imputed to her, should be admitted to her presence before she had, in some measure, cleared herself from the charge; so now, when her guilt was confirmed by so many evidences, and all answer refused, she must, for her part, persevere more steadily in that resolution. Elizabeth next called in the queen of Scots' commissioners, and, after observing that she deemed it more decent for their mistress to continue the conferences, than to require the liberty of justifying herself in person, she told them, that Mary might either send her reply by a person whom she trusted, or deliver it herself to some English nobleman, whom Elizabeth should appoint to wait upon her: but as to her resolution of making no reply at all, she must regard it as the strongest confession of guilt; nor could they ever be deemed her friends who advised her to that method of proceeding. These topics she enforced still more strongly in a letter which she wrote to Mary herself.

The queen of Scots, to keep herself the better in countenance, ordered her commissioners to accuse the earl of Murray and his associates as the murderers of the king: but this accusation being looked upon merely as a matter of recrimination, and being unsupported by any proof, was of course disregarded (z). She also desired to have copies of the papers given in by the regent; but as she still persisted in her resolution to make no reply before the English commissioners, this demand, as might naturally be expected, was finally refused her.

As Mary had thus put an end to the conferences, the regent expressed a desire to return into Scotland; and he complained, that his enemies had taken advantage of his absence, and had thrown the government into confusion. Elizabeth therefore dismissed him; and granted him a loan of five thousand pounds to bear the charges of his journey. During the conferences at York, the duke of Chatelrault arrived at London, in passing from France; and as the queen knew that he was engaged in Mary's party, and had plausible pretensions to the regency of the king of Scots, she detained him till after Murray's departure. But notwithstanding these marks of favour, and some other assistance which she secretly gave this latter nobleman, she still declined acknowledging the young king, or treating with Murray as regent of Scotland.

Elizabeth now gave orders for removing the queen of Scots from Bolton, a place surrounded with Catholics, to Tutbury in Staffordshire, where she was put under the custody of the earl of Shrewsbury. Elizabeth entertained hopes that this princess, discouraged by her misfortunes, and confounded by the late transactions, would be glad to secure a safe retreat from all the tempests with which she had been agitated; and she promised to bury every thing in oblivion, provided Mary would agree, either voluntarily to resign her crown, or to associate her son with her in the government; and the administration to remain, during his minority, in the hands of the earl of Murray. But Mary refused all treaty upon such terms, and declared that her last words should be those of a queen of Scotland. Besides many other reasons, she said, which fixed her in that resolution, she knew that if, in the present emergency, she made such concessions, her submission would be deemed an acknowledgment of guilt.

Mary, however, still insisted upon this alternative; either that Elizabeth should assist her in recovering her authority, or should give her liberty to retire into France, and make trial of the friendship of other princes. But this liberty was refused; and Elizabeth thought it necessary to detain her still a captive. Necessity, it was conjectured, would, to the prudent, justify her detention: her past misconduct would apologize for it to the equitable: and though it might have been foreseen, that compassion for Mary's situation, joined to her intrigues and insinuating behaviour, would, while she remained in the English territories, excite the zeal of her friends, especially of the Catholics; these inconveniencies were deemed much inferior to those which attended any other expedient. Elizabeth trusted also to her own address for eluding those difficulties: she purposed to avoid breaking absolutely with the queen of Scots, to keep her always in hopes of an accommodation, to negociate perpetually with her, and still to throw the blame of not coming to any conclusion, either on unforeseen accidents, or on the obstinacy and perverseness of others.

By some perhaps it may be thought that we have dwelt too long on the affairs of the queen of Scots; but we have chosen to give our observations in this form, that we might not interrupt our narrative of the events in Scotland, which form so material a part of the transactions of the present reign. Having therefore given every attention to those important matters, we must now turn our thoughts to the affairs of England. The term fixed by the treaty of Chateau-Cambresis for the restitution of Calais, expired in 1567; and Elizabeth, after making her demand at the gates of that city, sent sir Thomas Smith to Paris; and that minister, in conjunction with sir Henry Norris, her resident ambassador, enforced her pretensions. Conferences were held on that head, without coming to any conclusion satisfactory to the English. The chancellor, De l'Hôpital, told the English ambassadors, "that though France, by an article of the treaty, was obliged to restore Calais on the expiration of eight years, there was another article of the same treaty, which now deprived Elizabeth of any right that could accrue to her by that engagement: that it was agreed, if the English should, during the interval, commit hostilities upon France, they should instantly forfeit all claim to Calais; and the taking possession of Havre and Dieppe, with whatever pretences that measure might be covered, was a plain violation of the peace between the nations: that though these places were not entered by force, but put into Elizabeth's hands by the governors, these governors were rebels; and a correspondence with such traitors was the most flagrant injury that could be committed on any sovereign: that in the treaty which ensued upon the expulsion of the English from Normandy, the French ministers had absolutely refused to make any mention of Calais, and had thereby declared their intention to take advantage of the title which had accrued to the crown of France: and that though a general clause had been inserted, implying a reservation of all claims; this concession could not avail the English, who at that time possessed no just claim to Calais, and had previously forfeited all right to that fortress." The queen was by no means surprized at hearing these allegations; and as she knew that the French court intended not from the first to make restitution, much less after they could justify their refusal by such plausible reasons, she thought it better for the present to acquiesce in the loss, than to pursue a doubtful title by a war both dangerous and expensive, as well as unseasonable.

Elizabeth entered afresh into negociations for espousing the archduke Charles; and she seems, at this time, to have had no great motive of policy, which might induce her to make this fallacious offer: but as she was very rigorous in the terms insisted on, and would not agree that the archduke, if he espoused her, should enjoy any power or title in England, and even refused him the exercise of his religion, the treaty came to nothing; and that prince, despairing of success in his addresses, married the daughter of Albert, duke of Bavaria.

This year, 1568, a new translation of the Bible was

(z) Unless we take this angry accusation, advanced by Mary, to be an argument of Murray's guilt, there remains not the least presumption which should lead us to suspect him to have been any wise an accomplice in the king's murder. The queen never pretended to give any proof of the charge; and her commissioners affirmed at the time, that they themselves knew of none, though they were ready to maintain its truth by their mistress's orders, and would produce such proof as she should send them. It is remarkable that, at that time, it was impossible for either her or them to produce any proof; because the conferences before the English commissioners were previously broken off.

Murray could have no motive to commit that crime. The king, indeed, bore him some ill-will; but the king himself was become so despicable, both from his own ill-conduct and the queen's aversion to him, that he could neither do good nor harm to any body. To judge by the event in any case is always absurd, especially in the present. The king's murder, indeed, procured Murray the regency; but much more Mary's ill-conduct and imprudence, which he could not possibly foresee, and which never would have happened had she been entirely innocent.

published by authority; which was denominated "The Bishop's Bible." A new edition of this work was put forth about forty years ago.

Among the several churches of Europe which shook off the yoke of papal authority, no one proceeded with so much moderation as the Church of England; which was partly to be ascribed to the interposition of the civil magistrate, and partly to the gradual and slow steps by which the Reformation was conducted in that kingdom. Rage and animosity against the Catholic religion was as little indulged as could be supposed in such a revolution of the affairs of the church: the fabric of the secular hierarchy was maintained entire; the ancient liturgy was preserved, so far as was thought consistent with the new principles: many ceremonies were retained: the splendour of the Romish worship, though removed, had at least given place to order and decency: the distinctive habits of the clergy, according to their different ranks, were continued: no innovation was admitted, merely from spite and opposition to former usage: and the new religion had preserved itself in that happy medium which wise men have always sought, and which the people have so seldom been able to maintain.

But though such was the spirit of the Reformation in that country, many of the English reformers endeavoured to push matters to extremities against the Church of Rome, and entertained the most violent antipathy to all former practices. Among these, Hooper, who afterwards suffered for his religion with such extraordinary constancy, was chiefly distinguished. This man was appointed, during the reign of Edward, to the see of Gloucester, and made no scruple of accepting the episcopal office; but he refused to be consecrated in the episcopal habit, the cymarre and rochette, which had formerly, he said, been abused to superstition, and which were thereby rendered unbecoming a true christian; and he embraced the resolution, rather to refuse the bishopric than clothe himself in those hated garments; but it was deemed requisite that, for the sake of the example, he should not escape so easily. He was first confined to Cranmer's house, then thrown into prison, till he should consent to be a bishop on the terms proposed: he was plied with conferences, and reprimands, and arguments: Bucer and Peter Martyr, and the most celebrated foreign reformers, were consulted on this important question: and a compromise, with great difficulty, was at last made, that Hooper should not be obliged to wear commonly the hated robes, but should agree to be consecrated in them, and to use them during cathedral service: a condescension not a little extraordinary in a man of so inflexible a spirit as this reformer.

The same objection which had arisen with regard to the episcopal habit, had been moved against the raiment of the inferior clergy; and the surplice, in particular, with the tippet and corner cap, was a great object of abhorrence to many of the popular preachers. Every compliance, they said, with the postures, habits, and ceremonies of the church of Rome, was a symbolising with Antichrist. And this spirit was carried so far by some reformers, that, in a national remonstrance made afterwards by the church of Scotland against these habits, it was asked, "What has Christ Jesus to do with Belial? What has darkness to do with light? If surplices, corner caps, and tippets have been badges of idolaters in the very act of their idolatry; why should the preacher of Christian liberty, and the open rebuker of all superstition, partake with the dregs of the Romish beast? Yea, who is there that ought not rather to be afraid of taking in his hand, or on his forehead, the print and mark of that odious beast?" But this application, however reasonable, was rejected by the English church.

There was only one instance in which the spirit of contradiction to the Romanists took place universally in England: the altar was removed from the wall, was placed in the middle of the church, and was thenceforth denominated the communion-table.

These disputes, which had been started during the reign of Edward, were carried abroad by the Protestants who fled from the persecutions of Mary; and as the zeal of these men had received an increase from the furious cruelty of their enemies, they were generally inclined to carry their opposition to the utmost extremity against the practices of the church of Rome. Their communication with Calvin and the other reformers, who followed the discipline and worship of Geneva, confirmed them in this reluctance; and though some of the refugees, particularly those who were established at Frankfort, still adhered to king Edward's liturgy, the prevailing spirit carried these confessors to seek a still farther reformation. On the accession of Elizabeth, they returned to their native country; and being regarded with general veneration, on account of their zeal and past sufferings, they ventured to insist on the establishment of their projected model; nor did they want countenance from many considerable persons in the queen's council. But the princess herself, so far from being willing to despoil religion of the few ornaments and ceremonies which remained in it, was rather inclined to bring the public worship still nearer to the Romish ritual (a); and she thought that the reformation had already gone too far in shaking off those forms and observances, which, without distracting men of more refined apprehensions, tend, in a very innocent manner, to allure, and amuse, and engage the vulgar. She took care to have a law for uniformity strictly enacted: she was empowered by the parliament to add any new ceremonies which she thought proper: and though she was sparing in the exercise of this prerogative, she continued rigid in exacting an observance of the established laws, and in punishing all nonconformity. The zealots, therefore, who harboured a secret antipathy to the episcopal order, and to the whole liturgy, were obliged, in a great measure, to conceal these sentiments, which would have been regarded as highly audacious and criminal; and they confined their avowed objections to the surplice, the confirmation of children, the sign of the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage, kneeling at the sacrament, and bowing at the name of Jesus. These controversies had already excited such ferment among the people, that in some places they refused to frequent the churches where the habits and ceremonies were used; would not salute the conforming clergy; and proceeded so far as to revile them in the streets, to spit in their faces, and to use them with all manner of contumely. And while the sovereign authority checked these excesses, the flame was confined, not extinguished; and burning fiercer from confinement, it burst out in the succeeding reigns, to the total destruction of the church and monarchy.

There was, however, another set of opinions adopted by the Puritans, which rendered them in a peculiar manner the object of Elizabeth's aversion. The same boldness of spirit, which accompanied them in their addresses to the Divinity, appeared in their political speculations; and the principles of civil liberty, which, during some reigns, had been little avowed in the nation, and which were totally incompatible with the present exorbitant prerogative, had been strongly adopted by this new sect. Scarcely any sovereign before Elizabeth, and none after her, carried higher, both in speculation and practice, the authority of the crown; and the Puritans could not recommend themselves worse to her favour, than by inculcating the doctrine of resisting or restraining princes. From all these motives, the queen neglected no opportunity of depressing those zealous innovators; and while they were secretly countenanced by some of her most favoured ministers, Cecil, Leicester, Knolles, Bedford, Walsingham, she never was, to the end of her life, reconciled to their principles and practices.

We have thought proper to insert in this place an account of the rise and genius of the Puritans; because Camden marks the present year, as the period when they began to make themselves considerable in England.

The year 1569 was marked by conspiracies and insurrections. The duke of Norfolk was the only peer that enjoyed the highest title of nobility; and as there were at present no princes of the blood, the splendour of his family, the opulence of his fortune, and the extent of his influence, had rendered him without comparison the first subject in England. The qualities of his mind corresponded to his high station: he was beneficent, affable, generous, and had acquired the affections of the people; he was prudent, moderate, obsequious, and possessed, without giving her any jealousy, the good graces of his sovereign. His grandfather and father had long been regarded as the leaders of the Catholics; and this hereditary attachment, joined to the alliance of blood, had procured him the friendship of the most considerable men of that persuasion; but as he had been educated among the reformers, he was sincerely devoted to their principles, and maintained that strict decorum and regularity of life, by which the Protestants were at that time distinguished; he thereby enjoyed the rare felicity of being popular even with the most opposite factions. The height of his prosperity alone was the source of his misfortunes, and engaged him in attempts, from which his virtue and prudence would naturally have kept him for ever at a distance.

(a) When Nowel, one of her chaplains, had spoken less reverently in a sermon, preached before her, of the sign of the cross, she called aloud to him from her closet window, commanding him to retire from that ungodly digression, and to return unto his text. And, on the other side, when one of her divines had preached a sermon in defence of the real presence, she openly gave him thanks for his pains and piety.—Heylin, p. 124. She would have absolutely forbidden the marriage of the clergy, if Cecil had not interposed. Strype's Life of Parker, p. 107, 108, 109. She was an enemy to sermons; and usually said, that she thought two or three preachers were sufficient for a whole county. It was probably for these reasons that one Doring told her to her face from the pulpit, that she was like an untamed heifer, that would not be ruled by God's people, but obstructed his discipline. See Life of Hooker, prefixed to his works.

Norfolk was at this time a widower; and being of a suitable age, his marriage with the queen of Scots had appeared so natural, that it had occurred to several of his friends and those of that princess: but the first person, who, after secretary Lidington, opened the scheme to the duke, is said to have been the earl of Murray, before his departure for Scotland. That nobleman set before Norfolk both the advantage of composing the dissensions in Scotland by an alliance, which would be so generally acceptable, and the prospect of reaping the succession of England; and, in order to bind Norfolk's interest the faster with Mary's, he proposed that the duke's daughter should also espouse the young king of Scotland. The previously obtaining of Elizabeth's consent, was regarded, both by Murray and Norfolk, as a circumstance essential to the success of their project; and all terms being adjusted between them, Murray took care, by means of sir Robert Melvil, to have the design communicated to the queen of Scots. This princess replied, that the vexations which she had met with in her two last marriages, had made her more inclined to lead a single life; but she was determined to sacrifice her own inclinations to the public welfare: and therefore, as soon as she should be legally divorced from Bothwel, she would be determined by the opinion of her nobility and people in the choice of another husband.

There can be no doubt of Murray's insincerity in this proposal. He had two motives to engage him to dissimulation. He knew the danger which he must run in his return through the north of England, from the power of the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, Mary's partizans in that country; and he dreaded an insurrection in Scotland from the duke of Chatelrault, and the earls of Argyle and Huntley, whom she had appointed her lieutenants during her absence. By these feigned appearances of friendship, he both engaged Norfolk to write in his favour to the northern noblemen; and he persuaded the queen of Scots to give her lieutenants permission, and even advice, to conclude a cessation of hostilities with the regent's party.

Though the duke of Norfolk had agreed that Elizabeth's consent should be obtained before the completion of his marriage, he had reason to apprehend that he never should prevail with her voluntarily to make that concession. He knew her unrelenting jealousy against her heir and rival; he was acquainted with her former reluctance to all proposals of marriage with the queen of Scots; he foresaw that this princess's espousing a person of his power and character and interest, would give the greatest umbrage; and as it would then become necessary to reinstate her in possession of her throne on some tolerable terms, and even to endeavour the re-establishing of her character, he dreaded lest Elizabeth, whose politics had now taken a different turn, would never agree to such indulgent conditions. He therefore attempted previously to gain the approbation of several of the most considerable nobility; and he was successful with the earls of Pembroke, Arundel, Derby, Bedford, Shrewsbury, Southampton, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Sussex. Lord Lumley and sir Nicholas Throgmorton cordially embraced the proposal: even the earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's declared favourite, who had formerly been proposed as a husband to Mary, seemed to enter zealously into Norfolk's interests.

The secretary of state, sir William Cecil, was the most vigilant, active, and prudent minister ever known in England; and as he was governed by no views but the interests of his sovereign, which he had inflexibly pursued, his authority over her became every day more predominant. Ever cool himself, and uninfluenced by prejudice or affection, he checked those sallies of passion, to which she was subject; and if he failed of persuading her in the first movement, his perseverance, remonstrances, and arguments, were sure at last to recommend themselves to her discernment. The more credit he gained with his mistress, the more was he exposed to the envy of her other counsellors; and as he had been supposed to adopt the interests of the house of Suffolk, whose claim seemed to carry with it no danger to the present establishment, his enemies, in opposition to him, were naturally led to attach themselves to the queen of Scots. Elizabeth saw, without uneasiness, this emulation among her courtiers, which served to augment her own authority; and though she supported Cecil, whenever matters came to extremities, and dissipated every conspiracy against him, particularly one laid about this time for having him thrown into the Tower on some pretence or other, she never gave him such unlimited confidence as might enable him entirely to crush his adversaries.

The duke of Norfolk, sensible of the difficulty which he must meet with in controlling Cecil's counsels, durst not open to her his intentions of marrying the queen of Scots; but proceeded in the plan of increasing his interest in the kingdom, and engaging more of the nobility to take part in his measures. A letter was written to Mary by the earl of Leicester, and signed by several persons of the first rank in the kingdom, recommending Norfolk for her husband, and stipulating conditions for the advantage of both kingdoms (b). When Mary returned a favourable answer to this application, Norfolk employed himself with ardour in the execution of his project; and besides securing the interests of many of the considerable gentry and nobility who resided at court, he wrote letters to such as lived at their country seats, and possessed the greatest authority in the several counties. The kings of France and Spain, who interested themselves extremely in Mary's cause, were secretly consulted, and expressed their approbation of these measures. And though Elizabeth's consent was always supposed as a previous condition to the finishing of this alliance, it was apparently Norfolk's intention, when he proceeded such lengths without consulting her, to render his party so strong, that it should no longer be in her power to refuse it.

So extensive a conspiracy as this could not entirely escape the queen's vigilance nor that of Cecil. She dropped several intimations to the duke, by which he might learn, that she was acquainted with his designs; and she frequently warned him "to beware on what pillow he reposed his head:" but he had not the prudence or the courage to open his full intentions to her. Certain intelligence of this combination was given her first by Leicester, then by Murray (c), who, if ever he was sincere in promoting Norfolk's marriage, which is much to be doubted, had at least intended, for his own safety and that of his party, that Elizabeth should, in reality as well as in appearance, be completely arbiter of the conditions, and should not have her consent extorted by any confederacy of her own subjects. This information gave great alarm to the court of England; and the more so, as those intrigues were attended with other circumstances, of which, it is probable, Elizabeth was not unacquainted.

Among the nobility and gentry, that seemed to enter into Norfolk's views, there were many, who were zealously attached to the Catholic religion, who had no other design than that of restoring Mary to her liberty, and who would gladly, by a combination with foreign powers, or even at the expence of a civil war, have placed her on the throne of England. The earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, who possessed great power in the north, were leaders of this party; and the former nobleman made offer to the queen of Scots, by Leonard Dacres, brother to lord

(b) Particularly, that she should give sufficient surety to Elizabeth, and the heirs of her body, for the free enjoyment of the crown of England; that a perpetual league, offensive and defensive, should be made between their realms and subjects; that the Protestant religion should be established by law in Scotland; and that she should grant an amnesty to her rebels in that kingdom.

(c) It appears by Haynes, p. 521. 525. that Elizabeth had heard rumours of Norfolk's dealing with Murray; and charged the latter to inform her of the whole truth, which he accordingly did. See also the earl of Murray's letter produced on Norfolk's trial.

Dacres,

Dacres, that he would free her from confinement, and convey her to her own country, or any other place to which she should think proper to retire. Sir Thomas and sir Edward Stanley, sons of the earl of Derby, sir Thomas Gerrard, Rolstone, and other gentlemen, whose interest lay in the neighbourhood of the place where Mary resided, concurred in the same views: and required that, in order to facilitate the execution of the scheme, a diversion should, in the mean time, be made from the side of Flanders, under the duke of Alva, who was governor of the Netherlands for the king of Spain, and a zealous Catholic. The duke of Norfolk discouraged, and even in appearance suppressed, these conspiracies; both because his duty to Elizabeth would not permit him to think of effecting his purpose by rebellion, and because he foresaw that, if the queen of Scots came into the possession of these men, they would rather chuse for her husband the king of Spain, or some foreign prince, who had power, as well as inclination, to re-establish the Catholic religion.

The duke of Norfolk, in order to repress the surmises spread against him, spoke contemptuously to Elizabeth of the Scottish alliance; affirmed that his estate in England was more valuable than the revenue of a kingdom wasted by civil wars and factions; and declared that, when he amused himself in his own tennis-court at Norwich amidst his friends and vassals, he deemed himself at least a petty prince, and was fully satisfied with his condition. Perceiving that he did not convince her by these asseverations, and that he was looked on with a jealous eye by the ministers, he retired to his country-seat without taking leave. He soon after repented of this measure, and was returning to court, with a view of using every expedient to regain the queen's good graces; but he was met at St. Albans by Fitz-Garret, lieutenant of the band of pensioners, by whom he was conveyed to Burnham, three miles from Windsor, where the court then resided. He was shortly after committed to the Tower, under the custody of sir Henry Nevil. Lesley, bishop of Ross, the queen of Scots' ambassador, was examined, and confronted with Norfolk before the council. The earl of Pembroke was confined in his own house. Arundel, Lumley, and Throgmorton were taken into custody. Mary herself was removed to Coventry; all access to her was, during some time, more strictly prohibited; and viscount Hereford was joined to the earls of Shrewsbury and Huntingdon, in the office of guarding her.

The earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, aware of the suspicions entertained against them, by a jealous and vigilant court, held several meetings with their partizans, to consider of the expediency of prosecuting or abandoning their schemes in behalf of Mary. The earl of Sussex, president of the north, demanded of those two noblemen an account of their views; and, as they were not prepared for the insurrection which they meditated, they made strong protestations of loyalty and submission to Elizabeth. On fresh reports of their machinations, the queen commanded them to repair to her court at Windsor, that they might vindicate themselves from the aspersions which had been thrown upon their character. Conscious of the danger of putting themselves into the power of a princess, who had lately imprisoned the first peer of the realm for not having disclosed to her his intention of espousing the Scottish queen, they resolved to take arms without delay, and trust to the sword for their safety. They had prepared measures for a rebellion; had communicated their design to Mary and her ministers; had entered into a correspondence with the duke of Alva, governor of the Low Countries; had obtained his promise of a reinforcement of troops, and of a supply of arms and ammunition; and had prevailed on him to send over to London Chiapino Vitelli, one of his most famous captains, on pretence of adjusting some differences with the queen; but in reality with a view of putting him at the head of the northern rebels. The summons, sent to the two earls, precipitated the rising before they were fully prepared; and Northumberland remained in suspence between opposite dangers, when he was informed that some of his enemies were actually on the way with a commission to arrest him. He took horse instantly, and hastened to the seat of his associate the earl of Westmoreland, whom he found surrounded with his friends and vassals, and deliberating with regard to the measures which he should follow in the present emergence. The two earls now determined to begin the insurrection without delay; and the great credit of these noblemen, with that zeal for the Catholic religion, which still prevailed in the neighbourhood, soon drew together multitudes of the common people. They published a manifesto, in which they declared, that they intended to attempt nothing against the queen, to whom they avowed unshaken allegiance; and that their sole aim was to re-establish the religion of their ancestors, to bring about the reformation of disorders and abuses, to adjust the succession to the crown, to remove evil counsellors, and to restore the duke of Norfolk and other faithful peers to their liberty and to the queen's favour. The numbers of the malcontents amounted to four thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse; and they expected the concurrence of all the Catholics in England.

The queen was not negligent in her own defence; and she had beforehand, from her prudent and wise conduct, acquired the general good-will of her people, the best security of a sovereign; insomuch that even the Catholics in most counties expressed an affection for her service; and the duke of Norfolk himself, though he had lost her favour, and lay in confinement, was not wanting, as far as his situation permitted, to promote the levies among his friends and retainers. Sussex, attended by the earls of Rutland, the lords of Hunsdon, Evers, and Willoughby of Parham, marched against the rebels at the head of seven thousand men, and found them already advanced to the city of Durham, of which they had taken possession. They entered the cathedral, tore the books used in the Protestant service, erected a crucifix, and ordered the public celebration of mass. But they retired before Sussex to Hexham; and hearing that the earl of Warwick and lord Clinton were advancing against them with a greater body, they found no other resource than to disperse themselves without striking a blow. The common people retired to their houses: the leaders fled into Scotland. Northumberland was found loitering in that country, and was confined by Murray in the castle of Lochleven. Westmoreland received shelter from the chieftains of the Kers and Scots, partizans of Mary; and persuaded them to make an inroad into England, with a view of exciting a quarrel between the two kingdoms. After they had committed great ravages, they retreated to their own country. This sudden and precipitate rebellion was followed soon after by another still more imprudent, raised by Leonard Dacres, which Lord Hunsdon, at the head of the garrison of Berwick, was able, without any other assistance, to quell. Great severity was exercised against such as had taken part in these rash enterprizes. Above a hundred of them were executed by martial law at Durham and Hartlepool, by order of the earl of Sussex; and sir George Bowes, marshal of the army, put to death a much greater number, in the same summary way. Sixty-six petty constables were hanged; and it is said that not less than eight hundred persons, on the whole, suffered by the hands of the executioner for this rebellion. The earl of Westmoreland escaped into the Netherlands, where he subsisted on a small pension assigned to him by the Spanish monarch. The queen was so well pleased with Norfolk's behaviour, that she released him from the Tower; allowed him to live, though under some show of confinement, in his own house; and only exacted a promise from him not to proceed any farther in his negociations with the queen of Scots.

Elizabeth now found that the detention of Mary was attended with all the ill consequences which she had foreseen when she first embraced that measure. This latter princess, recovering, by means of her misfortunes and her own natural good sense, from that delirium into which she seems to have been thrown during her attachment to Bothwel, had behaved with such modesty, and judgement, and even dignity, that every one who approached her was charmed with her demeanour; and her friends denied the reality of all those crimes which had been imputed to her. Compassion for her situation, and the necessity of procuring her liberty, proved an incitement among all her partizans to be active in promoting her cause; and as her deliverance from captivity, it was thought, could nowise be effected but by attempts dangerous to the established government, Elizabeth had reason to expect little tranquillity so long as the Scottish queen remained a prisoner in her hands. She still flattered Mary with hopes of her protection, maintained an ambiguous conduct between that queen and her enemies in Scotland, negociated perpetually concerning the terms of her restoration, made constant professions of friendship to her; and by these artifices endeavoured both to hinder her from making any desperate efforts for her deliverance, and to satisfy the French and Spanish ambassadors, who never intermitted their solicitations, sometimes accompanied with menaces, in her behalf. This deceit was received with the same deceit by the queen of Scots: professions of confidence were returned by professions equally insincere; and while an appearance of friendship was maintained on both sides, the animosity and jealousy, which had long prevailed between them, became every day more inveterate and incurable. These two princesses, in address, capacity, activity, and spirit, were nearly a match for each other; but unhappily, Mary, besides her present forlorn condition, was always inferior in personal conduct and discretion, as well as in power, to her illustrious rival.

Elizabeth and Mary wrote at the same time letters to the regent. The queen of Scots desired, that her marriage with Bothwel might be examined, and a divorce be legally pronounced between them. The queen of England entered into a negociation with Murray for the surrender of her unfortunate prisoner into his hands; and she gave him the choice of three conditions; that Mary should be restored to her dignity on certain terms; that she should be associated with her son, and the administration remain in the regent's hands, till the young prince should come to years of discretion; or that she should be allowed to live at liberty as a private person in Scotland, and have an honourable settlement made in her favour. Murray summoned a convention of states, in order to deliberate on these proposals of the two queens: no answer was made by them to Mary's letter, on pretence that she had there employed the style of a sovereign, addressing herself to her subjects; but in reality, because they saw that her request was calculated to prepare the way for a marriage with Norfolk, or some powerful prince, who could support her cause, and restore her to the throne. They replied to Elizabeth, that the two former conditions were so derogatory to the royal authority of their prince, that they could not so much as deliberate concerning them: the third alone could be the subject of treaty. It was evident that Elizabeth, in proposing conditions so unequal in their importance, invited the Scots to a refusal of those which were most advantageous to Mary; and as it was difficult, if not impossible, to adjust all the terms of the third, so as to render it secure and eligible to all parties, it was concluded that she was not sincere in any of them.

It was pretended, that Murray had entered into a private negociation with Elizabeth to get Mary delivered into his hands; and as Elizabeth found the detention of her in England so dangerous, it is probable that she would have been pleased, on any honourable or safe terms, to rid herself of a prisoner who gave her so much inquietude. But all these projects vanished by the sudden death of the regent, who was assassinated, in revenge of a private injury, at Linlithgow, by James Hamilton, of Bothwellhaugh, on the 23rd of January, 1570. Murray was a person of considerable vigour, abilities, and constancy; but though he was not unsuccessful, during his regency, in composing the dissensions in Scotland, his talents shone out more eminently in the beginning than in the end of his life. His manners were rough and austere; and he possessed not that perfect integrity, which frequently accompanies, and can alone atone for, that unamiable character.

On the death of Murray, Scotland relapsed into anarchy. Mary's party, being now inspired with the hopes of her re-establishment, assembled together, and made themselves masters of Edinburgh. The castle, commanded by Kirkaldy of Grange, seemed to favour her cause; and as many of the principal nobility had embraced that party, it became probable, though the people were in general averse to her, that her authority might again acquire the ascendant. To check its progress, Elizabeth dispatched Sussex with an army to the North, under colour of chastizing the ravages committed by the borderers. He entered Scotland, and laid waste the lands of the Kers and Scots, seized the castle of Hume, and committed hostilities on all Mary's partizans, who, he said, had offended his mistress by harbouring the English rebels. The English armies were afterwards recalled by agreement with the queen of Scots, who promised, in return, that no French troops should be introduced into Scotland, and that the English rebels should be delivered up to the queen by her partizans.

But though the queen, covering herself with the pretence of revenging her own quarrel, so far contributed to support the party of the young king of Scots, she was cautious not to declare openly against Mary: and she even sent a request, which was equivalent to a command, to the enemies of that princess, not to elect, during some time, a regent in the place of Murray. Lenox, the king's grandfather, was therefore chosen temporary governor, under the title of Lieutenant. Hearing afterwards that Mary's partizans, instead of delivering up Westmoreland, and the other fugitives, as they had promised, had allowed them to escape into Flanders; she permitted the king's party to give Lenox the title of Regent, and she sent Randolph, as her resident in Scotland, to maintain a correspondence with him. But notwithstanding this step, taken in favour of Mary's enemies, she never laid aside her ambiguous conduct, or quitted the appearance of amity to that princess. Being importuned by the bishop of Ross, and her other agents, as well as by foreign ambassadors, she twice procured a suspension of arms between the Scottish factions, and by that means stopped the hands of the regent, who was likely to obtain advantages over the opposite party. Thus by seeming contrarieties she kept alive the factions in Scotland, increased their mutual hatred of each other, and rendered the whole country a scene of devastation and misery. She had not the most distant idea of conquering the kingdom, and consequently no interest or design to instigate the parties against each other; but this consequence was an accidental effect of her cautious politics, by which she was engaged, as far as possible, to keep on good terms with the queen of Scots, and never to violate the appearances of friendship with her, at least those of neutrality.

While Elizabeth was thus interposing in the affairs of Scotland, she was disturbed by a fresh insurrection in those parts of her dominions which bordered on that kingdom. Leonard Dacres, though he had offered his service to the queen in the late revolt, was not sincere in his professions of loyalty: for when he had raised a corps of borderers under the appearance of an intention of opposing the rebels, he allured to his standard many of the fugitive vassals of the two malcontent earls, and declared himself a friend to the queen of Scots. Lord Hunsdon, governor of Berwick, being ordered to march against Dacres, met him in Cumberland, and a sharp conflict ensued on the 20th of February, in which four hundred of the insurgents were slain. Their chief fled into Scotland, whence he escaped to the continent.

Lord Hunsdon was greatly averse to the severities of martial law, the late exercise of which had occasioned much clamour in the north, so that he interceded with the queen for a general pardon to the accomplices of Dacres; and she granted it, with the exception of some individuals whom she found most deserving of punishment. The same nobleman accompanied the earl of Sussex in an expedition into Scotland on the 17th of April, undertaken with a view of striking terror into Mary's partizans. While Sussex invaded North Britain on the eastern side, lord Scrope made an incursion into the western marches; and the horrors of devastation were diffused through the low-lands. Under pretext of retaliating the late ravages committed by the lairds of Buccleugh and Ferniherst, the English made an indiscriminate havock among the possessions of those who were disaffected to the authority of the young king. They burned a considerable number of villages, ravaged many estates, and demolished many forts. Having returned to Berwick, Sussex detached sir William Drury towards Edinburgh, for the ostensible purpose of seizing the English rebels who had taken refuge in Scotland; but the real view was to promote the appointment of such a substitute for the deceased regent as Elizabeth should be inclined to approve. At Boldingham, Drury received six hostages from the leaders of the king's party, for their subserviency to the will of Elizabeth; the earl of Lenox accompanied the English army. The king of France had promised, on the death of Murray, to send succours for promoting the restoration of Mary; but the troubles of his own realm, and the deceitful negociations by which Elizabeth amused him, precluded that relief which Mary expected from his interposition. The friends of the queen of Scots fled before the confederates, who, to augment the terror which they had already inspired, committed furious ravages on the estates of the duke of Chatelrault and other members of the Hamilton family. The consequence was, that the states of Scotland, soon after, admitted mitted the earl of Lenox to be governor of the realm, as mentioned above.

The better to amuse Mary with the prospect of restoration to her throne, secretary Cecil and sir Walter Mildmay were sent to her with proposals from Elizabeth. The terms were somewhat rigorous, such as a captive queen might expect from a jealous rival; and as they were greatly in Elizabeth's favour, they thereby bore the greater appearance of sincerity on the part of the English court. It was required that the queen of Scots, besides renouncing all title to the crown of England during the lifetime of Elizabeth, should make a perpetual league, offensive and defensive, between the kingdoms; that she should marry no Englishman without Elizabeth's consent, nor any other person without the consent of the states of Scotland: that compensation should be made for the late ravages committed in England, by the late inroad of the Scots; that justice should be executed on the murderers of lord Darnley, as well as on those who destroyed the earl of Murray; that the young prince should be sent into England, to be educated there; and that six hostages, all of them noblemen, should be delivered to the queen of England, with the castle of Hume, and some other fortresses, for the security of performance. Such were the conditions upon which Elizabeth promised to contribute her endeavours towards the restoration of the deposed Mary; the necessity of whose affairs obliged her to consent to them; and the kings of France and Spain, as well as the pope, when consulted by her upon the business, approved of her conduct; chiefly on account of the civil wars, by which all Europe was at that time agitated, and which incapacitated the Catholic princes from giving her any assistance.

Elizabeth's commissioners likewise proposed to Mary a plan of accommodation with her subjects in Scotland; and after some reasoning between the parties on that head, it was agreed that the queen should require the earl of Lenox, the regent, to send commissioners, in order to treat of conditions under her mediation. The partizans of Mary boasted, that all terms were fully settled with the court of England, and that the Scottish rebels would soon be constrained to submit to the authority of their sovereign: but Elizabeth took especial care that these rumours should meet with no credit, and that the king's party should not be discouraged, nor sink too low in their demands. The secretary Cecil wrote to inform the regent, that all the queen of England's proposals, so far from being fixed and irrevocable, were to be discussed afresh in the conference; and desired him to send commissioners who should be constant in the king's cause, and cautious not to make concessions which might be prejudicial to their party. Sussex also, in his letters, dropped hints to the same purpose; and Elizabeth herself said to the abbot of Dunfermling, whom Lenox had sent to the court of England, that she would not insist on Mary's restoration, provided the Scots could make the justice of their cause appear to her satisfaction; and that, even if their reasons should fall short of full conviction, she would take effectual care to provide for their future security.

The Scottish parliament, which met on the first of March, 1571, appointed the earl of Morton, commendator of Dunfermling, and sir James Macgill, together with the abbot of Dunfermling, to manage the treaty, but they came to no conclusion. These commissioners presented memorials, containing reasons for the deposition of their queen; and seconded their arguments with examples drawn from the Scottish history, with the authority of laws, and with the sentiments of many famous divines. The lofty ideas which Elizabeth had entertained, of the absolute, indefeasible right of sovereigns made her be shocked with these republican topics; and she told the Scottish commissioners, that she was by no means satisfied with their reasons for justifying the conduct of their countrymen; and that they might therefore, without attempting any apology, proceed to open the conditions which they required for their security. They replied, that their commission did not empower them to treat of any terms which might infringe the title and sovereignty of their young king, but they would gladly hear whatever proposals should be made them by her majesty. The conditions recommended by the queen were not disadvantageous to Mary; but as the commissioners still insisted, that they were not authorised to treat in any manner concerning the restoration of that princess, the conferences were necessarily broken off and Elizabeth dismissed the Scottish commissioners with injunctions that they should return, after having procured more ample powers from their parliament. The bishop of Ross openly complained to the English council, that they had abused his mistress by fair promises and professions; and Mary herself was no longer at a loss to judge of Elizabeth's insincerity. By reason of these disappointments, matters came still nearer to extremities between the two princesses; and the queen of Scots, finding all her hopes eluded, was more strongly incited to make, at all hazards, every possible attempt for her liberty and security.

The rage of intestine animosity now broke forth in continual skirmishes, of which the earl of Lenox, the regent, felt the fatal effects. A party of his enemies having attempted to surprize him at Stirling, a rencontre ensued, in which, though his friends prevailed, he was slain (d). He was succeeded in his high office by the earl of Marre, who, of all the nobles of the young king's party, possessed the greatest share of integrity and patriotism (e).

An incident also happened about this time, which tended to widen the breach between Mary and Elizabeth, and to increase the vigilance and jealousy of the latter princess. Pope Pius V. who had succeeded Paul, after having endeavoured in vain to conciliate by gentle means the friendship of Elizabeth, whom his predecessor's violence had irritated, issued, in 1570, a bull of excommunication against her, deprived her of all title to the crown, as an heretic and usurper, and absolved her subjects from their oaths of allegiance. It seems probable, that this attack on the queen's authority was made in concert with Mary, who intended by that means to forward the northern rebellion; a measure which was at that time in agitation. John Felton affixed this bull to the gates of the bishop of London's palace; and scorning either to fly or to deny the fact, wishing for the high honour of suffering in the cause of Popery, he was seized and condemned, and executed.

On the 2nd of April, a new parliament, after five years' interval, was assembled at Westminster; and as the queen, by the rage of the pope against her, was become still more the head of the ruling party, it might be expected, as was the case, both from this incident and from her own prudent and vigorous conduct, that her authority over the two houses would be absolutely uncontrollable. We shall be somewhat particular in relating the transactions of this session, because they shew, as well the extent of the royal power during that age, as the character of Elizabeth, and the genius of her government. It will be curious also to observe the faint dawn of the spirit of liberty among the English, the jealousy with which that spirit was repressed by the sovereign, the imperious conduct which was maintained in opposition to it, and the ease with which it was subdued by this arbitrary princess.

The lord keeper Bacon, after the speaker of the commons was elected, told the parliament, in the queen's name, that she enjoined them not to meddle with any matters of state: such was his expression; by which he probably meant, the questions of the queen's marriage and the succesion, about which they had before given her some uneasiness: for as to the other great points of government, alliances, peace and war, or foreign negociations; no parliament in that age ever presumed to take them under consideration, or question, in these particulars, the conduct of their sovereign, or of his ministers.

In the former parliament, the Protestant dissenters, then called Puritans, had introduced seven bills for a farther reformation in religion; but they had not been able to prevail in any one of them. The queen, displeased at the freedom of speech adopted by the puritanical members, and alarmed at the spirit of inquiry which they endeavoured to propagate among their parliamentary associates, resolved to check their presumption. This house of commons had sitten a very few days only, when Stricland, a member, revived one of the bills, that for the amendment of the liturgy. The chief objection, which he mentioned, was the sign of the cross in baptism. Another member added, the kneeling at the sacrament; and remarked that, if a posture of humiliation were requisite in that act of devotion, it were better that the communicants should throw themselves prostrate on the ground, in order to keep at the widest distance from former superstition (f).

The courtiers did not forget to insist on the topics which they knew were agreeable to Elizabeth. The treasurer of the household, though he allowed that any heresy might be repressed by parliament, yet he affirmed, that it belonged to the queen alone, as head of the church, to regulate every question of ceremony in worship. The comptroller seconded this argument; insisted on the extent of the queen's prerogative; and said that the house might, from former examples, have taken warning not to meddle with such matters. One Pistor opposed these remonstrances of the courtiers. He was scandalised, he said, that affairs of such infinite consequence (namely, kneeling and making the sign of the cross) should be passed over so lightly. These questions, he added, concern the salvation of souls, and interest every one more deeply than the monarchy of the whole world. This cause he shewed to be the cause of God; the rest were all but terrene, yea trifles in comparison, call them ever so great: subsidies, crowns, kingdoms, he knew not what weight they had when laid in the balance with subjects of such unspeakable importance. But though the zeal of this member seems to have been generally approved of, the house, overawed by the prerogative, voted upon the question, that a petition should be presented to her majesty, for her licence to proceed farther in this bill; and, in the mean time, that they should stop all debate or reasoning concerning it.

Matters would probably have rested here, had not the queen been so highly offended with Stricland's presumption, in moving the bill for the reformation of the liturgy, that she summoned him before the council, and prohibited him thenceforth from appearing in the house of commons. This act of power was too violent even for the submissive parliament to endure. Carleton took notice of the matter; complained that the liberties of the house were invaded; observed that Stricland was not a private man, but represented a multitude; and moved, that he might be sent for, and, if he were guilty of any offence, might answer for it at the bar of the house, which he insinuated to be the only competent tribunal. Yelverton enforced the principles of liberty with still greater boldness. He said, that the precedent was dangerous: and though in this happy time of lenity, among so many good and honourable personages as were at present invested with authority, nothing of extremity or injury was to be apprehended; yet the times might alter; what now is permitted, might hereafter be construed as duty; and might be enforced even on the ground of the present permission. He added, that all matters not treasonable, or which implied not too much derogation of the imperial crown, might, without offence, be introduced into parliament; where every question that concerned the community must be considered, and where even the right of the crown itself must finally be determined. He remarked, that men sat not in that house in their private capacities, but as elected by their country; and though it was proper that the prince should retain his prerogative, yet was that prerogative limited by law: as the sovereign could not of himself make laws, neither could he break them, merely from his own authority.

These principles were popular, and noble, and generous; but the open assertion of them was, at this time, somewhat new in England: and the courtiers were more warranted by present practice, when they advanced a contrary doctrine. The treasurer warned the house to be cautious in their proceedings; neither to venture farther than their assured warrant might extend, nor hazard their good opinion with her majesty in any doubtful cause. The member, he said, whose attendance they required, was not restrained on account of any liberty of speech, but for his exhibiting a bill in the house against the prerogative of the queen; a temerity which was not to be tolerated. And he concluded with observing, that even speeches, made in that house, had been questioned and examined by the sovereign. Cleere, another member, remarked, that the sovereign's prerogative is not so much as disputable, and that the safety of the queen is the safety of the subject. He added, that, in questions of divinity, every man was for his instruction to repair to his ordinary; and he seems to insinuate, that the bishops themselves, for their instruction, must repair to the queen. Fleetwood observed, that in his memory, he knew a man, who, in the fifth of the present queen, had been called to account for a speech in the house. But lest this example should be deemed too recent, he would inform them, from the parliament rolls, that, in the reign of Henry V. a bishop was committed to prison by the king's command, on account of his freedom of speech; and the parliament presumed not to go farther than to be humble suitors for him: in the subsequent reign the speaker himself was committed, with another member; and the house found no other remedy than a like submissive application. He advised the house to have recourse to the same expedient; and not to presume either to send for their member, or demand him as of right. During this speech, those members of the privy-council who sat in the house whispered together; upon which the speaker moved, that the house should make stay of all farther proceedings; a motion which was immediately complied with. The queen, finding that the experiment which she had made was likely to excite a great ferment, saved her honour by this silence of the house; and lest the question might be resumed, she sent next day to Stricland her permission to give his attendance in parliament.

Notwithstanding the rebuke which the parliament had received from the throne, the zeal of the commons still engaged them to continue the discussion of the other bills which regarded religion; but they were interrupted by a still more arbitrary proceeding of the queen, in which the lords condescended to be her instruments. This house sent a message to the commons, desiring that a committee might attend them. In consequence of which some members were appointed for that purpose; and the upper house acquainted them, that the queen's majesty being informed of the articles of reformation which they had canvassed, approved of them, intended to publish them, and to make the bishops execute them, by virtue of her royal authority, as supreme head of the church of England; but that she would not permit them to be treated of in parliament. The house, though they did not entirely stop proceedings on account of this injunction, seem not to have been offended at such haughty treatment; and in the issue all the bills came to nothing.

A motion made by Robert Bell, a Puritan, against an exclusive patent granted to a company of merchants in Bristol, gave also occasion to several remarkable incidents. The queen, some days after the motion was made, sent orders by the mouth of the speaker, commanding the house to spend little time in motions, and to avoid long speeches. All the members understood that she had been offended, because a matter had been moved which seemed to touch her prerogative. Fleetwood observed, that the queen had a prerogative of granting patents; that to question the validity of any patent was to invade the royal prerogative; that all foreign trade was entirely subjected to the pleasure of the sovereign; that even the statute which gave liberty of commerce, admitted of all prohibitions from the crown; and that the prince, when he granted an exclusive patent, only employed the power vested in him, and prohibited all others from dealing in any particular branch of commerce. He quoted the clerk of the parliament's book, to prove that no man might speak in parliament of the statute of wills, unless the king first gave licence; because the royal prerogative in the wards was thereby touched. He shewed likewise the statutes of Edward I. Edward III. and Henry IV. with a saving of the prerogative. And in Edward VI.'s time, the protector was applied to for his allowance to mention matters of prerogative.

Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the gallant and renowned sea-adventurer, carried these topics still farther. He endeavoured to prove the motion made by Bell to be a vain device, and perilous to be treated of; since it tended to the derogation of the prerogative imperial, which whoever should attempt so much as in fancy, could not, he said, be otherwise accounted than an open enemy. For what difference is there between saying that the queen is not to use the privilege of the crown, and saying that she is not queen? And though experience has shewn so much clemency in her majesty, as might, perhaps, make subjects forget their duty; it is not good to sport or venture too much much with princes (g). He desired them to beware, lest, if they meddled farther with these matters, the queen might look to her own power; and finding herself able to suppress their challenged liberty, and to exert an arbitrary authority, might imitate the example of Louis XI. of France, who, as he termed it, delivered the crown from wardship.

(f) Religion was a point, of which Elizabeth was, if possible, still more jealous than of matters of state. She pretended that, in quality of supreme head or governor of the church, she was fully empowered, by her prerogative alone, to decide all questions which might arise with regard to doctrine, discipline, or worship; and she never would allow her parliaments so much as to take these points into consideration.

The speeches of the court party on this occasion gave great disgust to the favourers of the liberty of animadverting upon the prerogatives of the crown; and they were told, that sir Humphrey mistook the meaning of the house, and of the member who made the motion: they never had any other purpose, than to represent their grievances, in due and seemly form, unto her majesty. But in a subsequent debate, Peter Wentworth, a man of a superior free spirit, called sir Humphrey Gilbert's speech an insult on the house; and asserted that he had a disposition to flatter and fawn on the prince; he compared him to the cameleon, which can change itself into all colours, except white; and recommended to the house a due care of liberty of speech, and of the privileges of parliament. It appears, however, that the motion against the exclusive patent had no effect. Bell, the member who first introduced it, was sent for by the council, and was severely reprimanded for his temerity. He returned to the house with such an amazed countenance, that all the members, well informed of the reason, were struck with terror; and during some time no one ventured to speak of any matter of importance, for fear of giving offence to the queen and the council. Even after the fears of the commons were somewhat abated, the members spoke with extreme precaution; and by employing most of their discourse in preambles and apologies, they shewed their conscious terror of the rod which hung over them. Wherever any delicate point was touched, though ever so gently; nay, seemed to be approached, though at ever so great a distance, the whisper ran about the house, "The queen will be offended; the council will be extremely displeased:" and by these surmises men were warned of the danger to which they exposed themselves. It is remarkable, that the patent, which the queen defended with such imperious violence, was contrived for the profit of four courtiers, and was attended with the utter ruin of seven or eight thousand of her industrious subjects (h).

Thus every thing which passed the two houses was extremely respectful and submissive; notwithstanding which the queen thought it incumbent on her, at the conclusion of the session, on the 29th of May, to check, and that with great severity, those feeble efforts of liberty, which had appeared in the motions and speeches of some of the members of the lower house. The lord keeper told the commons, in her majesty's name, that, though the majority of the house of commons had shewn themselves in their proceedings discreet and dutiful, yet a few of them had discovered a contrary character, and had justly merited the reproach of audacious, arrogant, and presumptuous: contrary to their duty both as subjects and parliament men, nay, contrary to the express injunctions given them from the throne at the beginning of the session, injunctions which it might well become them to have better attended to, they had presumed to call in question her majesty's grants and prerogatives. But her majesty warns them, that, since they thus wilfully forget themselves, they are otherwise to be admonished: some other species of correction must be found for them; since neither the commands of her majesty, nor the example of their wiser brethren, can reclaim their folly, by which they are thus led to meddle with what by no means belongs to them, and what lies beyond the compass of their understanding to comprehend (i).

The Puritans, however, in one particular, evinced a zeal which was more agreeable to the inclinations of Elizabeth than their desire of religious innovation or of political liberty. We allude to their animosity against the queen of Scotland, whom they detested for her attachment to the Romish superstition. But, though Elizabeth was not displeased at their rancour against her rival, she was at present unwilling to give encouragement to a motion which was made in this session, importing that Mary, if she should in any respect infringe the laws of England, should be subjected to the same judicature to which the wife of an English peer was amenable. She considered this proposal as premature; and her influence procured the rejection of it.

Among the laws enacted this session were the following: It was declared treason, during the life-time of the queen, to affirm, that she was not the lawful sovereign, or that any other possessed a preferable title, or that she was a heretic, schismatic, or infidel, or that the laws and statutes cannot limit and determine the right of the crown and the successor thereof: to maintain in writing or printing, that any person, except the natural issue (k) of her body, is or ought to be the queen's heir or successor, subjected the person, and all his abettors, for the first offence, to imprisonment during a year, and to the forfeiture of half their goods: the second offence subjected them to the penalty of a premunire. It was also enacted, that whosoever by bulls should publish absolutions or other receipts of the pope, or should, by means of them, reconcile any man to the church of Rome, such offenders, as well as those who were so reconciled, should be guilty of high treason. The penalty of a premunire was imposed on every one who imported any Agnus Dei, crucifix, or such other implement of superstition, consecrated by the pope. The former laws against usury were enforced by a new statute. A supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths was granted by parliament. The queen, as she was determined to yield to them none of her power, was very cautious in asking them for any supply. She endeavoured by a rigid frugality to make her ordinary revenues suffice for the necessities of the crown, but if she found these insufficient, she procured money by the granting of patents, monopolies, or by some such ruinous expedient.

We shall now resume our account of the civil wars in (g) He reminded them of the fable of the hare, who, upon the proclamation, that all horned beasts should depart the court, immediately fled, lest his ears should be construed to be horns; and by this apologue he seems to insinuate, that even those who heard or permitted such dangerous speeches, would not themselves be entirely free from danger.

(h) Sir Simon D'Ewes, p. 242.

(i) In all these transactions appears clearly the opinion which Elizabeth had entertained of the duty and authority of parliaments. They were not to canvass any matters of state; still less were they to meddle with the church. Questions of either kind were, in the queen's estimation, far above their reach, and were appropriated to the prince alone, or to those councils and ministers with whom he was pleased to entrust them. What then was the office of parliaments? They might give directions for the due tanning of leather, or milling of cloth; for the preservation of pheasants and partridges; for the reparation of bridges and highways; for the punishment of vagabonds or common beggars. Regulations concerning the police of the country came properly under their inspection; and the laws of this kind which they prescribed had, if not a greater, yet a more durable authority, than those which were derived solely from the proclamations of the sovereign. Precedents or reports could fix a rule for decisions in private property, or the punishment of crimes; but no alteration or innovation in the municipal law could proceed from any other source than the parliament; nor would the courts of justice be induced to change their established practice by an order of council. But the most acceptable part of parliamentary proceedings was the granting of subsidies; the attainting and punishing of the nobility who had become disagreeable in the eyes of the sovereign, or any minister of state after his fall; the countenancing of such great efforts of power, as might be deemed somewhat exceptionable, when they proceeded entirely from the reigning prince. The redress of grievances was sometimes promised to the people; but seldom could have place, while it was an established rule, that the prerogatives of the crown must not be abridged, or so much as questioned and examined in parliament. Even though monopolies and exclusive companies had already reached an enormous height, and were every day increasing, to the destruction of all liberty, and extinction of all industry; it was criminal in a member to propose, in the most dutiful and regular manner, a parliamentary application against any of them. These maxims of government were not kept secret by Elizabeth, or smoothed over by any fair appearances or plausible pretences. They were openly avowed in her speeches and messages to parliament; and were accompanied with all the haughtiness, nay sometimes bitterness, of expression, which the meanest servant could look for from his offended master. Yet, says Hume, notwithstanding this conduct, Elizabeth continued to be the most popular sovereign that ever swayed the sceptre of England; because the maxims of her reign were conformable to the principles of the times, and to the opinion generally entertained with regard to the constitution. The continued encroachments of popular assemblies on Elizabeth's successors have so changed our ideas in these matters, that the passages above mentioned appear to us extremely curious, and even at first surprising; but they were so little remarked during the time, that neither Camden, though a contemporary writer, nor any other historian, has taken any notice of them. So absolute, indeed, was the authority of the crown, that the precious spark of liberty had been kindled, and was preserved, by the Puritans alone; and it was to this sect that the English owe the whole freedom of their constitution. Actuated by that zeal and courage which they have been remarkable for, they hazarded the utmost indignation of their sovereign; and employing all their industry to be elected into parliament, a matter not difficult while a seat was rather regarded as a burthen than an advantage, they first acquired a majority in that assembly, and then obtained an ascendant over the church and monarchy.

(k) We may here observe, that the usual phrase of lawful issue, which the parliament thought indecent towards the queen, as if she could be supposed to have any other, was changed into that of natural issue. But this alteration was the source of pleasantry during the time; and some suspected a deeper design, as if Leicester intended, in case of the queen's demise, to produce some bastard of his own, and affirm that he was her offspring. Camden, p. 436.

France.

France. The league formed at Bayonne in 1566 for the extermination of the Protestants, had not been concluded so secretly but intelligence of it had reached Condé, Coligni, and the other leaders of the Hugonots; and finding that the measures of the court agreed with their suspicions, they determined to prevent the cruel perfidy of their enemies, and to strike a blow before the Catholics were aware of the danger. The Hugonots, though dispersed over the whole kingdom, formed a kind of separate empire; and being closely united, as well by their religion as by the dangers to which they were perpetually exposed, they obeyed, with entire submission, the orders of their leaders, who were ready on every signal to have recourse to arms. The king and queen mother were living in great security at Monceaux, in Brie, where they found themselves surrounded by Protestant troops, which had secretly marched thither from all quarters; and had not a body of Swiss come speedily to their relief, and conducted them to Paris, they must have fallen, without resistance, into the hands of the malcontents. A battle was afterwards fought in the plains of St. Dennis; where, though the old constable Montmorency, the general of the Catholics, was killed combating bravely at the head of his troops, the Hugonots were finally defeated. Condé, collecting his broken forces, and receiving a strong reinforcement from the German Protestants, appeared again in the field; and laying siege to Chartres, a place of great importance, obliged the court to agree to a new accommodation. Notwithstanding this seeming reconciliation between the parties, so great was the zeal of the Catholics to exterminate the Hugonots, that a plan was laid for seizing the person of the prince and admiral; who narrowly escaped to Rochelle, and summoned their partizans to their assistance. The civil wars were renewed with greater fury than ever, and the parties became still more exasperated against each other. The young duke of Anjou, brother to the king, commanded the forces of the Catholics; and fought, in 1569, a battle at Jarnac with the Hugonots, where the prince of Condé was killed, and his army defeated. This discomfiture with the loss of so great a leader, reduced not the Hugonots to despair. The admiral still supported the cause; and having placed at the head of the Protestants the prince of Navarre, then sixteen years of age, and the young prince of Condé, he encouraged the party rather to perish bravely in the field, than ignominiously by the hands of the executioner. He collected such numbers, so determined to endure every extremity, that he was enabled to make head against the duke of Anjou; and being strengthened by a new reinforcement of Germans, he obliged that prince to retreat and to divide his forces.

Coligni then laid siege to Poictiers; and as the eyes of all France were fixed on this enterprize, the duke of Guise, emulous of the renown which his father had acquired by the defence of Metz, threw himself into the place, and so animated the garrison by his valour and conduct, that the admiral was obliged to raise the siege. Such was the commencement of that unrivalled fame and grandeur afterwards attained by this duke of Guise. The attachment which all the Catholics had borne to his father was immediately transferred to the son; and men pleased themselves in comparing all the great and shining qualities which seemed in a manner hereditary in that family.

Queen Elizabeth, who kept her attention fixed on the civil commotions of France, was not pleased with this new rise of her enemies the Guises; and being anxious for the fate of the Protestants, whose interests were connected with her own, she was engaged, notwithstanding her aversion from all rebellion, and from all opposition to the will of the sovereign, to give them secretly some assistance. Besides employing her authority with the German princes, she lent money to the queen of Navarre, and received some jewels as pledges for the loan. She even permitted Henry Champernon to levy, and transport over into France, a regiment of a hundred gentlemen volunteers; among whom Walter Raleigh, then a young man, began to distinguish himself in that great school of military valour. The admiral, constrained by the impatience of his troops, and by the difficulty of subsisting them, fought with the duke of Anjou the battle of Moncontour in Poictou, where he was wounded and defeated. The court of France, notwithstanding their frequent experience of the obstinacy of the Hugonots, and the vigour of Coligni, flattered themselves that the force of the rebels was at last finally annihilated; and neglected farther preparations against a foe, who, they thought, could never more become dangerous. They were surprized to hear that this leader had appeared, without dismay, in another quarter of the kingdom; had encouraged the young princes, whom he governed, to like constancy; had assembled an army; had taken the field; and was even strong enough to threaten Paris. The public finances, diminished by the continued disorders of the kingdom, and wasted by so many fruitless military enterprizes, could no longer bear the charge of a new armament; and the king, notwithstanding his extreme animosity against the Hugonots, was obliged, in 1570, to conclude an accommodation with them, to grant them a pardon for all past offences, and to renew the edicts for liberty of conscience.

Though a pacification was seemingly concluded, the mind of Charles was not reconciled to his rebellious subjects; and this accommodation, like all the foregoing, was only a snare, by which the perfidious court had projected to destroy at once, without danger, all its formidable enemies. As the two young princes, the admiral, and the other leaders of the Hugonots, instructed by past experience, discovered an extreme distrust of the king's intentions, and kept themselves in security at a distance, all possible artifices were employed to remove their apprehensions, and to convince them of the sincerity of the new counsels which seemed to be embraced. The terms of the peace were religiously observed to them; the toleration was strictly maintained; all attempts made by the Catholics to infringe it were punished with severity; offices, and favours, and honours, were bestowed on the principal nobility among the Protestants; and the king and council every where declared, that, tired of civil disorders, and convinced of the impossibility of forcing men's consciences, they were thenceforth determined to allow every one the free exercise of his religion.

Among the other artifices employed to lull the Protestants into fatal security, Charles affected to enter into close connection with Elizabeth; and as it seemed not the interest of France to forward the union of the two kingdoms of Great Britain, that princess the more easily flattered herself that the French monarch would prefer her friendship to that of the queen of Scots. The better to deceive her, proposals of marriage were made by Catherine de Medicis with her son Henry, duke of Anjou. The queen immediately founded on this offer the project of deceiving the court of France; and being intent on that artifice, she laid herself the more open to be deceived. Negociations were entered into with regard to the marriage; terms of the contract were proposed; difficulties started and removed; and the two courts, equally insincere, though not equally culpable, seemed to approach every day nearer to each other in their demands and concessions. The great obstacle seemed to lie in adjusting the difference of religion; because Elizabeth, who recommended toleration to Charles, was determined not to grant it in her own dominions, not even to her husband; and the duke of Anjou seemed unwilling to submit, for the sake of interest, to the dishonour of an apostacy.

The artful politics of Elizabeth never triumphed so much in any contrivances as in those which were conjoined with her coquetry; and as her character in this particular was generally known, the court of France thought that they might, without danger of forming any final conclusion, venture the farther in their concessions and offers to her.

The affairs of the Netherlands likewise excited Elizabeth's attention. The inhabitants of the Low Countries were thrown into the greatest disorders on account of the diversity of opinions which prevailed in religious matters. The emperor Charles, who proposed to augment his authority, under pretence of defending the Catholic faith, adopted the principle that innovation in religion, and rebellion go hand in hand; and notwithstanding the limited prerogative which he possessed in the Netherlands, he published the most arbitrary, severe, and tyrannical edicts against the Protestants; and he took care that the execution of them should be no less violent and sanguinary. He was neither cruel nor bigoted in his natural disposition; yet an historian, celebrated for moderation and caution, has computed, that in the several persecutions promoted by that monarch, no less than a hundred thousand persons perished by the hands of the executioner (l). But these severe remedies, were so far from answering the purposes intended, that they rather served to augment the numbers as well as zeal of the Reformers; and the magistrates of the several towns, seeing no end of those barbarous executions, felt their humanity rebel against their principles, and declined any farther persecution of the Protestants.

When Philip succeeded to his father's dominions, the Flemings were justly alarmed with new apprehensions; lest their prince, observing the lenity of the magistrates, should take the execution of the edicts from their hands, and establish the inquisition in the Low Countries, accompanied with all the iniquities and barbarities which attended it in Spain. The severe and unrelenting character of the man, his attachment to Spanish manners, and the inflexible bigotry of his principles, increased their terror: and when he departed the Netherlands, with an intention never to return, the disgust of the inhabitants was greatly augmented, and their dread of those tyrannical orders which their sovereign, surrounded with Spanish ministers, would issue from his cabinet at Madrid. He left the duchess of Parma, governess of the Low Countries; but reserved to himself the supreme direction of its affairs. The Flemings found, that the name alone of regent remained with the duchess; that cardinal Granville possessed the king's confidence; that attempts were every day made on their liberties; that a resolution was taken never more to assemble the states; that new bishoprics were arbitrarily erected, in order to enforce the execution of the persecuting edicts; and that, on the whole, they must expect to be reduced to the condition of a province under the Spanish monarchy. The discontents of the nobility gave countenance to the complaints of the gentry, which encouraged the mutiny of the populace; and all orders of men shewed a strong disposition to revolt. Associations were formed, tumultuary petitions presented, names of distinction assumed, badges of party displayed; and the current of the people, impelled by religious zeal and irritated by feeble resistance, rose to such a height, that in several towns, particularly in Antwerp, they made an open invasion on the established worship, pillaged the churches and monasteries, broke the images, and committed the most outrageous disorders.

The wiser part of the nobility, particularly the prince of Orange, and the counts Egmont and Hoorn, were alarmed at these excesses, to which their own discontents had at first given countenance; and seconding the wisdom of the governess, they suppressed the dangerous insurrections, punished the ringleaders, and reduced all the provinces to a state of order and submission. But Philip was not contented with the re-establishment of his former authority, and therefore determined to lay hold of the late popular disorders, as a pretence for entirely abolishing the privileges of the low country provinces; and for ruling them thenceforth with a military and arbitrary authority. In the execution of this tyrannical measure, he employed Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alva, a proper instrument in the hands of such a sanguinary monster; who instructed him to conceive no measures between prince and subject, but those of rigid command and implicit obedience. This general, in 1568, conducted from Italy to the Low Countries a powerful body of veteran Spaniards; and his avowed animosity to the Flemings, with his known character, struck the whole people with terror and consternation. We cannot with propriety relate at length all those violences which Alva's natural barbarity, steeled by reflection, and aggravated by insolence, exercised on those flourishing provinces. It may suffice to say, that all their privileges, the gift of so many princes, and the inheritance of so many ages, were openly and expressly abolished by edict; arbitrary and sanguinary tribunals were erected; the counts Egmont and Hoorn, in spite of their great merits and past services, were brought to the scaffold; multitudes of all ranks were thrown into confinement, and thence were delivered over to the executioner; and notwithstanding the peaceable submission of all men, nothing was heard of but confiscation, imprisonment, exile, torture, and death.

Elizabeth was equally displeased to see the progress of that scheme, laid for the extermination of the Protestants, and to observe the erection of so great a military power, in a state situated so near to her own country. She gave protection to all the Flemish exiles who took shelter in her dominions; and as many of these were the most industrious inhabitants of the Netherlands, and had rendered that country celebrated for its arts, she reaped the advantage of introducing into England some useful manufactures, which were formerly unknown in that kingdom (m).

Elizabeth's enemies, in order to revenge themselves for her insults, had naturally recourse to one policy, the supporting of the cause and pretensions of the queen of Scots, and Alva, whose measures were ever violent, soon opened a secret intercourse with that princess. The duke of Alva flattered Mary with the prospect of being restored to liberty and to her throne; and by the direction of his Catholic majesty, he employed emissaries to foment the disaffection of the English Papists, to the sway of Elizabeth, and persuade them to attempt the rescue of the imprisoned queen. The pope, by the medium of Ridolphi, (an Italian merchant who had long resided in London,) promoted the same cause, and even offered his purse for the encouragement of Mary's friends. This foreigner, who was a man of address and intrigue, had been confined by Elizabeth for his promotion of Mary's projected union with the duke of Norfolk; but having been soon restored to liberty, he had an opportunity of renewing his correspondence with that princess. Her steady friend, the bishop of Ross, acted in concert with Ridolphi; and the offers of the pope and the king of Spain being communicated to her English partizans, a conspiracy was formed for her relief. This man, zealous for the Catholic faith, had formed a scheme, in concert with the Spanish ambassador, for subverting the government, by a foreign invasion and a domestic insurrection; and when he communicated his project, by letter, to Mary, he found that, as she was now fully convinced of Elizabeth's artifices, and despaired of ever recovering her authority, or even her liberty, by pacific measures, she willingly gave her concurrence. The great number of discontented Catholics were the chief source of their hopes on the side of England; but in order to inspire life and courage into the malcontents, it was requisite that some great nobleman should put himself at their head; and no one appeared to Ridolphi, and to the bishop of Ross, who entered into all their intrigues, so proper, both on account of his power and his popularity, as the duke of Norfolk.

This nobleman, when released from confinement in the Tower, had given his solemn promise, that he would never resume his intercourse with the queen of Scots; but finding that he had lost, and, as he feared, beyond recovery, the confidence and favour of Elizabeth, and being still, in some degree, restrained from his liberty, he was tempted to violate his faith, and to open afresh his correspondence with the captive princess, at the instigation of Ridolphi and the bishop of Ross. A promise of marriage was renewed between them; the duke engaged to enter into all her interests; and as his remorses gradually diminished in the course of these transactions, he was pushed to give his consent to enterprizes still more criminal. Ridolphi's plan was, that the duke of Alva should, on some other pretence, assemble a great quantity of shipping in the Low Countries; should transport a body of six thousand foot, and four thousand horse, into England; should land them at Harwich, where the duke of Norfolk was to join them with all his friends; should thence march directly to London, and oblige the queen to submit to whatever terms the conspirators should please to impose upon her. Norfolk expressed his assent to this plan; and three letters, in consequence of it, were written in his name by Ridolphi, one to the duke of Alva, another to the pope, and a third to the king of Spain; but the duke, apprehensive of the danger, refused to sign them. He only sent to the Spanish ambassador a servant and confident, named Barker, as well to notify his concurrence in the plan, as to vouch for the authenticity of these letters; and Ridolphi having obtained a letter of credence from the ambassador, proceeded on his journey to Brussels and to Rome. The duke of Alva and the pope embraced the scheme with alacrity: Ridolphi informed Norfolk of their intentions: and every thing seemed to concur in forwarding the undertaking.

(m) Foreseeing that the violent government of Alva could not long subsist without exciting some commotion, Elizabeth ventured to commit an insult upon him, which she would have been cautious not to hazard against a more established authority. Some Genoese merchants had engaged, by contract with Philip, to transport into Flanders the sum of four hundred thousand crowns; and the vessels, on which this money was embarked, had been attacked in the Channel by some privateers equipped by the French Hugonots, and had taken shelter in Plymouth and Southampton. The commanders of the ships pretended that the money belonged to the king of Spain; but the queen, finding, upon inquiry, that it was the property of Genoese merchants, took possession of it as a loan; and by that means deprived the duke of Alva of this resource in the time of his greatest necessity. Alva, in revenge, seized all the English merchants in the Low Countries, threw them into prison, and confiscated their effects. The queen retaliated by a like violence on the Flemish and Spanish merchants; and gave all the English liberty to make reprisals on the subjects of Philip. These differences were afterwards accommodated by treaty, and mutual reparations were made to the merchants: but nothing could repair the loss which so well-timed a blow inflicted on the Spanish government in the Low Countries. Alva, in want of money, and dreading the immediate mutiny of his troops, to whom great arrears were due, imposed by his arbitrary will the most ruinous taxes on the people. He not only required the hundredth penny, and the twentieth of all immoveable goods; but he likewise demanded the tenth of all moveable goods on every sale; an absurd tyranny, which would not only have destroyed all arts and commerce, but even have restrained the common intercourse of life. The people refused compliance; the duke had recourse to his usual expedient of the gibbet; and thus matters came still nearer the last extremities between the Flemings and the Spaniards.

Notwithstanding his consent to these criminal enterprizes, Norfolk had never entirely forgotten his duty to his sovereign, his country, and his religion; and though he was to have headed an invasion and an insurrection, he vainly flattered himself, that the innocency of his intentions would justify the violence of his measures, and that, as he aimed at nothing but the liberty of the queen of Scots, and the obtaining of Elizabeth's consent to his marriage, he could not justly reproach himself as a rebel and a traitor. It is certain, however, that, considering the queen's vigour and spirit, the scheme, if successful, must finally have ended in dethroning her; and her authority was here exposed to the utmost danger.

The conspiracy had hitherto escaped the vigilance of Elizabeth, and that of secretary Cecil, now lord Burleigh. It was from another attempt of Norfolk's, that they first obtained a hint, which, being diligently traced, led at last to a full discovery. Mary had intended to send a sum of money to lord Herries, and her partizans in Scotland; and Norfolk undertook to have it delivered to Bannister, a servant of his, at that time in the north, who was to find some expedient for conveying it to lord Herries. He entrusted the money to a servant who was not in the secret, and told him, that the bag contained a sum of money in silver, which he was to deliver to Bannister with a letter: but the servant conjecturing, from the weight and size of the bag, that it was full of gold, carried the letter to lord Burleigh; who immediately ordered Bannister, Barker, and Hickford, the duke's secretary, to be put under arrest, and to undergo a severe examination. Torture made them confess the whole truth; and as Hickford, though ordered to burn all papers, had carefully kept them concealed under the mats of the duke's chamber, and under the tiles of the house, full evidence now appeared against his master. Norfolk himself, who was entirely ignorant of the discoveries made by his servants, was brought before the council; and though exhorted to atone for his guilt by a full confession, he persisted in denying every crime with which he was charged. The queen always declared, that, if he had given her this proof of his sincere repentance, she would have pardoned all his former offences; but finding him obstinate, she committed him to the Tower, and ordered him to be brought to his trial. The bishop of Ross had, on some suspicion, been committed to custody before the discovery of Norfolk's guilt; and every expedient was employed to make him reveal his share in the conspiracy. He at first insisted on his privilege; but he was told, that, as his mistress was no longer a sovereign, he would not be regarded as an ambassador, and that, even if that character were allowed, it did not warrant him in conspiring against the sovereign at whose court he resided. As he still refused to answer interrogatories, he was informed of the confession made by Norfolk's servants; after which he no longer scrupled to make a full discovery; and his evidence put the guilt of that nobleman beyond all doubt. Being brought to trial before his peers, the duke of Norfolk was arraigned on the following heads: it was alledged against him, that, in the eleventh year of Elizabeth, he had conspired against her crown and life, and had requested the aid of foreign arms for the accomplishment of his traitorous purposes; that though he knew that Mary, late queen of Scotland, had assumed the title of queen of England, he had formed the intention of espousing her without consulting his lawful sovereign, and had lent her a considerable sum of money, contrary to a promise given under his hand; that, when the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, and other rebels, had been driven into Scotland, he had afforded them pecuniary aid; that in the queen's thirteenth year, he had, by letters, solicited the pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Alva, to send over auxiliary forces for the rescue of Mary, and the re-establishment of Popery in England; and that he had assisted lord Herries, and other Scots who were enemies to Elizabeth. A jury of twenty-five peers unanimously passed sentence upon him on the 12th of January, 1572. The trial was quite regular, even according to the strict rules observed at present in these matters; except that the witnesses gave not their evidence in court, and were not confronted with the prisoner: a laudable practice, which was not at that time observed in trials for high treason.

Notwithstanding the enormity of the crime, the queen hesitated concerning Norfolk's being brought to the block. Twice she signed a warrant for his execution, and twice she revoked the fatal sentence; and though her ministers and counsellors pushed her to rigour, she still appeared irresolute and undetermined. After four months hesitation, a parliament was assembled on the 8th of May; and the commons addressed her, in strong terms, for the execution of the duke; a sanction which, when added to the greatness and certainty of his guilt, would, she thought, justify, in the eyes of all mankind, her severity against that nobleman. Norfolk's execution therefore took place on the 2nd of June. He died with calmness and constancy; and though he cleared himself of any disloyal intentions against the queen's authority, he acknowledged the justice of the sentence by which he suffered. That we may relate together affairs of a similar nature, we shall mention, that the earl of Northumberland, being delivered up to the queen by the regent of Scotland, was also, a few months after, brought to the scaffold for his rebellion.

The queen of Scots was doubtless the cause of all these disturbances; but as she was a sovereign princess, and might reasonably, from the harsh treatment which she had met with, think herself entitled to use any expedient for her relief, Elizabeth did not chuse, as yet, to form any resolution of proceeding to extremities against her. She only sent lord Delawar, sir Ralph Sadler, sir Thomas Bromley, and Dr. Wilson, to expostulate with her, and to demand satisfaction for all those parts of her conduct which, from the beginning of her life, had given displeasure to Elizabeth: her assuming the arms of England, refusing to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, intending to marry Norfolk without the queen's consent, concurring in the northern rebellion, practising with Ridolphi to engage the king of Spain in an invasion of England, procuring the pope's bull of excommunication, and allowing her friends abroad to give her the title of queen of England. Mary attempted to justify herself from the several articles of the charge, either by denying the facts imputed to her, or by throwing the blame on others.

But the queen was by no means satisfied with her apology; and the parliament was so enraged against her, that the commons made a direct application to "proceed against Mary in the highest degree of treason, and touch her as well in life, as in title and dignity." They employed some topics derived from practice and reason, and the laws of nations; but the chief stress was laid on passages and examples from the Old Testament. Matters were here carried farther than Elizabeth intended; and that princess satisfied with shewing Mary the disposition of the nation, sent to the house her express commands not to deal any farther at present in the affair of the Scottish queen. Nothing could be a stronger proof, that the puritanical interest prevailed in the house, than the intemperate use of authorities derived from scripture, especially from the Old Testament; and the queen was so little a lover of that sect, that she was not likely to make any concession merely in deference to their solicitation. She shewed, this session, her disapprobation of their schemes in another remarkable instance. The commons had passed two bills for regulating ecclesiastical ceremonies; but Elizabeth sent them a like imperious message with her former ones; and by the terror of her prerogative, she stopped all farther proceeding in those matters.

Although Elizabeth would not carry matters to such extremities against Mary, as were recommended by the parliament, she was alarmed at the great interest and the restless spirit of that princess, as well as at her close connection with the king of Spain; and she thought it necessary both to encrease the rigour and strictness of her confinement, and to follow maxims different from those which she

she had hitherto pursued in her management of Scotland. That kingdom remained still in a state of anarchy. The castle of Edinburgh, commanded by Kirkaldy of Grange, had declared for Mary; and the lords of that party, encouraged by his countenance, had taken possession of the capital, and carried on a vigorous war against the earl of Lenox, the regent. By a sudden and unexpected inroad, they seized that nobleman at Stirling; but finding that his friends, sallying from the castle, were likely to rescue him, they instantly put him to death. The earl of Marre was chosen regent in his room, as above mentioned; and found the same difficulties in the government of that divided country. He was therefore glad to accept of the mediation offered by the French and English ambassadors; and to conclude on equal terms a truce with the queen's party. He was a man of a free and generous spirit, and scorned to submit to any dependence on England; and for this reason Elizabeth, who had then formed intimate connections with France, yielded with less reluctance to the solicitations of that court, still maintained the appearance of neutrality between the parties, and allowed matters to remain on a balance in Scotland. But affairs soon after took a new turn: Marre died of melancholy, with which the distracted state of the country affected him: Morton was chosen regent; and as this nobleman had secretly taken all his measures with Elizabeth, who no longer relied on the friendship of the French court, she resolved to exert herself more effectually for the support of the party which she had always favoured. She sent sir Henry Killegrew ambassador to Scotland, who found Mary's partizans so discouraged by the discovery and punishment of Norfolk's conspiracy, that they were glad to submit to the king's authority, and accept of an indemnity for all past offences. The duke of Chatelrault and the earl of Huntley, with the most considerable of Mary's friends, laid down their arms on these conditions. The garrison alone of the castle of Edinburgh continued refractory. Kirkaldy's fortunes, by a concurrence of various circumstances were become desperate; and he flattered himself with the hopes of receiving assistance from the kings of France and Spain, who encouraged his obstinacy, in the view of being able, from that quarter, to give disturbance to England. Elizabeth was alarmed with the danger; she no more apprehended making an entire breach with the queen of Scots, who, she found, would not any longer be amused by her artifices; she had an implicit reliance on Morton; and she perceived, that, by the submission of all the considerable nobility, the pacification of Scotland would be an easy, as well as a most important undertaking. She ordered, therefore, sir William Drury, governor of Berwick, to march with some troops and artillery to Edinburgh, and to besiege the castle. The garrison surrendered at discretion: Kirkaldy was delivered into the hands of his countrymen, by whom he was tried, condemned, and executed: secretary Lidington, who had taken part with him, died soon after a voluntary death, as is supposed; and Scotland, submitting entirely to the regent, gave not, during a long time, any farther uneasiness to Elizabeth.

The affairs of France, however, were not so agreeable to the queen's interests and inclinations. The fallacious pacifications, which had been so often made with the Hugonots, gave them reason to suspect the present intensions of the court; and, after all the other leaders of that party were deceived into a dangerous credulity, the sagacious admiral still remained doubtful and uncertain. But his suspicions were at last overcome, partly by the profound dissimulation of Charles, partly by his own earnest desire to end the miseries of France, and return again to the performance of his duty towards his prince and country; and as Charles was young, was of a passionate, hasty temper, and addicted to pleasure, deep perfidy seemed either remote from his character, or almost impossible, to be uniformly supported by him. Moved by these considerations, the admiral, the queen of Navarre, and all the Hugonots, began to repose themselves in full security, and gave credit to the treacherous caresses and professions of the French court. Elizabeth herself, notwithstanding her penetration, entertained not the least distrust of Charles's sincerity; and being pleased to find her enemies of the house of Guise removed from all authority, and to observe an animosity every day growing between the French and Spanish monarchs, she concluded a defensive league with the former on the 11th of April, and regarded this alliance as an invincible barrier to her throne. So artfully did the French court deceive her ambassador Walsingham, that he sent her over, by every courier, the most satisfactory accounts of the honour, and plain-dealing, and fidelity of that perfidious prince.

The better to blind the jealous Hugonots, and draw their leaders into the snare prepared for them, Charles offered his sister, Margaret, in marriage to the prince of Navarre; and the admiral, with all the considerable nobility of his party, had come to Paris, in order to assist at the celebration of these nuptials, which, it was hoped, would finally, if not compose the differences, at least appease the sanguinary animosity of the two religions. The queen of Navarre was poisoned by orders from the court; the admiral was dangerously wounded by an assassin: yet Charles, redoubling his dissimulation, was still able to retain the Hugonots in their security; till, on the evening of St. Bartholomew, August 24, a few days after the marriage, the signal was given for a general massacre of those religionists, and the king himself in person, led the way to these assassinations (n).

Charles, in order to cover his barbarous perfidy towards the Hugonots, pretended that they had entered into a conspiracy to seize his person, which had been suddenly detected; and that he had been necessitated, for his own defence, to proceed to this severity against them. He sent orders to Fenelon, his ambassador in England, to ask an audience, and to give Elizabeth this account of the late transaction (o); and although he detested the transaction, he was obliged to obey his orders, and make use of the apology which had been prescribed to him. He met with that reception from all the courtiers, which, he knew, the conduct of his master had so well merited. Nothing could be more aweful and affecting than the solemnity of his audience. A melancholy sorrow sat on every face: silence, as in the dead of night, reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartments: the courtiers and ladies, clad in deep mourning, were ranged on each side, and allowed him to pass, without affording him one salute or favourable look; till he was admitted to the queen herself. That princess received him with a different countenance; she heard his apology, without discovering any visible symptom of indignation, and then told him, "that though, on the first rumour of this dreadful intelligence, she had been astonished that so many brave men and loyal subjects, who rested secure on the faith of their sovereign, should have been suddenly butchered in so barbarous a manner; she had hitherto suspended her judgement, till farther and more certain information should be brought her: that the account which he had given, even if founded on no mistake or bad information, though it might alleviate, would by no means remove the blame of the king's counsellors, or justify the strange irregularity of their proceedings: that the same force which, without resistance, had massacred so many defenceless men, could easily have secured their persons, and have reserved them for trial, and for punishment by a legal sentence, which would have distinguished the innocent from the guilty: that the admiral, in particular, being dangerously wounded, and environed by the guards of the king, on whose protection (n) The hatred long entertained by the Parisians against the Protestants, made them second, without any preparation, the fury of the court; and persons of every condition, age, and sex, suspected of any propensity to that religion, were involved in an undistinguished ruin. The admiral, his son-in-law Teligni, Soubize, Rochefoucault, Pardaillon, Piles, Lavardin, men who, during the late wars, had signalized themselves by the most heroic actions, were miserably butchered without resistance; the streets of Paris flowed with blood; and the people, more enraged than satiated with their cruelty, as if repining that death had saved the victims from farther insult, exercised on their dead bodies all the rage of the most licentious brutality. This scene of butchery was continued for seven days. About five hundred gentlemen and men of rank perished in this massacre, and near ten thousand of inferior condition. Orders were instantly dispatched to all the provinces for a like general execution of the Protestants; and in Rouen, Lyons, and many other cities, the people emulated the fury of the capital; and the number of murdered Hugonots, in the other parts of the kingdom, amounted to upwards of thirty thousand. Even the murder of the king of Navarre, and prince of Condè, had been proposed by the duke of Guise; but Charles, softened by the amiable manners of the king of Navarre, and hoping that these young princes might easily be converted to the Catholic faith, determined to spare their lives, though he obliged them to purchase their safety by a seeming change of their religion. As a farther proof of the zeal of the royal family for the extirpation of heresy, the queen mother, Catherine de Medicis, beheld from her windows the reiterated acts of butchery with detestable joy and exultation.

(o) That minister, a man of probity, adhorred the treachery and cruelty of his court; and even scrupled not to declare, that he was now ashamed to bear the name of Frenchman.

he seemed entirely to rely, had no means of escape, and might surely, before his death, have been convicted of the crimes imputed to him: that it was more worthy of a sovereign to reserve in his own hands the sword of justice, than to commit it to bloody murderers, who, being the declared and mortal enemies of the persons accused, employed it without mercy and without distinction: that if these sentiments were just, even supposing the conspiracy of the Protestants to be real, how much more so, if that crime was a calumny of their enemies, invented for their destruction? That if, upon inquiry, the innocence of these unhappy victims should afterwards appear, it was the king's duty to turn his vengeance on their defamers, who had thus cruelly abused his confidence, had murdered so many of his brave subjects, and had done what in them lay to cover him with everlasting dishonour: and that, for her part, she should form her judgement of his intentions by his subsequent conduct; and in the mean time should act as desired by the ambassador, and rather pity than blame his master for the extremities to which he had been carried."

Elizabeth was now fully sensible of the dangerous situation in which she stood. In the massacre of Paris, she saw the result of that general conspiracy, formed for the extermination of those who professed the Protestant religion; and she knew that she herself, as the head and protectress of the Protestants, was exposed to the utmost fury and resentment of the bigotted Catholics. The violence and cruelty of the Spaniards in the Low Countries was another branch of the same conspiracy; and as Charles and Philip, two princes nearly allied in perfidy and barbarity as well as in bigotry, had now laid aside their pretended quarrel, and had avowed the most entire friendship, she had reason, as soon as they had appeased their domestic commotions, to dread the effects of their united counsels. The duke of Guise also, and his family, whom Charles, in order to deceive the admiral, had hitherto kept at a distance, had now acquired an open and complete ascendant in the court of France; and she was sensible that these princes, from personal as well as political reasons, were her declared and inveterate enemies. The queen of Scots, their near relation and close confederate, was the pretender to her throne; and though detained in custody, was actuated by a restless spirit, and, besides her foreign allies, possessed numerous and zealous partizans in the heart of the kingdom. For these reasons, Elizabeth did not chuse to reject all commerce with the French monarch, but still thought it necessary to listen to the professions of friendship which he made her. She allowed even the negociations to be renewed for her marriage with the duke of Alençon, Charles's third brother: those with Henry duke of Anjou had already been broken off. She sent the earl of Worcester to assist in her name at the baptism of a young princess, born to Charles; but before she agreed to give him this last mark of condescension, she thought it becoming her dignity, to renew her expressions of blame, and even of detestation, against the cruelties exercised on his Protestant subjects. Elizabeth, in the mean time, expecting some premeditated blow to be attempted against her, prepared for that attack which there was reason to apprehend from the combined power and violence of the Romanists: she fortified Portsmouth, put her fleet in order, exercised her militia, cultivated popularity with her subjects, acted with vigour for the farther reduction of Scotland under obedience to the young king, and renewed her alliance with the German princes, who were no less alarmed than herself at these treacherous and sanguinary measures, so universally embraced by the bigotted partizans of the church of Rome.

Although Elizabeth cautiously avoided coming to extremities with Charles, the greatest security that she possessed against his violence was derived from the difficulties which the obstinate resistance of the Hugonots still created to him. Such of that sect as lived near the frontiers, immediately, on the first news of the massacres, fled into England, Germany, or Switzerland; where they excited the compassion and indignation of the Protestants, and prepared themselves, with encreased forces and redoubled zeal, to return into France, and avenge the treacherous slaughter of their brethren. Those who lived in the middle of the kingdom, took shelter in the nearest garrisons occupied by the Hugonots; and finding, that they could repose no faith in capitulations, and expect no clemency, were determined to defend themselves to the last extremity. The sect, which Charles had hoped at one blow to exterminate, had now an army of eighteen thousand men on foot, and possessed, in 1573, in different parts of the kingdom, above a hundred cities, castles, or fortresses; nor could that prince deem himself secure from the invasion threatened him by all the other Protestants in Europe. The nobility and gentry of England were roused to such a pitch of resentment, that they offered to levy an army of twenty-two thousand foot and four thousand horse, to transport them into France, and to maintain them six months at their own charge: but Elizabeth, who acted with extreme caution, and who feared to inflame farther the quarrel between the two religions by these dangerous crusades, refused her consent, and moderated the zeal of her subjects. The German princes, less political or more secure from the resentment of France, forwarded the levies made by the Protestants; and the young prince of Condé, having escaped from court, put himself at the head of these forces, and prepared to invade the kingdom. The duke of Alençon, the king of Navarre, the family of Montmorenci, and many considerable men even among the Catholics, displeased, either on a private or public account, with the rigorous and base measures of the court, favoured the progress of the Hugonots; and every thing relapsed into confusion. The king, instead of repenting his violent counsels, which had brought matters to such extremities, called aloud for new violences; nor could even the mortal distemper under which he laboured, moderate the rage and animosity by which he was actuated. He died without male issue, on the 30th of May, 1574, at the age of twenty-five years (p).

Henry, duke of Anjou, who had, some time before, been elected king of Poland, no sooner heard of his brother's death, than he hastened to take possession of the throne of France: and found the kingdom not only involved in the greatest present disorders, but exposed to infirmities, for which it was extremely difficult to provide any suitable remedy. The people were divided into two theological factions, furious from their zeal, and mutually enraged from the injuries which they had committed or suffered; and as all faith had been violated and moderation banished, it seemed impracticable to find any terms of composition between them. Each party had devoted itself to leaders, whose commands had more authority than the will of the sovereign; and even the Catholics, to whom the king was attached, were entirely conducted by the counsels of Guise, and his family.

Henry, observing the low condition of the crown, had laid a scheme for restoring his own authority, by acting as umpire between the parties, by moderating their differences, and by reducing both to a dependence upon himself; but instead of acquiring a superiority over each faction, he lost the confidence of both, and taught the partizans of each to adhere still more closely to their particular leaders, whom they found more cordial and sincere in the cause which they espoused. The Hugonots were strengthened, in 1576, by the accession of a German army under the prince of Condé, and prince Casimir; but much more by the credit and personal virtues of the king of Navarre, who, having fled from court, had placed himself at the head of that formidable party. Henry, in prosecution of his plan, entered into a composition with them; and being desirous of preserving a balance between the sects, he granted them peace on the most advantageous conditions (q).

On account of this peace, the artful duke of Guise, took an occasion of reducing his party into a more regular body; and laid the first foundations of the famous LEAGUE, which, without paying any regard to the royal authority, aimed at the entire suppression of the Hugonots; and Henry, in order to divert the force of the league from himself, and even to elude its efforts against the Hugonots, declared himself the head of that confederacy, and took the field as leader of the Romanists, in 1577. But his dilatory and feeble measures betrayed his reluctance to the undertaking; and after some unsuccessful attempts, he concluded a new peace, which, though less favourable than the former to the Protestants, gave no contentment to the Catholics. Mutual diffidence still prevailed between the parties; the king's moderation was suspicious to both; each faction continued to fortify itself against that breach, which, they foresaw, must speedily ensue; theological controversy daily whetted the animosity of the sects; and every private injury became the ground of a public quarrel.

(p) He was a prince, whose character, containing that unusual mixture of dissimulation and ferocity, of quick resentment and unrelenting vengeance, executed the greatest mischiefs, and threatened still worse, both to his native country and to all the states of Europe.

(q) This was the fifth general peace made with the Hugonots; but though it was no more sincere on the part of the court than any of the former, it gave the highest disgust to the Catholics; and afforded the duke of Guise the desired pretence of declaiming against the measures and maxims, and conduct of the king.

The king, hoping by his artifice and subtlety, to allure the nation into a love of pleasure and repose, was himself caught in the snare; and, sinking into a dissolute indolence, wholly lost the esteem and the affections of his people, in 1578. The public burdens, encreased by his profuse liberality, and felt more heavy on a disordered kingdom, became a strong ground of complaint; and the uncontrolled animosity of parties, joined to the multiplicity of taxes, rendered peace more calamitous than any open state of foreign or even domestic warfare. The artifices of the king were too refined to succeed, and too frequent to be concealed; for, in 1579, the plain, direct, and avowed conduct of the duke of Guise on one side, and that of the king of Navarre on the other, drew by degrees the generality of the nation to devote themselves without reserve to one or the other of those great leaders.

The civil commotions of France were of too general importance to be overlooked by the other potentates of Europe; and Elizabeth's foresight and vigilance led her to take secretly some part in them. Besides employing on all occasions her good offices in favour of the Hugonots, she had expended no inconsiderable sums in levying that army of Germans which the prince of Condé and prince Casimir conducted into France; and notwithstanding her negociations with the court, and her professions of amity, she always considered her own interests as connected with the prosperity of the French Protestants and the depression of the house of Guise. Philip, on the other hand, had declared himself protector of the league; had entered into the closest correspondence with the duke of Guise; and had employed all his authority in supporting the credit of that sanguinary leader.

Similar political views to those which engaged Elizabeth to support the Hugonots, would have led her to assist the distressed Protestants in the Low Countries; but the mighty power of Philip, the tranquillity of his other dominions, and the great force which he maintained in these mutinous provinces, kept her in awe, and obliged her, notwithstanding the temptations and provocations which she received, to preserve some terms of amity with that monarch. The Spanish ambassador represented to her, that many of the Flemish exiles, who infested the seas, and preyed on his master's subjects, were received into the harbours of England, and were there allowed to dispose of their prizes. By these remonstrances the queen found herself under a necessity of denying them all entrance into her dominions: but this measure proved in the issue extremely prejudicial to the interests of Philip. These desperate exiles, finding no longer any possibility of subsistence, were forced to attempt the most perilous enterprizes; and they made an assault on the Brille, a sea-port town in Holland, where they met with success, and, after a short resistance, became masters of the place. The duke of Alva was alarmed at the danger; and, stopping those bloody executions which he was making on the defenceless Flemings, he hastened with his army to extinguish the flame, which, falling on materials so well prepared for combustion, seemed to menace a general conflagration. His fears soon appeared to be well grounded; for the people in the neighbourhood of the Brille, enraged by that complication of cruelty, oppression, insolence, usurpation, and persecution, under which they and all their countrymen groaned, flew to arms; and in a few days almost the whole province of Holland and that of Zealand had revolted from the Spaniards, and had openly declared against the tyranny of the duke of Alva.

William, prince of Orange, descended from a sovereign family of great lustre and antiquity in Germany, inheriting the possessions of a sovereign family in France, had fixed his residence in the Low Countries; and was universally regarded as the greatest subject that lived in those provinces. He had opposed the progress of the Spanish usurpations; and when Alva conducted his army into the Netherlands, and assumed the government, this prince, wisely fled from the danger which threatened him, and retired to his paternal estate and dominions in Germany. He was cited to appear before Alva's tribunal, was condemned in absence, was declared a rebel, and his ample possessions in the Low Countries were confiscated. In revenge, he had levied an army of Protestants in the empire, and had made some attempts to restore the Flemings to liberty; but was still repulsed with loss by the vigilance and military conduct of Alva, and by the great bravery, as well as discipline, of those veteran Spaniards who served under that intrepid warrior.

The revolt of Holland and Zealand, provinces which the prince of Orange had formerly commanded, and where he was much beloved, called him afresh from his retreat; and he added conduct, no less than spirit, to that obstinate resistance which was here made to the Spanish dominion. By uniting the revolted cities in a league, he laid the foundation of that illustrious commonwealth, whose arms and policy afterwards, till it was united with the French empire under Bonaparte, made so signal a figure in every transaction of Europe. He inflamed the inhabitants by every motive which religious zeal, resentment, or love of freedom could inspire. From this spirit proceeded the desperate defence of Harlem; a defence which nothing but the most consuming famine could overcome, and which the Spaniards revenged by the execution of more than two thousand of the inhabitants. This extreme severity, instead of striking the Hollanders with terror, animated them by despair; and the vigorous resistance made at Alcmaer, where Alva was finally repulsed, showed them that their insolent enemies were not invincible. The duke, finding at last the pernicious effects of his violent councils, solicited to be recalled: Medina-celi, who was appointed his successor, refused to accept the government: Zuniga de Requesens, commendator of Castile, was sent from Italy to replace Alva; and this tyrant departed from the Netherlands in 1574; leaving his name in execration to the inhabitants, and boasting in his turn, that, during the course of five years, he had delivered above eighteen thousand of these rebellious heretics into the hands of the executioner.

In the siege of Leyden, undertaken by the Spaniards, the Dutch opened the dykes and sluices, in order to drive them from the enterprize; and the very peasants were active in ruining their fields by an inundation, rather than fall again under the tyranny of the Spanish court. But notwithstanding this repulse, Requesens still pursued the war; and the contest seemed too unequal between so mighty a monarchy, and two small provinces, however fortified by nature, and however defended by the desperate resolution of the inhabitants. The prince of Orange, therefore, in 1575, sued for foreign succour, and made applications to Elizabeth, who seemed naturally interested in their defence; and as she had justly entertained great jealousy of Philip, and governed her kingdom in perfect tranquillity, hopes were entertained, that her policy, her ambition, or her generosity, would engage her to support them under their present calamities. They sent therefore a solemn embassy to London, consisting of St. Aldegonde, Douza, Nivelle, Buys, and Melsen; and after employing the most humble supplications to the queen, they offered her the possession and sovereignty of their provinces, if she would exert her power in their defence. Elizabeth, however, did not seem willing to take the government of those provinces into her hands; and told the ambassadors that she would endeavour to mediate an agreement for them, on the most reasonable terms that could be obtained. She sent accordingly sir Henry Cobham to Philip; and represented to him the danger which he would incur of losing entirely the Low Countries, if France could obtain the least interval from her intestine disorders, and find leisure to offer her protection to those mutinous and discontented provinces. Philip seemed to take this remonstrance in good part; but no accord ensued, and war in the Netherlands continued with its former violence and rage.

It was an accident that delivered the Hollanders from their present desperate situation. Requesens, the governor, dying suddenly, the Spanish troops, discontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper authority to command them, broke into a furious mutiny, and threw every thing into confusion. They sacked and pillaged the cities of Maestricht and Antwerp, and executed great slaughter on the inhabitants: they threatened the other cities with a like fate: and all the provinces, excepting Luxembourg, united for mutual defence against their violence, and called in the prince of Orange and the Hollanders, Hollanders, as their protectors. A treaty, commonly called the Pacification of Ghent, was formed by common agreement; and the removal of foreign troops, with the restoration of their ancient liberties, was the object which the provinces mutually stipulated to pursue. Don John of Austria, natural brother to Philip, being appointed governor, found, on his arrival at Luxembourg, that the States had so fortified themselves, and that the Spanish troops were so divided by their situation, that there was no possibility of resistance; and he agreed to the terms required of him. The Spaniards evacuated the country; and these provinces seemed at last to breathe a little from their calamities.

But it was not easy to settle entire peace, while the thirst of revenge and dominion governed the king of Spain, and while the Flemings were so strongly agitated with resentment of past, and fear of future, injuries. The ambition of Don John, a natural son of Charles V. (commonly called Don John of Austria,) engaged him to inflame the quarrel; and as he found the States determined to impose very strict limitations on his authority, he broke all articles, seized Namur, and procured the recal of the Spanish army from Italy. Don John looked beyond the conquest of the revolted provinces, had intended to espouse the queen of Scots, and to acquire in her right the dominion of the British kingdoms. Elizabeth seeing now, from the union of all the provinces, a fair prospect of their making a vigorous defence against Spain, no longer scrupled to embrace the protection of their liberties, which seemed so intimately connected with her own safety. After sending them a sum of money, about twenty thousand pounds, for the immediate pay of their troops, she concluded a treaty with them; in which she stipulated to assist them with five thousand foot and a thousand horse, at the charge of the Flemings; and to lend them a hundred thousand pounds, on receiving the bonds of some of the most considerable towns of the Netherlands, for her repayment within the year. It was farther agreed, that the commander of the English army should be admitted into the council of the States; and nothing be determined concerning war or peace, without previously informing the queen or him of it; that they should enter into no league without her consent; that if any discord arose among themselves, it should be referred to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretext, should attempt hostilities against her, they should send to her assistance an army equal to that which she had employed in their defence. This alliance was signed on the 7th of January, 1578.

The queen represented to the king of Spain, by her ambassador, Thomas Wilkes, that hitherto she had religiously acted the part of a good neighbour and ally; had refused the sovereignty of Holland and Zealand, when offered her; had advised the prince of Orange to submit to the king; and had even accompanied her counsel with menaces, in case of his refusal. She persevered, she said, in the same friendly intentions; and, as a proof of it, would venture to interpose with her advice for the composure of the present differences: let Don John be recalled; let some other prince more popular be substituted in his room; let the Spanish armies be withdrawn; let the Flemings be restored to their ancient liberties and privileges: and if, after these concessions, they were still obstinate not to return to their duty, she promised to join her arms with those of his Catholic majesty, and force them to compliance. Philip dissembled his resentment against the queen; and still continued to supply Don John with money and troops. That prince, though once repulsed at Rimenant by the valour of the English under Norris, and though opposed, as well by the army of the States as by prince Casimir, who had conducted to the Low Countries a great body of Germans, paid by the queen, gained a great advantage over the Flemings at Gembloux; but was cut off in the midst of his prosperity by poison, given him secretly, as was suspected, by orders from Philip, who dreaded his ambition. The prince of Parma succeeded to the command; who, uniting valour and clemency, negociation and military exploits, made great progress against the revolted Flemings, and advanced the progress of the Spaniards by his arts, as well as by his arms.

During these years, while Europe was almost every where in agitation, England enjoyed a profound tranquillity; owing chiefly to the prudence and vigour of the queen's administration, and to the wise precautions which she employed in all her measures. By supporting the Protestants in Scotland, she had twice given them the superiority over their antagonists, had closely connected their interests with her own, and had procured herself entire security from that quarter, whence the most dangerous invasions could be made upon her. She saw in France her enemies, the Guises, counterbalanced by the Hugonots, her zealous partizans. The bigotry of Philip gave her just ground of anxiety; but the same bigotry had happily excited the most obstinate opposition among his own subjects, and had created him enemies, whom his arms and policy seemed unable to subdue. The queen of Scots, her antagonist and rival, and the pretender to her throne, was a prisoner in her hands; and by her impatience and high spirit had been engaged in practices, which afforded the queen a pretence for rendering her confinement more rigorous, and for cutting off her communication with her partizans in England.

Religion was the capital point, on which depended all the political transactions of that age; and the queen's conduct in this particular, making allowance for the prevailing prejudices of the times, could scarcely be accused of severity or imprudence. She established no inquisition into men's bosoms: she imposed no oath of supremacy, except on those who received trust or emolument from the public: and though the exercise of every religion but the established was prohibited by statute, the violation of this law, by saying mass, and receiving the sacrament in private houses, was, in many instances, connived at; while, on the other hand, the Catholics, in the beginning of her reign, shewed little reluctance against going to church, or frequenting the ordinary duties of public worship. The pope, sensible that this practice would by degrees reconcile all his partizans to the reformed religion, hastened the publication of the bull, which excommunicated the queen, and freed her subjects from their oaths of allegiance; but the Romanists, if their condition were compared with that of the Nonconformists in other countries, and with their own maxims where they domineered, could not justly complain of violence or persecution. The queen appeared rather more anxious to keep a strict hand over the Puritans; who, though their pretensions were not so dangerous to her authority, seemed to be actuated by a different motive, and to retain claims, of which, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, it was, as yet, difficult to discern the full scope and intention. Some secret attempts of that sect to establish a separate congregation and discipline had been carefully repressed in the beginning of this reign; and when any of the established clergy discovered a tendency to their principles, by omitting the legal habits or ceremonies, the queen had shewn a determined resolution to punish them by fines and deprivation; though her orders to that purpose had been frequently eluded, by the secret protection which they received from some of her most considerable courtiers.

That which chiefly tended to gain Elizabeth the good will of her subjects, was her frugality, which led her not to amass treasures, but only to prevent impositions upon her people. By means of her rigid œconomy, she paid all the debts which she found on the crown, with their full interest; though some of them had been contracted even during the reign of her father. Some loans, which she had exacted at the commencement of her reign, she punctually repaid; a practice somewhat unusual in that age: and she established her credit on so firm a footing, that no sovereign in Europe could more readily command any sum, which the public exigencies might at any time require. During this tranquil government, England furnishes few materials for history; and except the small part which Elizabeth took in foreign transactions, there scarcely passed any occurrence which requires a particular detail.

The most memorable event at this period was a session of parliament, held on the 8th of February, 1576; where debates were started, which may appear somewhat curious and singular. Peter Wentworth, member for Iregony in Cornwall, a Puritan, who had signalized himself in former parliaments by his free and undaunted spirit, opened this session with an harangue, which drew on him the indignation of the house, and gave great offence to the queen and the ministers (r).

The

(r) As Mr. Wentworth's speech seems to contain a rude sketch of those principles of liberty which gained afterwards the ascendant in England, it may not be improper to give, in a few words, the substance of it. He premised, "that the very name of liberty is sweet; but the thing

The commons expressed great displeasure at the unusual liberty taken by this speaker: they sequestered Wentworth from the house, and committed him prisoner to the serjeant at arms. They even ordered him to be examined by a committee, consisting of all those members who were also members of the privy-council; and a report to be next day made to the house. This committee met in the star-chamber, and, wearing the aspect of that arbitrary court, summoned Wentworth to appear before them and answer for his conduct. But though the commons had discovered so little delicacy or precaution, in thus confounding their own authority with that of the star-chamber; Wentworth better understood the principles of liberty, and refused to give them any account of his conduct in parliament, till he were satisfied that they acted, not as members of the privy-council, but as a committee of the house. He justified his liberty of speech, by pleading the rigour and hardship of the queen's messages; and, notwithstanding that the committee shewed him, by instances in other reigns, that the practice of sending such messages was not unprecedented, he would not agree to express any sorrow or repentance. The issue of the affair was, that, after a month's confinement, the queen sent to the commons, informing them, that, from her special grace and favour, she had restored him to his liberty, and to his place in the house. By this seeming lenity, she indirectly retained the power which she had assumed, of imprisoning the members, and obliging them to answer before her for their conduct in parliament. And sir Walter Mildmay endeavoured to make the house sensible of her majesty's goodness, in so gently remitting the indignation which she might justly conceive at the temerity of their member: but he informed them, that they had not the liberty of speaking what and of whom they pleased; and that indiscreet freedoms used in that house had, both in the present and foregoing ages, met with a proper chastisement. He warned them, therefore, not to abuse farther the queen's clemency; lest she be constrained, contrary to her inclination, to turn an unsuccessful lenity into a necessary severity.

The behaviour of the two houses was, in every other respect, equally tame and submissive. The commons granted the queen an aid of one subsidy and two fifteenths.

Although Elizabeth enjoyed during the whole of her reign a great share of security, yet she never relaxed in her vigilance and attention; but, in 1580, the scene began to be more overcast, and dangers gradually multiplied on her from several quarters.

The earl of Morton had hitherto retained Scotland in strict alliance with the queen, and had also restored domestic tranquillity to that kingdom: but the restless nobility began afresh to break into factions: the people were disgusted with some instances of Morton's avarice; and the clergy, who complained of farther encroachments on their narrow revenue, joined and encreased the discontent of the other orders. The regent was sensible of his dangerous situation; and, having dropped some peevish expressions, as if he were willing or desirous to resign, the noblemen of the opposite party, favourites of the young king, laid hold of this concession, and required that demission which he seemed so frankly to offer them. James was at this time but eleven years of age; yet Morton, having secured himself, as he imagined, by a general pardon, resigned his authority into the hands of the king, who pretended to conduct, in his own name, the administration of the kingdom. The regent retired from the government; and seemed to employ himself in the care of his domestic affairs; but, either tired with this tranquillity, or thinking it time to throw off dissimulation, he came again to court; acquired an ascendant in the council; and though he resumed not the title of regent, governed with the same authority as before. The opposite party, after holding separate conventions, took to arms, on pretence of delivering their prince from captivity, and restoring him to the free exercise of his government. It could not be imagined that queen Elizabeth would remain at rest during these transactions: she therefore interposed by her ambassador, sir Robert Bowes, and mediated an agreement between the factious parties: Morton kept possession of the government; but his enemies were numerous and vigilant, and his authority seemed to become every day more unstable.

The count d'Aubigney, of the house of Lenox, cousin-german to the king's father, had been born and educated in France; and he appeared to the duke of Guise a proper instrument for detaching James from the English interest, and connecting him with his mother and her relations. He appeared at Stirling in 1580, where James resided, and acquired the affections of the young monarch. Joining his interests with those of James Stuart of the house of Ochiltree, a man of profligate manners, who had acquired the king's favour, he employed himself in instilling into the tender mind of the prince new sentiments of politics and government. He represented to him the injustice which had been done to Mary in her deposition, and made him entertain thoughts either of resigning the crown into her hands, or of associating her with him in the administration. Elizabeth, alarmed at the danger which might ensue from the prevalence of this interest in Scotland, sent sir Robert Bowes again to Stirling; and accusing d'Aubigney, now created earl of Lenox, of an attachment to the French, warned James against entertaining such suspicious and dangerous connexions. The king excused himself, by sir Alexander Hume his ambassador; and Lenox, finding that the queen had openly declared against him, was farther confirmed in his intention of overturning the English interest, and particularly of ruining Morton, who was regarded as the head of it. That nobleman was arrested in council, accused as an accomplice in the late king's murder, committed to prison, brought to trial, and condemned to suffer as a traitor (s). Sir Thomas Randolph was sent by the queen to intercede in favour of Morton; and that ambassador, not content with discharging this duty of his function, engaged, by his persuasion, the earls of Argyle, Montrose, Angus, Marre, and Glencairne, to enter into a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the prisoner. The more to overawe that nobleman's enemies, Elizabeth ordered forces to be assembled on the borders of England; but this expedient served only to hasten his sentence and execution, which happened on the 2nd of June, 1581.

In order to be revenged on Elizabeth for assisting his rebels in the Low Countries, the king of Spain sent, under the name of the pope, a body of seven hundred Spaniards.

thing itself is precious beyond the most inestimable treasure: and that it behoved them to be careful, lest, contenting themselves with the sweetness of the name, they forego the substance, and abandon what of all earthly possessions was of the highest value to the kingdom. He observed, that freedom of speech in that house, a privilege so useful both to sovereign and subject, had been formerly infringed in many essential articles, and was at present exposed to the most imminent danger: that it was usual, when any subject of importance was handled, especially if it regarded religion, to surmize, that these topics were disagreeable to the queen, and that the farther proceeding in them would draw down her indignation upon their temerity: that Solomon had justly affirmed the king's displeasure to be a messenger of death; and it was no wonder if men, even though urged by motives of conscience and duty, should be inclined to stop short, when they found themselves exposed to so severe a penalty: that, by the employing of this argument, the house was incapacitated from serving their country, and even from serving the queen herself; whose ears, besieged by pernicious flatterers, were thereby rendered inaccessible to the most salutary truths: that it was a mockery to call an assembly a parliament, yet deny it that privilege, which was so essential to its being, and without which it must degenerate into an abject school of servility and dissimulation: that, as the parliament was the great guardian of the laws, they ought to have liberty to discharge their trust, and to maintain that authority whence even kings themselves derive their being: that a king was constituted such by law, and though he was not dependent on man, yet was he subordinate to God and the law, and was obliged to make their prescriptions, not his own will, the rule of his conduct: that even his commission, as God's vicegerent, enforced this obligation; since he was thereby invested with authority to execute on earth the will of God, which is nothing but law and justice: that though these surmizes of displeasing the queen by their proceedings, had impeached, in a very essential point, all freedom of speech, a privilege granted them by a special law; yet was there a more express and more dangerous invasion made on their liberties, by frequent messages from the throne: that it had become a practice, when the house was entering on any question, either ecclesiastical or civil, to bring an order from the queen, inhibiting them absolutely from treating of such matters, and debaring them from all farther discussion of these momentous articles: that the prelates, emboldened by her royal protection, had assumed a decisive power in all questions of religion, and required that every one should implicity submit his faith to their arbitrary determinations: that the love which he bore his sovereign, forbade him to be silent under such abuses, or to sacrifice, on this important occasion, his duty to servile flattery and complaisance: and that as no earthly creature was exempt from fault, so neither was the queen herself; but, in imposing this servitude on her faithful commons, had committed a great, and even dangerous, fault against herself and the whole commonwealth." D'Ewes, p. 236, 237, &c.

(s) On his trial, he confessed that Bothwel had communicated to him the design, had pleaded Mary's consent, and had desired his concurrence; but he denied that he himself had ever expressed any approbation of the crime; and, in excuse for his concealing it, he alleged the danger of revealing the secret, either to Henry, who had neither resolution nor constancy, or to Mary, who appeared to be an accomplice in the murder.

Spaniards and Italians into Ireland; where the inhabitants, always turbulent, and discontented with the English government, were now more alienated by religious prejudices, and were ready to join every invader.

Henry the Second had acquired the reputation of being the conqueror of Ireland; but the reduction of that island was incomplete till the reign of Elizabeth. Many of the native chieftains long refused that full submission which the English princes wished to obtain; and the impolitic distinction made by the latter between the new colonists and the ancient possessors of the country, increased that animosity which naturally arose in the minds of an irritable people from the hostile aggression of their neighbours. The turbulent spirit of the Irish, thus stimulated, had produced frequent revolts, which, however, the English governors, by activity and vigour, had constantly suppressed. Henry the Eighth, by conferring titles of honour on some of their chiefs, by erecting the lordship of Ireland into a kingdom, and by establishing some prudent regulations, had left that island in a state of tranquillity at his death. In the reigns of his successors Edward the Sixth and Mary, that tranquillity was little disturbed; but after the accession of Elizabeth, whose title was disputed by the partizans of the court of Rome, fresh commotions arose.

The posterity of the old Irish were, for the most part, so attached to the Catholic doctrines, that they refused to adopt the tenets of the Reformers, which the descendants of the English colonists readily embraced. As the bigotry of the former produced a disaffection to a Protestant queen, the king of Spain, and other enemies of Elizabeth, endeavoured to inflame them into rebellion; and the British friends of the queen of Scots carried on intrigues with the same view. Petty insurrections broke out, and were soon crushed; but, when Fitz-Maurice, an enterprizing Hibernian Papist, landed in the district of Kerry with a body of Spaniards, and commenced the erection of a fort, the English were alarmed with the prospect of a more formidable revolt. He expected to be joined by his kinsman the earl of Desmond; but this nobleman was unwilling to enter prematurely into the dangerous projects of rebellion. The vessels which had brought the invaders were captured by the English; and sir John Perrot was sent with a squadron to guard the coast, and prevent the future debarkation of foreign troops. Fitz-Maurice being slain in a skirmish, one of the brothers of the earl of Desmond assumed the command; and two companies of English soldiers were quickly intercepted and put to the sword by the new leader. Though the Spaniards had been joined by many of the natives, the exertions of the government prevented the revolt from becoming general; and sir William Drury, the lord deputy, marched against the enemy with the hopes of gaining a decisive advantage: but an indisposition which soon after put an end to his life, obliged him to resign the conduct of the expedition to the president of Connaught, who had the good fortune to defeat the insurgents. Notwithstanding this check, Desmond was encouraged by the illness of the lord deputy, and by the prospect of a powerful concurrence against the English, that he thought proper to sue for pardon, which, however, he did not obtain. Many of the Spaniards had fallen into the hands of the English, by whom they had been put to death: but Philip sent a fresh supply of Catholic warriors, in 1580, amounting to seven hundred men, as above mentioned, who landed in Ireland without opposition, and fortified themselves on the coast of Kerry. Here they were besieged by lord Grey, the new deputy, who, after having baffled their numerous sallies, compelled them to surrender at discretion on the fifth day of the siege. The English forces being few in number, it was deemed expedient for their safety to put all the foreigners to the sword, except the officers, and to hang the Irish prisoners as rebels. These vigorous, though inhuman, proceedings intimidated the remaining revolters into submission; and peace was restored throughout the province of Munster. An insurrection afterwards broke out in Leinster, which was speedily suppressed; and a conspiracy was formed against the life of the lord deputy, the execution of which was prevented by a seasonable discovery.

When the English ambassador made complaints of this invasion, he was answered by like complaints of the piracies committed by Francis Drake, a bold seaman, who had assaulted the Spaniards in the place where they deemed themselves most secure, in the New World. This man, sprung from mean parents in the county of Devon, having acquired considerable riches by depredations made in the isthmus of Panama, and having there gotten a sight of the Pacific Ocean, was so stimulated by ambition and avarice, that he scrupled not to employ his whole fortune in a new adventure through those seas, so much unknown at that time to all the European nations. By means of sir Christopher Hatton, then vice-chamberlain, a great favourite of Elizabeth, he obtained her consent and approbation; and he set sail from Plymouth in December, 1577, with four ships and a pinnace, on board of which were one hundred and sixty-four able sailors. He passed into the South Sea by the Straits of Magelhaens, and attacking the Spaniards, who expected no enemy in those quarters, he took many rich prizes, and prepared to return with the booty which he had acquired. Apprehensive of being intercepted by the enemy, if he took the same way homewards, by which he had reached the Pacific Ocean, he attempted to find a passage by the north of California; and failing in that enterprize, he set sail for the East Indies, and returned safely, by the Cape of Good Hope, to Plymouth, on the 3rd of November, 1580 (t).

When Philip's ambassador, Mendoza, exclaimed against Drake's piracies, she told him, that the Spaniards, by arrogating a right to the whole New World, and excluding thence all other European nations, who should sail thither, even with a view of exercising the most lawful commerce, naturally tempted others to make a violent irruption into those countries. To pacify, however, the Catholic monarch, she caused part of the booty to be restored to Pedro Sebura, a Spaniard, who pretended to be agent for the merchants whom Drake had spoiled. Having learned afterwards, that Philip had seized the money, and had employed part of it against herself in Ireland, part of it in the pay of the prince of Parma's troops, she determined to make no more restitutions.

On the 16th of January, 1581, a parliament was assembled, which, besides granting her a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths, enacted some statutes for the security of her government, chiefly against the attempts of the Catholics. Whoever, in any way, attempted to convert any one to the church of Rome, or was himself reconciled to that church, was declared to be guilty of treason; to say mass was subjected to the penalty of a year's imprisonment, and a fine of two hundred marks; the being present was punishable by a year's imprisonment and a fine of one hundred marks: a fine of twenty pounds a month was imposed on every one who continued, during that time, absent from church (u). To utter slanderous or seditious

(t) Sir Francis Drake was the first Englishman who sailed round the globe; and the first commander in chief: for Magelhaens, whose ship executed the same adventure, died in his passage. His name became celebrated on account of so bold and fortunate an attempt; but many, apprehending the resentment of the Spaniards, endeavoured to persuade the queen, that it would be more prudent to disavow the enterprize, to punish Drake, and to restore the treasure. But Elizabeth, who admired valour, and was allured by the prospect of sharing in the booty, determined to countenance that gallant sailor: she conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and accepted of a banquet from him at Deptford, on board the ship which had atchieved so memorable a voyage.

(u) The queen and parliament were engaged to pass these severe laws against the Catholics, by some late discoveries of the treasonable practices of their priests. When the ancient worship was suppressed, and the reformation introduced into the universities, the king of Spain reflected, that, as some species of literature was necessary for supporting these doctrines and controversies, the Romish communion must decay in England, if no means were found to give erudition to the ecclesiastics; and for this reason, he founded a seminary at Douay, where the Catholics sent their children, chiefly such as were intended for the priesthood, in order to receive the rudiments of their education. The cardinal of Lorraine imitated this example, by erecting a like seminary in his diocese of Rheims; and though Rome was somewhat distant, the pope would not neglect to adorn, by a foundation of the same nature, that capital of orthodoxy. These seminaries, founded with so hostile an intention, sent over every year a colony of priests, who maintained the Catholic superstition in its full height of bigotry; and being educated with a view to the crown of martyrdom, were not deterred, either by danger or fatigue, from maintaining and propagating their principles. They infused into all their votaries an extreme hatred against the queen; whom they treated as an usurper, a schismatic, a heretic, a persecutor of the orthodox, and one solemnly and publicly anathematised by the holy father. Sedition, rebellion, sometimes assassination, were the expedients by which they intended to effect their purposes against her; and the severe restraint, not to say persecution, under which the Catholics laboured, made them the more willingly receive, from their ghostly fathers such violent doctrines.

These seminaries were all of them under the direction of the Jesuits, a new order of regular priests erected in Europe, when the court of Rome perceived, that the lazy monks and beggarly friars, who sufficed in seditious words against the queen was punishable, for the first offence, with the pillory and loss of ears; the second offence was declared felony: the writing or printing of such words was felony even on the first offence. This session the Puritans prevailed so far as to have farther applications made for reformation in religion. And Paul Wentworth, brother to the member of that name who had distinguished himself in the preceding session, moved, That the commons, from their own authority, should appoint a general fast and prayers: a motion, to which the house unwarily assented. For this presumption, they were severely reprimanded by a message from the queen, as encroaching on the royal prerogative and supremacy; and they were obliged to submit, and ask pardon.

The duke of Alençon, now created duke of Anjou, had never entirely dropped his pretensions to Elizabeth. In order to forward his suit, he employed his brother's ambassador, and sent over Simier, an agent of his own. This artful man soon remarking the queen's humour, amused her with gay discourse, and instead of serious political reasonings, which, he found, only awakened her ambition, and hurt his master's interests, he introduced every moment all the topics of passion and of gallantry. The pleasure which she found in his company, soon produced a familiarity between them; and, amidst the greatest hurry of business, her most confidential ministers had not such ready access to her, as had Simier, who, on pretence of negociation, entertained her with accounts of the tender attachment borne her by the duke of Anjou. The earl of Leicester, who had never before been alarmed with any courtship paid her, and who always trusted, that her love of dominion would prevail over her inclination to marriage, began to apprehend, that she was at last caught in her own snare, and that the artful encouragement which she had given to this young suitor had unawares engaged her affections. To render Simier odious, he availed himself of the credulity of the times, and spread reports, that that minister had gained an ascendant over the queen, not by any natural principles of her constitution, but by incantations and love potions. Simier, in revenge, endeavoured to discredit Leicester with the queen; by revealing to her a secret, which none of her courtiers dared to disclose, that this nobleman was secretly, without her consent, married to the widow of the earl of Essex; an action which the queen interpreted either to proceed from want of respect to her, or as a violation of their mutual attachment; and she was so provoked, that she threatened to send him to the Tower. The quarrel went so far between Leicester and the French agent, that the former was suspected of having employed one Tudor, a bravo, to take away the life of his enemy; and the queen, by proclamation, took Simier under her immediate protection. One day, while Elizabeth was rowed in her barge on the Thames, attended by Simier, and some of her courtiers, a shot was fired which wounded one of the bargemen; but it appearing that the piece had been discharged by accident, the queen gave the person his liberty. So far was she from entertaining any suspicion against her people, that she was often heard to say, "That she would lend credit to nothing against them, which parents would not believe of their own children."

The duke of Anjou, encouraged by the accounts sent him of the queen's prepossessions in his favour, paid her secretly a visit at Greenwich; and after some conference with her, the purport of which is not known, he departed. It appeared that, though his figure was not advantageous, he had lost no ground by being personally known to her; and soon after, she commanded Burleigh, now treasurer, Sussex, Leicester, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and secretary Walsingham, to concert with the French ambassadors the terms of the intended contract of marriage. Henry had sent over on this occasion a splendid embassy, consisting of Francis de Bourbon, prince dauphin, and many considerable noblemen; and as the queen had in a manner the power of prescribing what terms she pleased, the articles were soon settled with the English commissioners (v). Lest the English should take offence at the articles, the queen, as a proof of her remaining uncertainty, added a clause, that she was not bound to complete the marriage, till farther particulars, which were not specified, should be agreed on between the parties, and till the king of France be certified of this agreement. The queen, therefore, sent over Walsingham, as ambassador to France, in order to form closer connexions with Henry, and enter into a league offensive and defensive against the increasing power and dangerous usurpations of the court of Spain. Henry with reluctance submitted to hold conferences on that subject; but no sooner had Walsingham begun to settle the terms of alliance, than he was informed that the queen, foreseeing hostility with Spain to be the result of this confederacy, had declared "that she would prefer the marriage with the war, before the war without the marriage." The French court, pleased with this change of resolution, broke off the conferences concerning the league, and opened a negociation for the marriage. Matters, however, had not long proceeded in this train before the queen again declared for the league in preference to the marriage, and ordered Walsingham to renew the conferences for that purpose. Before he had leisure to bring this point to maturity, he was interrupted by a new change of resolution; and not only the court of France, but Walsingham himself, Burleigh, and all the wisest ministers of Elizabeth, were so embarrassed, that they became doubtful where this contest between inclination and reason, love and ambition, would at last terminate.

In the course of this negociation, Elizabeth, that the duke of Anjou might be enabled to open the campaign in Flanders, sent him a present of a hundred thousand crowns; by which, joined to his own demesnes, and the assistance of his brother and the queen-dowager, he levied an army, and took the field against the prince of Parma. He was successful in raising the siege of Cambray; and being chosen by the States governor of the Netherlands, he put his army into winter quarters, and came over to England, in order to prosecute his suit to the queen. From the reception he met with he expected entire success, and entertained hopes that Elizabeth had surmounted all her scruples, and was at length determined to make choice of him for her husband (w). But notwithstanding Elizabeth's attachment to the duke of Anjou, several noblemen and gentlemen endeavoured to dissuade her from a matrimonial connexion with the son of the perfidious Catherine in times of ignorance, were no longer able to defend the ramparts of the church, assailed on every side, and that the inquisitive spirit of the age required a society more active and more learned, to oppose its dangerous progress. These men, as they stood foremost in the contest against the Protestants, drew on them the extreme animosity of that whole sect; and by assuming a superiority over the other more numerous and more ancient orders of their own communion, were even exposed to the envy of their brethren. So that it is no wonder, if the blame, to which their principles and conduct might be exposed, has, in many instances, been much exaggerated.

The jesuits, as devoted servants to the court of Rome, exalted the prerogative of the sovereign pontiff above all earthly power; and, by maintaining his authority of deposing kings, set no bounds either to his spiritual or temporal jurisdiction. This doctrine became so prevalent among the zealous Catholics in England, that the excommunication fulminated against Elizabeth excited many scruples of a singular kind, to which it behoved the holy father to provide a remedy. The bull of Pius, in absolving the subjects from their oaths of allegiance, commanded them to resist the queen's usurpation; and many Romanists were apprehensive, that, by this clause, they were obliged in conscience, even though no favourable opportunity offered, to rebel against her, and that no dangers or difficulties could free them from this indispensable duty. But Parsons and Campion, two jesuits, were sent over with a mitigation and explanation of the doctrine; and they taught their disciples, that though the bull was for ever binding on Elizabeth and her partizans, it did not oblige the Catholics to obedience, except when the sovereign pontiff should think proper, by a new summons, to require it. Campion was afterwards detected in treasonable practices; and being put to the rack, and confessing his guilt, he was publicly executed.

(v) It was agreed by the commissioners, that the marriage should be celebrated within six weeks after the ratification of the articles; that the duke and his retinue should have the exercise of their religion; that after the marriage he should bear the title of King, but the administration remain solely in the queen; that their children, male or female, should succeed to the crown of England; that if there be two males, the elder, in case of Henry's death without issue, should be king of France, the younger of England; that if there be but one male, and he succeed to the crown of France, he should be obliged to reside in England eight months every two years; that the laws and customs of England should be preserved inviolate; and that no foreigner should be promoted by the duke to any office in England.

(w) In the midst of the pomp which attended the anniversary of her coronation, on the 17th of November, she was seen, after long and intimate discourse with him, to take a ring from her own finger, and to put it upon his; and all the spectators concluded, that in this ceremony she had given him a promise of marriage, and was even desirous of signifying her intentions to all the world. St. Aldegonde, ambassador from the States, dispatched immediately a letter to his masters, informing them of this great event; and the inhabitants of Antwerp, who as well as the other Flemings regarded the queen as a kind of tutelar divinity, testified their joy by bonfires and the discharge of their great ordnance. A Puritan of Lincoln's Inn had written a passionate book, which he intitled, "The Gulph in which England will be swallowed by the French "Marriage." He was apprehended and prosecuted by order of the queen, and was condemned to lose his right hand as a libeller. Such was the constancy and loyalty of the man, that immediately after the sentence was executed, he took off his hat with his other hand, and waving it over his head, cried, "God save the queen!"

de Medicis, brother to the cruel and perfidious Charles, and who had himself inbrued his hands in the blood of the innocent and defenceless Protestants of France. They represented to her, that the Catholics were her mortal enemies, and believed either that she had originally usurped the crown, or was now lawfully deposed by the pope's bull of excommunication; and they declared, that nothing had ever so much elevated their hopes as the prospect of her marriage with the duke of Anjou: that her chief security at present against the efforts of so numerous, rich, and united a faction, was, that they possessed no head who could conduct their dangerous enterprizes; and she herself was rashly supplying that defect, by giving an interest in the kingdom to a prince whose education had zealously attached him to that communion: that though he was a stranger to the blood royal of England, the dispositions of men were now such that they preferred the religious to the civil connexions; and were more influenced by sympathy in theological opinions, than by the principles of legal and hereditary government: that the duke himself had discovered a very restless and turbulent spirit; and having often violated his loyalty to his elder brother and his sovereign, there remained no hopes that he would passively submit to a woman whom he might in quality of husband think himself entitled to command: that the French nation, so populous, so much abounding in soldiers, so full of nobility who were devoted to arms, and for some time accustomed to serve for plunder, would supply him with partizans dangerous to a people unwarlike and defenceless like the generality of her subjects: that the plain and honourable path which she had followed, of cultivating the affections of her people, had hitherto rendered her reign secure and happy; and however her enemies might seem to multiply upon her, the same invincible rampart was still able to protect and defend her: that so long as the throne of France was filled by Henry or his posterity, it was in vain to hope that the ties of blood would ensure the amity of that kingdom, preferably to the maxims of policy or the prejudices of religious education; and if ever the crown devolved on the duke of Anjou, the conjunction of France and England would prove a burden rather than a protection to the latter kingdom: that the example of her sister Mary was sufficient to instruct her in the danger of such connexions; and to prove that the affection and confidence of the English could never be maintained where they had such reason to apprehend that their interests would every moment be sacrificed to those of a foreign and hostile nation: that notwithstanding these great inconveniences, discovered by past experience, the house of Burgundy, it must be confessed, was more popular in the nation than the family of France; and what was a principal matter, and of the greatest importance, Philip was of the same communion with Mary, and was connected with her by this great band of interest and affection: and that however the queen might remain childless, even though old age should grow upon her, the singular felicity and glory of her reign would preserve her from contempt; the affections of her subjects, and those of all the Protestants in Europe, would defend her from danger; and her own prudence, without any other air or assistance, would baffle all the efforts of her most malignant enemies.

The remonstrances of her countrymen so far prevailed over the inclinations of Elizabeth, that, having sent for the duke of Anjou, she had a long conference with him in private, where she was supposed to have made him apologies for breaking her former engagements. He expressed great disgust on his leaving her; threw away the ring which she had given him; and uttered many curses on the changeableness of women, particularly of islanders. Soon after, in 1582, he went over to his government of the Netherlands; lost the confidence of the States by a rash and violent attempt on their liberties; was expelled that country; retired into France; and there died. Thus did the queen, by timely reflection, save herself from the innumerable mischiefs which would inevitably have attended so imprudent a marriage: and the distracted state of the French monarchy prevented her from feeling any effects of that resentment which she had reason to apprehend from the affront so wantonly put upon that royal family.

Elizabeth's anxiety arising from the attempts of the English Catholics never ceased during the whole course of her reign; but the variety of revolutions which happened in all the neighbouring kingdoms, were the source sometimes of her hopes, sometimes of her apprehensions.

This year (1582) the affairs of Scotland strongly engaged her attention. The influence which the earl of Lenox, and James Stuart, who now assumed the title of earl of Arran, had acquired over the young king, was but a slender foundation of authority; while the generality of the nobles and all the preachers were so much discontented with their administration. The assembly of the church appointed a solemn fast; of which one of the avowed reasons was the danger to which the king was exposed from the company of wicked persons: and on that day the pulpits resounded with declamations against Lenox, Arran, and all the present counsellors. When the minds of the people were sufficiently prepared by these lectures, a conspiracy of the nobility was formed, probably with the concurrence of Elizabeth, for seizing the person of James at Ruthven, a seat of the earl of Gowry's; and the design being kept a secret, succeeded without any opposition, on the 23rd of August. The leaders in this enterprize were, the earl of Gowry himself, the earl of Marre, the lords Lindesey and Boyd, the masters of Glamis and Oliphant, the abbots of Dunfermline, Paisley, and Cambuskenneth. The king wept when he found himself detained a prisoner; but the master of Glamis said, "No matter for his tears: better that boys weep than bearded men:" an expression which James could never afterwards forgive. But notwithstanding his resentment, he found it necessary to submit to the present necessity. He pretended an entire acquiescence in the conduct of the associators; acknowledged the detention of his person to be acceptable service; and agreed to summon both an assembly of the church and a convention of estates, in order to ratify that enterprize.

The assembly, though they had previously determined that the king should never intermeddle in ecclesiastical matters, made no scruple of taking civil affairs under their cognizance, and of deciding on this occasion, that the attempt of the conspirators was acceptable to all that feared God, or intended the preservation of the king's person, and the prosperity of the realm. They even enjoined all the clergy to recommend these sentiments from the pulpit; and they threatened with ecclesiastical censures every person who should oppose the authority of the confederated lords. The convention being composed chiefly of these lords themselves, added their sanction to these proceedings. Arran was confined a prisoner in his own house: Lenox, though he had a power to resist, yet rather than raise a civil war, or be the cause of bloodshed, chose to retire into France, where he soon after died (x). The king sent for his family, restored his son to his paternal honours and estate, took care to establish the fortunes of all his other children; and never forgot the early friendship which he had borne their father.

This revolution being known in England, the queen sent sir Henry Cary and sir Robert Bowes to James, in order to congratulate him on his deliverance from the pernicious counsels of Lenox and Arran; to exhort him not to resent the seeming violence committed on him by the confederated lords; and to procure from him permission for the return of the earl of Angus, who ever since Morton's fall had lived in England. They easily prevailed in procuring the recal of Angus; and as James suspected that Elizabeth had not been entirely unacquainted with the project of his captivity, he thought proper before the English ambassadors to dissemble his resentment against the authors of it. Soon after, in 1583, La Mothe-Fenelon, and Menneville, appeared as ambassadors from France: their errand was to inquire concerning the situation of the king, make professions of their master's friendship, confirm the ancient league with France, and procure an accommodation between James and the queen of Scots. This last proposal gave great umbrage to the clergy; and the assembly voted the settling of terms between the mother and son to be a most wicked undertaking. The pulpits resounded with declamations against the French ambassadors; particularly Fenelon, whom they called the messenger of the bloody murderer, meaning the duke of Guise: and as that minister, being knight of the Holy Ghost, wore a white cross on his shoulder, they commonly denominated it in contempt the badge of Antichrist. The king endeavoured, though in vain, to repress these insolent (x) He persevered to the last in the Protestant religion, to which James had converted him, but which the Scottish clergy could never be persuaded that he had sincerely embraced.

reflections;

reflections; but in order to make the ambassadors some compensation, he desired the magistrates of Edinburgh to give them a splendid dinner before their departure. To put a stop to this entertainment, the clergy appointed a public fast to be celebrated on that day; and finding that their orders were not regarded, they employed their sermons in thundering anathemas on the magistrates, who, by the king's direction, had put this mark of respect on the ambassadors. They even pursued them afterwards with the censures of the church; and it was with difficulty they were prevented from issuing the sentence of excommunication against them, on account of their submission to royal, preferably to clerical, authority.

But what increased their alarm with regard to an accommodation between James and Mary was, that the English ambassadors appeared to concur with the French in this proposal; and the clergy even believed the sincerity of the professions made by the former. The queen of Scots had often made overtures to Elizabeth, which had been entirely neglected; but hearing of James's detention, she wrote a letter in a more pathetic and more spirited strain than usual; craving the assistance of that princess both for her own and her son's liberty. She said, that the account of the prince's captivity had excited her most tender concern; and the experience which she herself, during so many years, had of the extreme infelicity attending that situation, had made her the more apprehensive lest a like fate should pursue her unhappy offspring: that the long train of injustice which she had undergone, the calumnies to which she had been exposed, were so grievous, that, finding no place for right or truth among men, she was reduced to make her last appeal to Heaven, the only competent tribunal between princes of equal jurisdiction, degree, and dignity: that after her rebellious subjects, secretly instigated by Elizabeth's ministers, had expelled her the throne, had confined her in prison, had pursued her with arms, she had voluntarily thrown herself under the protection of England; fatally allured by those reiterated professions of amity which had been made her, and by her confidence in the generosity of a friend, an ally, and a kinswoman: that, not content with excluding her from her presence, with supporting the usurpers of her throne, with contributing to the destruction of her faithful subjects, Elizabeth had reduced her to a worse captivity than that from which she had escaped, and had made her this cruel return for the unlimited confidence which she had reposed in her: that though her resentment of such severe usage had never carried her farther than to use some disappointed efforts for her deliverance, unhappy for herself, and fatal to others, she found the rigours of confinement daily multiplied upon her; and at length carried to such a height that it surpassed the bounds of all human patience any longer to endure them: that she was cut off from all communication, not only with the rest of mankind, but with her only son; and her maternal fondness, which was now more enlivened by their unhappy sympathy in situation, and was her sole remaining attachment to this world, deprived even of that melancholy solace which letters or messages could give: that the bitterness of her sorrows, still more than her close confinement, had preyed upon her health, and had added the insufferable weight of bodily infirmity to all those other calamities under which she laboured: that while the daily experience of her maladies opened to her the comfortable prospect of an approaching deliverance into a region where pain and sorrow are no more, her enemies envied her that last consolation; and having secluded her from every joy on earth, had done what in them lay to debar her from all hopes in her future and eternal existence: that the exercise of her religion was refused her; the use of those sacred rites in which she had been educated; the commerce with those holy ministers whom Heaven had appointed to receive the acknowledgement of our transgressions, and to seal our penitence by a solemn readmission into heavenly favour and forgiveness: that it was in vain to complain of the rigours of persecution exercised in other kingdoms, when a queen and an innocent woman was excluded from an indulgence which never yet, in the most barbarous countries, had been denied to the meanest and most detestable malefactor: that could she ever be induced to descend from that royal dignity in which Providence had placed her, or depart from her appeal to Heaven, there was only one other tribunal to which she would appeal from all her enemies; to the justice and humanity of Elizabeth's own breast, and to that lenity which, uninfluenced by malignant counsel, she would naturally be induced to exercise towards her: and that she finally entreated her to resume her natural disposition, and to reflect on the support as well as comfort, which she might receive from her son and herself, if, joining the obligations of gratitude to the ties of blood, she would deign to raise them from their present melancholy situation, and reinstate them in that liberty and authority to which they were entitled.

Elizabeth, however, was engaged to obstruct Mary's restoration, chiefly because she foresaw an unhappy alternative attending that event; and Mary herself, sensible of the difficulties which would attend her restoration to the throne of Scotland, became more humble in her wishes, and proposed, that she should be associated with her son in the title to the crown of her own country, but that the administration should remain solely in him. She was even content to live in England in a private station, and under a kind of restraint; but with an allowance of more liberty, both for exercise and company, than she had hitherto enjoyed since the first discovery of her intrigues with the duke of Norfolk. But Elizabeth, fearful lest such a loose method of guarding her would facilitate her escape into France or Spain, or at least would encourage and increase her partizans, and enable her to conduct those intrigues to which she had already discovered a strong propensity, was secretly determined to deny her requests; and though she feigned to assent to them, she well knew how to disappoint the expectations of the unhappy princess. While Lenox maintained his authority in Scotland, she never gave any reply to all the applications made to her by the Scottish queen: at present, when her own creatures had acquired possession of the government, she was resolved to throw the odium of refusal upon them; and pretending that nothing farther was required to a perfect accommodation than the concurrence of the council of state in Scotland, she ordered her ambassador, sir Robert Bowes, to open the negociation for Mary's liberty, and her association with her son in the title to the crown. Though she seemed to make this concession to Mary, she refused her the liberty of sending any ambassador of her own; and that princess could easily conjecture from this circumstance what would be the result of the pretended negociation. The privy council of Scotland, instigated by the clergy, rejected all treaty; and James, who was now a captive in their hands, affirmed, that he had never agreed to an association with his mother, and that the matter had never gone farther than some loose proposals for that purpose. Thus by artfully conducting the matter, Elizabeth baffled the intrigues of the two French envoys, and reduced Mary to the horrors of despair. The Gowry faction resolutely opposed every proposition for the relief of the imprisoned queen; and an end was put to the negociation.

The Scottish affairs remained not long in their present situation. James, impatient of restraint, made his escape from his keepers; and, flying to St. Andrew's, summoned his friends and partizans to attend him. The earls of Argyle, Marshal, Montrose, and Rothes, hastened to pay their duty to their sovereign; and the opposite party found themselves unable to resist so powerful a combination. They were offered a pardon upon their submission, and an acknowledgement of their fault in seizing the king's person, and restraining him from his liberty. Some of them accepted of the terms: the greater number, particularly Angus, Hamilton, Marre, Glamis, left the country, and took shelter in Ireland or England, where they were protected by Elizabeth. The earl of Arran was recalled to court; and the malcontents, who could not brook the authority of Lenox, a man of virtue and moderation, found that by their resistance they had thrown all power into the hands of a person whose counsels were as violent as his manners were profligate.

Elizabeth, highly offended, wrote a letter to James; in which she quoted a moral sentence from Isocrates, and indirectly reproached him with inconstancy, and a breach of his engagements. James, in his reply, justified his measures; and retaliated by turning two passages of Isocrates against her. She next sent sir Francis Walsingham, one of the ablest politicians of her court, on an embassy to him; and her chief purpose in employing that aged minister in an errand where so little business was to be transacted, was to learn from a man of so much penetration and experience, the real character of James, and to aim at the removal of the earl of Arran from the administration. James, although he was young in years, possessed good parts, but they were not accompanied with that vigour and industry which his station required; and as he excelled in general discourse and conversation, Walsingham entertained tained a higher idea of his talents than he was afterwards found, when real business was transacted, to have fully merited. James expressed his desire of cultivating a good understanding with the queen of England; but Walsingham could not prevail on him to submit to her imperious dictates. The account which he gave his mistress of the young prince induced her to treat James thenceforth with more regard than she had hitherto been inclined to pay him.

The king of Scots persevering in his present views, summoned a parliament in 1584; where it was enacted, "that no clergyman should presume in his sermons to utter false, untrue, or scandalous speeches against the king, the council, or the public measures, or to meddle in an improper manner with the affairs of his majesty and the states." The clergy, finding that the pulpit would be no longer a sanctuary for them, were extremely offended: they said that the king was become popish in his heart; and they gave their adversaries the epithets of gross libertines, belly gods, and infamous persons. The violent conduct of the earl of Arran soon brought over the popularity to their side. The earl of Gowry, though pardoned for the late attempt, was committed to prison, was tried on some new accusations, condemned and executed. Many innocent persons suffered from the tyranny of this favourite; and the banished lords, being assisted by Elizabeth, now found the time favourable for the recovery of their estates and authority. After they had been foiled in one attempt upon Stirling, they prevailed in another; and being admitted to the king's presence, were pardoned and restored to his favour.

The earl of Arran was degraded from authority; deprived of that estate and title which he had usurped; and the whole country seemed to be composed to tranquillity. Elizabeth, after opposing, during some time, the credit of the favourite, had found it more expedient before his fall to compound all differences with him by means of Davison, a minister whom she sent to Scotland; but having more confidence in the lords whom she had helped to restore, she was pleased with this alteration of affairs; and maintained a good correspondence with the new court and ministry of James.

These revolutions in Scotland would have been regarded as of little importance to the repose and security of Elizabeth, had her own subjects been entirely united, and had not the zeal of the Catholics, excited by constraint more than by perfection, daily threatened her with some dangerous insurrection. Elizabeth still continued to hold out to Mary a prospect of liberty; but the unfortunate princess was convinced that all hopes of meeting with voluntary relief from her rancorous persecutor were fallacious and nugatory. She was therefore obliged to depend solely on the efforts of her friends; but the vigilance of Elizabeth's administration disconcerted all the schemes that were formed for her deliverance by the malcontents. To discover the sentiments of individuals, Burleigh, Leicester, and Walsingham, practised such artifices as an honourable government would have disdained. Letters were forged in the name of Mary, or of some of the English refugees, and privately sent to the habitations of Catholics; spies were employed in all parts to watch and report the conversation of suspected persons; and great encouragement was given to those officious men who were ready to accuse and calumniate their neighbours; and though the sagacity of these two great ministers helped them to distinguish the true from the false intelligence, many calumnies were, no doubt, hearkened to, and all the subjects, particularly the Papists, kept in the utmost anxiety and ingratitude. In consequence of intelligence thus procured, Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, brother to the rebellious peer who had been betrayed by the earl Morton and beheaded some years before at York, was considered as a disaffected subject, and imprisoned in the Tower; Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, son of the late unfortunate duke of Norfolk, fell under suspicion, and was confined in his own house, and his wife was taken into custody; another son of the duke, as well as a brother, underwent repeated examinations; and several other persons were apprehended on suspicion of being friendly to the queen of Scots. Francis Throgmorton, a private gentleman of Cheshire, was committed to custody, on account of a letter which he had written to Mary, and which was intercepted. Thomas lord Paget and Charles Arundel, who had been engaged with him in treasonable designs, immediately withdrew, and made a precipitate retreat to France, where they publicly inveighed against the jealous severity of the English government. Among the papers of Throgmorton were found lists of the ports most convenient for a descent, and of the principal Catholics throughout England. He at first disavowed these papers, and said they had been forged by his enemies; but the application of violent torture induced him to confess that a plan for an invasion and insurrection had been laid; and though, on his trial, he was desirous of retracting this confession, and imputing it to the fear of torture, he was found guilty. Prompted by the hopes of mercy, he afterwards re-asserted what he had lately denied; but, at the place of execution, he renewed his disavowal of the pretended conspiracy, and protested against the injustice of putting an innocent person to death. But notwithstanding this final declaration, there is no doubt of his having been guilty of seditious intrigues. Mendoza the Spanish ambassador, having promoted this conspiracy, was ordered to depart the kingdom; and Wade was sent into Spain, to excuse his dismission, and to desire the king to send another ambassador in his place: but Philip would not so much as admit the English ambassador to his presence. Creighton, a Scottish jesuit, coming over on board a vessel which was seized, tore some papers, with an intention of throwing them into the sea; but the wind blowing them back upon the ship, they were pieced together, and discovered some dangerous secrets; particularly that designs were formed in behalf of Mary by the pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Guise.

Many of these conspiracies were, with great appearance of reason, imputed to the intrigues of the queen of Scots; and as her name was employed in all of them, the council thought that they could not use too many precautions against the danger of her claims, and the restless activity of her temper. A letter from her to sir Francis Englefield was intercepted, in which she recommends the speedy execution of the great plot. She was therefore removed from under the care of the earl of Shrewsbury, who, though vigilant and faithful in that trust, had also been indulgent to his prisoner, particularly with regard to air and exercise; and she was committed to the custody of sir Amias Paulet and sir Drue Drury; men of honour, but inflexible in their care and attention. An association was also set on foot by the earl of Leicester and other courtiers; and as Elizabeth was beloved by the whole nation, except the more zealous Catholics, men of all ranks willingly flocked to the subscription of it. The purport of this association was to defend the queen, to revenge her death or any injury committed against her, and to exclude from the throne all claimants, what title soever they might possess, by whose suggestion or for whose behoof any violence should be offered to her majesty. The queen of Scots was sensible that this association was levelled against her; and to remove all suspicion from herself, she also desired leave to subscribe it.

Mary now, to avert the calamity which she expected this association was calculated to bring upon her, proposed to Elizabeth such terms as her friends thought could not fail to be acceptable. She promised, in return for the grant of liberty, to enter into the most intimate union with her royal relative; to cancel the remembrance of every injury she had received; to acknowledge Elizabeth as the lawful sovereign of England; to make no attempts, either directly or indirectly, against the queen; to consider the bull pronounced against her by pope Pius the Fifth as invalid; to join the association which had been formed for her defence; to make no alterations in Scotland; to attach the king her son to the English interests; to continue in England some time as a hostage, and, on her departure, to deliver unexceptional persons as sureties for her adherence to her engagements; and to prevail on the king of France and the princes of the house of Guise to guarantee this convention.

When these propositions were communicated to Elizabeth, she pretended to feel great satisfaction; but a real desire of granting relief to the distressed queen was a sensation which she never felt. Her ministers remonstrated against her shewing humanity to a princess who had long wished to dethrone her, who had constantly encouraged the spirit of sedition and treason among the English, and whose ardent resentments, and bigoted attachment to popery, gave reason to expect that if she obtained her liberty she would attempt the destruction of Elizabeth, and the extirpation of the reformed faith from the island of Britain. These suggestions being perfectly concordant with the secret views of Elizabeth, produced the rejection of every proposal offered by the unfortunate Mary.

That she might the more discourage malcontents, Elizabeth summoned a new parliament on the 23rd of November, 1584; and met with that dutiful attachment which she expected. The association for the defence of the queen was confirmed by parliament; and a clause was added to the act, by which the queen was empowered to name commissioners for the trial of any pretender to the crown who should attempt or imagine any invasion, insurrection, or assassination against her: upon condemnation, pronounced by these commissioners, the guilty person was excluded from all claim to the succession, and was farther punishable as her majesty should direct. And for greater security, a council of regency, in case of the queen's violent death, was appointed to govern the kingdom, to settle the succession, and to take vengeance for that act of treason. The public readily foresaw that the death of the imprisoned queen would soon follow the promulgation of this act; and the unprecedented injustice of trying an independent sovereign before a tribunal composed of subjects of another nation, appeared in a strong point of view to those who entered dispassionately into the merits of the case.

A severe law was also enacted against jesuits and popish priests. It was ordained that they should depart the kingdom within forty days; that those who should remain beyond that time, or should afterwards return, should be guilty of treason; that those who harboured or encouraged them should be guilty of felony; that those who were educated in popish seminaries, if they returned not in six months after notice given, and submitted not themselves to the queen, before a bishop or two justices, should be guilty of treason; and that if any, so submitting themselves, should within ten years approach the court, or come within ten miles of it, their submission should be void. By this law the exercise of the Catholic religion, which had formerly been prohibited under lighter penalties, and which was in many instances connived at, was totally suppressed. In the subsequent part of the queen's reign, the law was sometimes executed by the capital punishment of priests; and though the partizans of that princess asserted that they were punished for their treason, not their religion, the apology must only be understood in this sense, that the law was enacted on account of the treasonable views and attempts of the sect, not that every individual who suffered the penalty of the law was convicted of treason (y). The Catholics, therefore, might now with justice complain of a violent persecution; which we may safely affirm, in spite of the rigid and bigoted maxims of that age, not to be the best method of converting them, or of reconciling them to the established government and religion.

The parliament, besides arming the queen with these powers, granted her a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths. The only circumstance in which their proceedings were disagreeable to her, was an application made by the commons for a farther reformation in ecclesiastical matters. Yet even in this attempt, which affected her as well as them in a delicate point, they discovered how much they were overawed by her authority. The majority of the house were Puritans, or inclined to that sect (z); but the severe reprimands which they had already in former sessions met with from the throne, deterred them from introducing any bill concerning religion. They were content therefore to proceed by way of petition, and that not addressed to her majesty, which would have given offence, but to the house of lords (a), or rather the bishops, who had a seat in that house, and from whom alone they were willing to receive all advances towards reformation.

During this session of parliament a conspiracy was discovered, which much increased the animosity against the Catholics, and still farther widened the breach between the religious parties. William Parry, a Catholic gentleman, had received the queen's pardon for a crime, by which he was exposed to capital punishment; and, having obtained permission to travel, he retired to Milan, and made open profession of his religion, which he had concealed while he remained in England. He was here persuaded by Palmio, a jesuit, that he could not perform a (y) Some even of those who defend the queen's measures allow, that in ten years fifty priests were executed, and fifty-five banished. Camden, p. 649.

(z) Besides the petition after mentioned, another proof of the prevalency of the Puritans among the commons was their passing a bill for the reverent observance of Sunday, and the depriving the people of those amusements which they were accustomed to take on that day. D'Ewes, p. 335. It was a strong symptom of a contrary spirit in the upper house, that they proposed to add Wednesday to the fast days, and to prohibit entirely the eating of flesh on that day. D'Ewes, p. 373.

(a) The commons desired, in their petition, that no bishop should exercise his function of ordination but with the consent and concurrence of six presbyters: but this demand, as it really introduced a change of ecclesiastical government, was rejected by the prelates. They desired that no clergyman should be instituted into any benefice, without previous notice being given to the parish, that they might examine whether there lay any objection to his life or doctrine: an attempt towards a popular model, which naturally met with the same fate. In another article of the petition, they prayed that the bishops should not insist upon every ceremony, or deprive incumbents for omitting part of the service. They complained of abuses which prevailed in pronouncing the sentence of excommunication, and they entreated the reverend fathers to think of some law for the remedy of these abuses. But the most material article which the commons touched upon in their petition, was the court of ecclesiastical commission, and the oath ex officio, as it was called, exacted by that court. This is a subject of such importance as to merit some explanation. "The first primate after the queen's accession was Parker; a man rigid in exacting conformity to the established worship, and in punishing, by fine or deprivation, all the puritanical clergymen who attempted to innovate any thing in the habits, ceremonies, or liturgy of the church. He died in 1575, and was succeeded by Grindal, who, as he himself was inclined to the new sect, was with great difficulty brought to execute the laws against them, or to punish the nonconforming clergy. He declined obeying the queen's orders for the suppression of prophesyings, or the assemblies of the zealots in private houses, which she apprehended had become so many academies of fanaticism; and for this offence she had, by an order of the Star Chamber, sequestered him from his archiepiscopal function, and confined him to his own house. Upon his death, which happened in 1583, she determined not to fall in the same error in her next choice; and she named Whitgift, a zealous churchman, who had already signalised his pen in controversy, and who, having in vain attempted to convince the Puritans by argument, was now resolved to open their eyes by power, and by the execution of penal statutes. He informed the queen that all the spiritual authority lodged in the prelates was insignificant without the sanction of the crown; and as there was no ecclesiastical commission at that time in force, he engaged her to issue a new one; more arbitrary than any of the former, and conveying more unlimited authority. She appointed forty-four commissioners, twelve of whom were ecclesiastics; three commissioners made a quorum; the jurisdiction of the court extended over the whole kingdom, and over all orders of men; and every circumstance of its authority, and all its methods of proceeding, were contrary to the clearest principles of law and natural equity. The commissioners were empowered to visit and reform all errors, heresies, schisms, in a word to regulate all opinions, as well as to punish all breach of uniformity in the exercise of public worship. They were directed to make inquiry, not only by the legal methods of juries and witnesses, but by all other means and ways which they could devise; that is, by the rack, by torture, by inquisition, by imprisonment. Where they found reason to suspect any person, they might administer to him an oath, called ex officio, by which he was bound to answer all questions, and might thereby be obliged to accuse himself or his most intimate friend. The fines which they levied were discretionary, and often occasioned the total ruin of the offender, contrary to the established laws of the kingdom. The imprisonment to which they condemned any delinquent was limited by no rule but their own pleasure. They assumed a power of imposing on the clergy what new articles of subscription, and consequently of faith, they thought proper. Though all other spiritual courts were subject, since the reformation, to inhibitions from the supreme courts of law, the ecclesiastical commissioners were exempted from that legal jurisdiction, and were liable to no control. And the more to enlarge their authority, they were empowered to punish all incests, adulteries, fornications; all outrages, misbehaviours, and disorders in marriage: and the punishments which they might inflict, were according to their wisdom, conscience, and discretion. In a word, this court was a real inquisition; attended with all the iniquities, as well as cruelties, inseparable from that tribunal. And as the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court was destructive of all law, so its erection was deemed by many a mere usurpation of this imperious princess; and had no other foundation than a clause of a statute, restoring the supremacy to the crown, and empowering the sovereign to appoint commissioners for exercising that prerogative. But prerogative in general, especially the supremacy, was supposed in that age to involve powers which no law, precedent, or reason could limit or determine.

"But though the commons, in their humble petition to the prelates, had touched so gently and submissively on the ecclesiastical grievances, the queen, in a speech from the throne at the end of the session, could not forbear taking notice of their presumption, and reproving them for those murmurs which, for fear of offending her, they had pronounced so low as not directly to reach her royal ears. After giving them some general thanks for their attachment to her, and making professions of affection to her subjects, she told them, that whoever found fault with the church threw a slander upon her, since she was appointed by God supreme ruler over it, and no heresies or schisms could prevail in the kingdom but by her permission and negligence: that some abuses must necessarily have place in every thing; but she warned the prelates to be watchful; for if she found them careless of their charge, she was fully determined to depose them: that she was commonly supposed to have employed herself in many studies, particularly philosophical (by which I suppose she meant theological,) and she would confess that few, whose leisure had not allowed them to make profession of science, had read or reflected more: that as she could discern the presumption of many, in curiously canvassing the scriptures, and starting innovations, she would no longer endure this licentiousness; but meant to guide her people by God's rule, in the just mean between the corruptions of Rome and the errors of modern sectaries: and that as the Romanists were the inveterate enemies of her person, so the other innovators were dangerous to all kingly government; and, under colour of preaching the word of God, presumed to exercise their private judgement, and to censure the actions of the prince." Hume.

more meritorious action than to take away the life of his sovereign and his benefactress; the nuncio Campeggio, when consulted, approved of this pious undertaking; and Parry, though agitated with doubts, came to Paris, with an intention of passing over to England, and executing his bloody purpose. He was here encouraged in the design by Thomas Morgan, a gentleman of great credit in the party; and though Watts and some other Catholic priests told him that the enterprize was criminal and impious, he preferred the authority of Raggazzoni, the nuncio at Paris, and determined to persist in his resolution. He here wrote a letter to the pope, which was conveyed to cardinal Como; he communicated his intention to the holy father; and craved his absolution and paternal benediction. He received an answer from the cardinal, by which he found that his purpose was highly applauded; and he came over to England with a full design of carrying it into execution. But this bigotted assassin resolved, before he came to extremities, to try every other expedient for alleviating the persecutions under which the Catholics at that time laboured. He found means of being introduced to the queen; assured her that many conspiracies were formed against her; and exhorted her, as she tendered her life, to give the Romanists more indulgence in the exercise of their religion; but, lest he should be tempted by the opportunity to assassinate her, he always came to court unprovided with every offensive weapon. He even found means to be elected member of parliament for Queenborough; and having made a vehement harangue against the severe laws enacted this last session, was committed to custody for his freedom, and sequestered from the house. His failure in these attempts confirmed him the more in his former resolution; and he communicated his intentions to Nevil, who entered zealously into the design, and was determined to have a share in the merits of its execution. A book newly published by Dr. Allen, afterwards created a cardinal, served farther to efface all their scruples with regard to the murder of an heretical prince; and, having agreed to shoot the queen while she should be taking the air on horseback, they resolved, if they could not make their escape, to sacrifice their lives, in fulfilling a duty so agreeable, as they imagined, to the will of God and to true religion. While they were watching an opportunity for the execution of their purpose, the earl of Westmoreland died in exile; and as Edmund Nevil was next heir to that family, he began to entertain hopes, that by doing some acceptable service to the queen, he might recover the estate and honours which had been forfeited by the rebellion of the last earl. He betrayed the whole conspiracy to the ministers; and Parry, being thrown into prison, made a full confession of his guilt, both to them and to the jury who tried him. The letter from cardinal Como, being produced in court, put Parry's narrative beyond all question; and that criminal, having received sentence of death, suffered the punishment which the law appointed for his treasonable conspiracy (b).

Thus we perceive, that the bigoted spirit of the Catholic religion prompted its devotees even to the commission of assassination, for the purpose of doing God service in the extirpation of heretics! One Somerville, a gentleman of the county of Warwick, somewhat disordered in his understanding, had heard so much of the merit attending the assassination of heretics, that he came to London with the sole view of murdering the queen; but having betrayed his design by some extravagances, he was thrown into prison, and there perished by a voluntary death. About the same time Baltazar Gerard, a Burgundian, undertook and executed the same design against the prince of Orange, who perished at Delft, by the hands of that desperate assassin, whose resolution was worthy of a better cause; for he sacrificed his own life, in order to destroy the famous restorer and protector of religious liberty. The Flemings, who regarded that prince as their father, were filled with great sorrow, as well when they considered the miserable end of so brave a patriot, as their own forlorn condition from the loss of so powerful and prudent a leader, and from the rapid progress of the Spanish arms. The prince of Parma now made gread advances upon the Flemings, had reduced several of the provinces to obedience, and had laid close siege to Antwerp, the richest and most populous city of the Netherlands, whose subjection, it was foreseen, would give a mortal blow to the already declining affairs of the revolted provinces. The only hopes which remained to them arose from the prospect of foreign succour. Being well acquainted with the cautious and frugal maxims of Elizabeth, they expected better success from France; and, in the view of engaging Henry to embrace their defence, they tendered him the sovereignty of their provinces in 1585. The revisal, however, of the distractions of that monarchy obliged the king to reject so advantageous an offer. The duke of Anjou's death, which he thought would have tended to restore public tranquillity, by delivering him from the intrigues of that prince, plunged him into the deepest distress; and the king of Navarre, a professed Hugonot, being next heir to the crown, the duke of Guise took thence occasion to revive the Catholic league, and to urge Henry, by the most violent expedients, to seek the exclusion of that brave and virtuous prince. Henry himself, though a zealous Catholic, yet, because he declined complying with their precipitate measures, became an object of aversion to the league; and as his zeal, in practising all the superstitious observances of the Romish church, was accompanied with a very licentious conduct in private life; the Catholic faction, in contradiction to universal experience, embraced thence the pretext of representing his devotion as mere deceit and hypocrisy. Finding his authority to decline, he was compelled to declare war against the Hugonots, and to put arms into the hands of the league, whom, both on account of their dangerous pretensions at home, and their close alliance of Philip of Spain, he secretly regarded as his most dangerous enemies. Constrained by the same policy, he dreaded the danger of associating himself with the revolted Protestants in the Low Countries, and was obliged to renounce that inviting opportunity of revengeing himself for all the hostile intrigues and enterprizes of Philip.

The States, reduced to this extremity, sent over a solemn embassy to London, and made a fresh offer to the queen, of acknowledgeing her for their sovereign, on condition of obtaining her protection and assistance. Elizabeth's wisest counsellors were divided in opinion with regard to the line of conduct which she should adopt in this critical and important emergence. Some advised her to reject the offer of the States, and represented the imminent danger, as well as injustice, attending the acceptance of their proposal. They said, that the suppression of rebellious subjects was the common cause of all sovereigns, and any encouragement given to the revolt of the Flemings, might prove the example of a like pernicious licence to the English: that though princes were bound by the laws of the Supreme Being not to oppress their subjects, the people never were entitled to forget all duty to their sovereign, or transfer, from every fancy or disgust, or even from the justest ground of complaint, their obedience to any other master: that the queen, in the succours hitherto afforded the Flemings, had considered them as labouring under oppression, not as entitled to freedom; and had intended only to admonish Philip not to persevere in his tyranny, without any view of ravishing from him those provinces which he enjoyed by hereditary right from his ancestors: that her situation in Ireland, and even in England, would afford that powerful monarch sufficient opportunity of retaliating upon her; and she must thenceforth expect that, instead of secretly fomenting faction, he would openly employ his whole force in the protection and defence of the Catholics: that the pope would undoubtedly unite his spiritual arms to the temporal ones of Spain: and that the queen would soon repent her making so precarious an acquisition in foreign countries, by exposing her own dominions to the most imminent danger.

But Elizabeth's other counsellors maintained a contrary

(b) This year (1584) the earl of Northumberland, brother to the earl beheaded some years before, had been engaged in a conspiracy with lord Paget, for the deliverance of the queen of Scots. He was thrown into the Tower; and being conscious that his guilt could be proved upon him, at least that sentence would infallibly be pronounced against him, he freed himself from farther prosecution by a voluntary death. He shot himself in the breast with a pistol. About the same time the earl of Arundel, son of the unfortunate duke of Norfolk, having entered into some exceptionable measures, and reflecting on the unhappy fate which had attended his family, endeavoured to depart secretly beyond sea, but was discovered and thrown into the Tower. In 1587 this nobleman was brought to his trial for high treason; chiefly because he dropped some expressions of affection to the Spaniards, and had said that he would have masses said for the success of the Armada. His peers found him guilty of treason; and this severe sentence was not executed; but Arundel never recovered his liberty. He died a prisoner in 1595. He carried his religious austerities so far, that they were believed the immediate cause of his death.

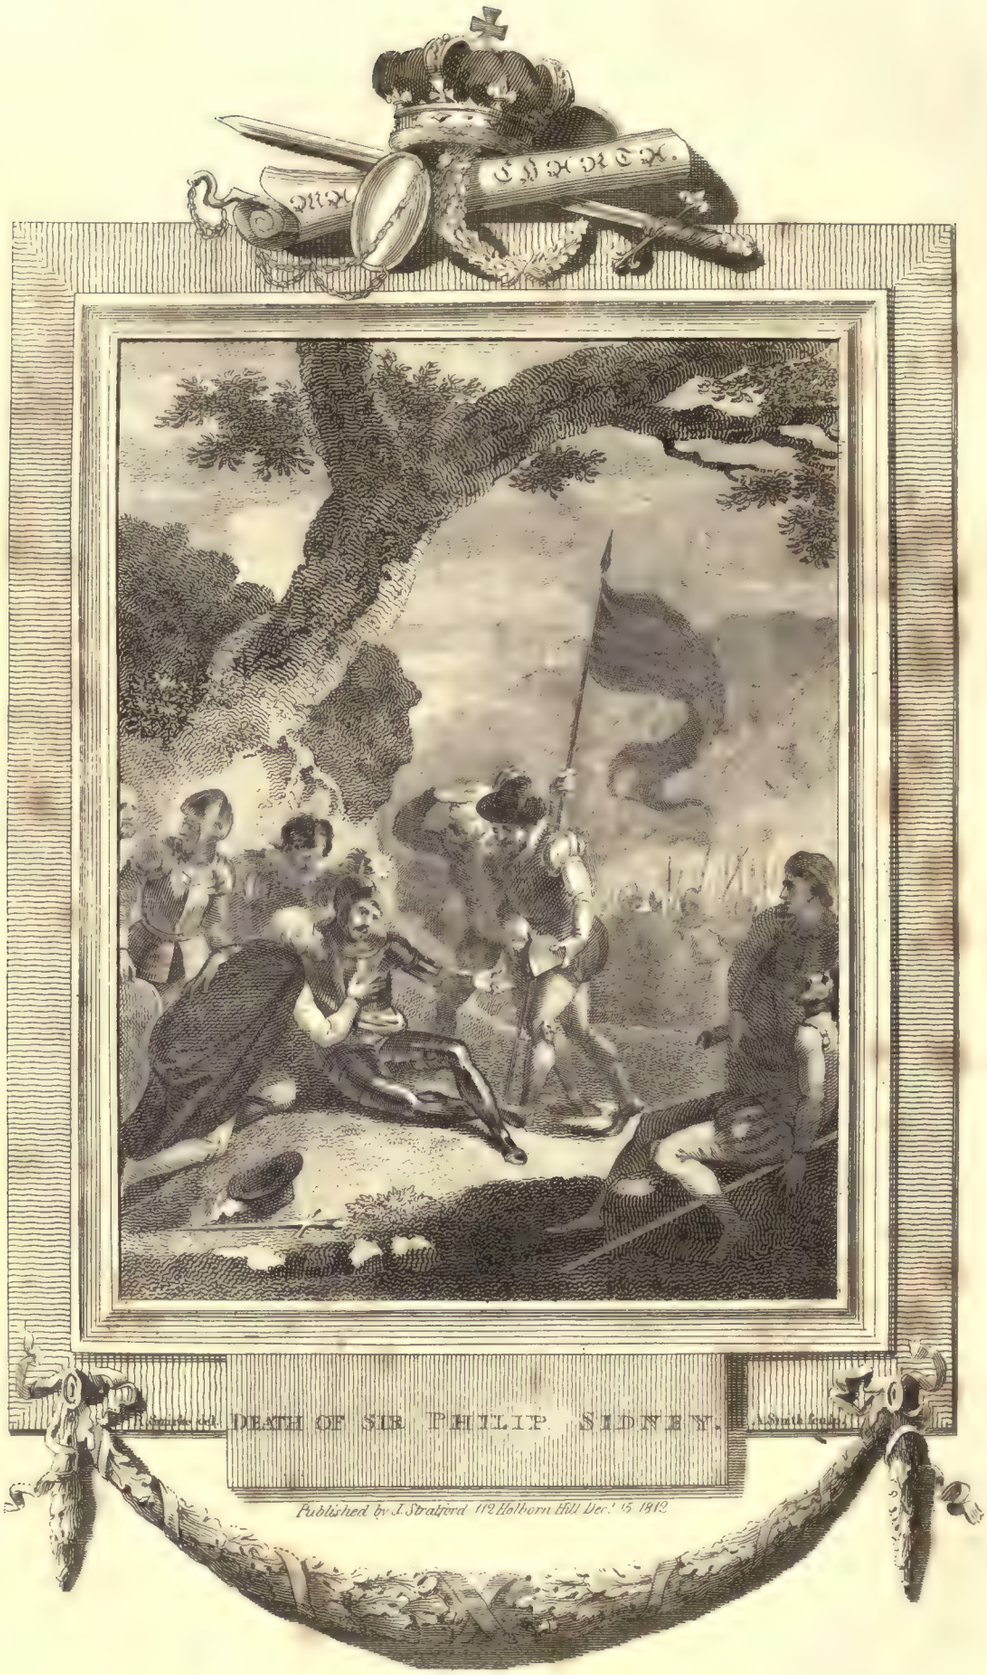
opinion; the substance of which was, that the queen had not, even from the beginning of her reign, but certainly had not at present, the choice whether she would embrace friendship or hostility with Philip: that by the whole tenor of that prince's conduct it appeared, that his sole aims were, the extending of his empire, and the entire subjection of the Protestants, under the specious pretence of maintaining the Catholic faith: that the provocations which she had already given him, joined to his general scheme of policy, would for ever render him her implacable enemy; and as soon as he had subdued his revolted subjects, he would undoubtedly fall, with the whole force of his united empire, on her defenceless state: that the only question was, whether she would maintain a war abroad, and supported by allies, or wait till the subjection of all the confederates of England should give her enemies leisure to begin their hostilities in the bowels of the kingdom: that the revolted provinces, though in a declining condition, possessed still considerable force; and by the assistance of England, by the advantages of their situation, and by their inveterate antipathy to Philip, might still be enabled to maintain the contest against the Spanish monarchy: that their maritime power, united to the queen's, would give her entire security on the side from which alone she could be assaulted, and would even enable her to make inroads on Philip's dominions, both in Europe and the Indies: that a war which was necessary could never be unjust; and self-defence was concerned, as well in preventing certain dangers at a distance, as in repelling any immediate invasion: and that, since hostility with Spain was the unavoidable consequence of the present interests and situations of the two monarchies, it were better to compensate that danger and loss by the acquisition of such important provinces to the English empire.

From the consideration of these opposite counsels, the queen, apprehensive of the consequences attending each extreme, was inclined to steer a middle course; and though such conduct is seldom prudent, she was not, in this resolution, guided by any prejudice or mistaken affection. She was determined not to permit, without opposition, the total subjection of the revolted provinces, whose interests she deemed so closely connected with her own: but foreseeing that the acceptance of their sovereignty would oblige her to employ her whole force in their defence, she immediately rejected this offer, and concluded a league with the States on the following conditions: "That she should send over an army to their assistance, of five thousand infantry and a thousand horse, and provide for the support of this army during the war; that the general, and two others whom she should appoint, should be admitted into the council of the States; that neither party should make peace without the consent of the other; that her expences should be refunded by the States after the conclusion of the war; and that the towns of Flushing and the Brille, with the castle of Rammekins, should, in the mean time, be consigned into her hands by way of security; that an equal number of vessels of war should be equipped by each of the contracting parties; and that the combined fleets should be put under the command of the admiral of England."

The queen was well aware that this measure would engage her in open hostilities with Philip; yet was she not terrified with the view of the present greatness of that monarch. The continent of Spain was at that time rich and populous; and the late addition of Portugal had annexed an opulent kingdom to the Spanish dominions, had made him master of many settlements in the East-Indies, and of the whole commerce of those regions, and had much increased his naval power, in which he was before principally deficient. All the princes of Italy, even the pope and the court of Rome, were reduced to a kind of subjection under him, and seemed to possess their sovereignty on terms somewhat precarious. The Austrian branch in Germany, with their dependent principalities, was closely connected with the Spanish monarch, and was ready to supply him with troops for every enterprize. All the treasures of the West Indies were in his possession; and the present scarcity of the precious metals in every country of Europe, rendered the influence of his riches the more forcible and extensive. The Netherlands seemed on the point of relapsing into servitude; and small hopes were entertained of their withstanding the numerous and veteran armies, which he employed against them. Even France, which was desirous to counterbalance the Austrian greatness, had lost all her force from intestine commotions; and as the Catholics, the ruling party, were closely connected with him, he rather expected from them an augmentation than a diminution of his power. Upon the whole, such prepossessions were every where entertained concerning the force of the Spanish monarchy, that the king of Sweden, when he heard that Elizabeth had openly embraced the defence of the revolted Flemings, scrupled not to say, that she had now taken the diadem from her own head, and had adventured it upon the doubtful chance of war. Yet this princess was rather cautious than enterprizing in her natural temper; but when she saw an evident necessity, she braved danger with magnanimity; and trusting to her own consummate wisdom, and to the affections, however divided, of her people, she prepared herself to resist and even to assault the whole force of the Catholic monarch.

For the justification of her conduct in making this close alliance with the provinces which had revolted from the Spanish yoke, Elizabeth published a manifesto, in which she stated, that the treaties which had been successively concluded, not only between the princes of the house of Burgundy and the English sovereigns, but between the principal commercial towns of her realm and the Netherlands, imposed on her an obligation of exerting her efforts for the preservation of the privileges of the States; that the multiplied oppressions which they had suffered from the Spanish government called for her interposition to relieve them from that misery and servitude which would prevent them from enjoying the benefit of their established intimacy with the English; that her refusal of the sovereignty which they had offered her proved her to be uninfluenced by the thirst of dominion and the views of ambition; that she aimed only at the deliverance of her Belgic neighbours from the calamities of war and of tyranny, partly out of regard to subsisting treaties, and partly from a desire of obstructing Philip's intentions of rendering them the instruments of his enmity against her; and that, though the provocations which she had received from that monarch justified her in commencing open hostilities against him, she was more inclined to a reasonable accommodation with him, than to a risque of the uncertain events of war.



The earl of Leicester was sent over to Holland, at the head of the English auxiliary forces. He carried with him a splendid retinue; being accompanied by the young earl of Essex, his son-in-law, the lords Audley and North, sir William Russel, sir Thomas Shirley, sir Arthur Basset, sir Walter Waller, sir Gervase Clifton, and a select troop of five hundred gentlemen. On his arrival at Flushing, he was received by his nephew sir Philip Sidney, the governor; and every town through which he passed expressed their joy by acclamations and triumphal arches, as if his presence and the queen's protection had brought them the most certain deliverance. The States, desirous of engaging Elizabeth still farther in their defence, and knowing the interest which Leicester possessed with her, conferred on him the title of governor and captain-general of the United Provinces, appointed a guard to attend him, and treated him in some respects as their sovereign (c). But this step had a contrary effect to what they expected. The queen was displeased with this artifice of the States, and the ambition of Leicester. She severely reprimanded both; and it was with some difficulty, that after many humble submissions they were able to appease her.

America was at this time regarded as the chief source of Philip's power, as well as the most defenceless part of his dominions; and Elizabeth, perceiving that an open breach with that monarch was unavoidable, resolved not to leave him unmolested in that quarter. The success of the Spaniards and Portuguese in both the East and West Indies had excited a spirit of emulation in England; and as the progress of commerce, still more that of colonies,

(c) This nobleman, whom the weak partiality of his mistress had long distinguished above all her courtiers, did not possess that courage, talent, wisdom, or integrity, necessary for the proper exercise of his new employment. He was neither a gallant soldier nor an expert commander; his political knowledge was very imperfect, and his moral character was despicable. He was arrogant, obstinate, and rapacious; faithless, vindictive, and inhuman; and as he was the only bad choice which Elizabeth had made for any considerable employment, men naturally believed that she had here been influenced by an affection still more partial than that of mere friendship. Such was the individual whom the wisest princess of the age commissioned to rescue a new republic from the ruin with which it was threatened by a prince of such extraordinary power and resources as Philip.

DEATH OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

is slow and gradual, it was happy that a war in this critical period had opened a more flattering prospect to the ambition of the English, and had tempted them, by the view of sudden and exorbitant profit, to engage in naval enterprizes. A fleet of twenty sail was equipped to attack the Spaniards in the West Indies: two thousand three hundred volunteers, besides seamen, engaged on board of it; sir Francis Drake was appointed admiral; Christopher Carlisle commander of the land forces. They took St. Jago, near Cape Verde, by surprize, in January, 1586; and found in it plenty of provisions, but no riches. They then sailed to Hispaniola; and easily making themselves master of St. Domingo by assault, obliged the inhabitants to ransom their houses by a sum of money. Carthagena fell next into their hands after some resistance, and was treated in the same manner. They burned St. Anthony and St. Helens, two towns on the coast of Florida. Then sailing along the coast of Virginia, they found the small remains of a colony which had been planted there by sir Walter Raleigh, and which had fallen greatly to decay. This was the first attempt of the English to form such settlements; and though they have since surpassed all European nations, both in the situation of their colonies and in the noble principles of liberty and industry, on which they are founded, they had here been so unsuccessful, that the miserable planters abandoned their settlements, and prevailed on Drake to carry them with him to England. He returned with so much riches (which were estimated at sixty thousand pounds sterling, exclusive of artillery and military stores,) as encouraged the volunteers, and with such accounts of the Spanish weakness in those countries, as served extremely to inflame the spirits of the nation to future enterprizes. The great mortality which the climate had produced in his fleet was, as is usual, but a feeble restraint on the avidity and sanguine hopes of young adventurers. It is thought that Drake's fleet first introduced the use of tobacco into England.

The enterprizes of Leicester were much less successful than those of Drake. He gained indeed at first some advantage in an action against the Spaniards; and as the Spanish troops had invested Grave, the earl detached count Hohenlohe and sir John Norris to the relief of the place; these officers found means to introduce such succours into it, as would have enabled the besieged to make a long and vigorous defence, if the pusilanimity of the governor, Van Hemert, had not prompted him to a premature capitulation, after a very feeble resistance; and being tried by a court martial for his conduct, he suffered a capital punishment from their sentence. The prince of Parma next undertook the siege of Venlo on the Maese, which was surrendered to him after a brave resistance. The fate of Nuys was more dismal; being taken by assault while the garrison was treating of a capitulation. Rhimberg, which was garrisoned by twelve hundred English, under the command of colonel Morgan, was afterwards besieged by the Spaniards; and Leicester, thinking himself too weak to attempt raising the siege, endeavoured to draw off the prince of Parma by forming another enterprize. He first attacked Doesburg, which he succeeded in taking: he then sat down before Zutphen, which the Spanish general thought so important a fortress that he hastened to its relief. He made the marquis of Guesto advance with a convoy, which he intended to throw into the place. They were favoured by a fog; but falling by accident on a body of English cavalry, a furious action ensued, in which the Spaniards were worsted, and the marquis of Gonzaga, an Italian nobleman of great reputation and family, was slain. The pursuit was stopped by the advance of the prince of Parma (who had raised the siege of Rhinberg) with the main body of the Spanish army; and the English cavalry, on their return from the field, found their advantage more than compensated by the loss of sir Philip Sidney, who, being mortally wounded in the action, was carried off by the soldiers, and soon after died (d).

The earl of Leicester, being unable to prevent the Spaniards from relieving Zutphen, though he made himself master of several of their forts in the neighbourhood, left garrisons in the nearest towns to block it up during the winter, and retired to the Hague, where the discontent of the States evinced itself in complaints of his conduct. Thus we perceive that the English, though a long peace had deprived them of all experience, were strongly possessed of military genius; and the advantages gained by the prince of Parma were not attributed to the superior bravery and discipline of the Spaniards, but solely to the want of military abilities in Leicester. At the end of the campaign the States applied to Leicester for a redress of all their grievances. But he answered their expostulations with plausible professions of his attention to their interests; and without giving them any farther satisfaction, departed, at the commencement of winter, for England.

The queen, while she provoked so powerful an enemy as the king of Spain, was not forgetful to secure herself on the side of Scotland; and she endeavoured both to cultivate the friendship and alliance of her kinsman, James, and to remove all grounds of quarrel between them. An attempt which she had made some time before was not well calculated to gain the confidence of that prince. She had dispatched Edward Wotton as her ambassador to Scotland; but though she gave him private instructions with regard to her affairs, she informed James, that when she had any political business to discuss with him, she would employ another minister; that this man was not fitted for serious negociations; and that her chief purpose in sending him, was to entertain the king with witty and facetious conversation, and to partake without reserve of his pleasures and amusements (e). He was admitted into all the pleasures of the king; made himself master of his secrets; and had so much the more authority with him in political transactions, as he did not seem to pay the least attention to these matters. The Scottish ministers, who observed the growing interest of this man, endeavoured to acquire his friendship; and sacrificed to his intrigues the most essential interests of their master. Elizabeth's usual jealousies with regard to her heirs began now to be levelled against James; and as that prince had attained the years proper for marriage, she was apprehensive lest, by being strengthened with children and alliances, he should acquire greater interest and authority with her English subjects. She directed Wotton to form a secret concert with some Scottish noblemen, and to procure their promise that James, during three years, should not on any account be permitted to marry. In consequence of this view, they endeavoured to embroil him with the king of Denmark, who had sent ambassadors to Scotland on pretence of demanding restitution of the Orkneys, but really with a view of opening a proposal of marriage between James and his daughter. Wotton is said to have employed his intrigues to purposes still more dangerous. He formed, it is pretended, a conspiracy with some malcontents, to seize the person of the king, and to deliver him into the hands of Elizabeth, who would probably have denied all concurrence in the design, but would have been sure to retain him in perpetual thraldom, if not captivity. The conspiracy was detected, and Wotton retired hastily from Scotland, without taking leave of the king.

As James's situation obliged him to dissemble his resentment of this traitorous attempt, and his natural temper inclined him soon to forgive and forget it, the queen found no difficulty in renewing the negociations for a strict alliance between Scotland and England; and the more effectually to gain the prince's friendship, she granted him a pension equivalent to his claim on the inheritance of his grandmother, the countess of Lenox, lately deceased.

(d) Sir Philip Sidney is described by the writers of that age as the most perfect model of an accomplished gentleman that could be formed even by the wanton imagination of poetry or fiction. Virtuous conduct, polite conversation, heroic valour, and elegant erudition, all concurred to render him the ornament and delight of the English court; and as the credit which he possessed with the queen and the earl of Leicester, was wholly employed in the encouragement of genius and literature, his praises have been transmitted with advantage to posterity. No person was so low as not to become an object of his humanity. After this last action, while he was lying on the field mangled with wounds, a bottle of water was brought him to relieve his thirst; but observing a soldier near him in a like miserable condition, he said, "This man's necessity is still greater than mine;" and resigned to him the bottle of water. The king of Scots, struck with admiration of Sidney's virtue, celebrated his memory in a copy of Latin verses, which he composed on the death of that young hero.

(e) Wotton was master of profound dissimulation, and knew how to cover, under the appearance of a careless gaiety, the deepest designs and most dangerous artifices. When but a youth of twenty, he had been employed by his uncle, Dr. Wotton, ambassador in France during the reign of Mary, to ensnare the constable, Montmorency; and had not his purpose been frustrated by pure accident, his cunning had prevailed over all the caution and experience of that aged minister. It is no wonder that, after years had improved him in all the arts of deceit, he should gain an ascendant over a young prince of so open and unguarded a temper as James; especially when the queen's recommendation prepared the way for his reception.

ceased. A league was formed between Elizabeth and James, for the mutual defence of their dominions, and of their religion, now menaced by the open combination of all the Catholic powers of Europe. It was stipulated, that if Elizabeth were invaded, James should aid her with a body of two thousand horse and five thousand infantry; that Elizabeth, in a like case, should send to his assistance three thousand horse and six thousand infantry; that the charges of these armies should be defrayed by the prince who demanded assistance; that if the invasion should be made upon England, within sixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, this latter kingdom should march its whole force to the assistance of the former; and that the present league should supersede all former alliances of either state with any foreign kingdom, so far as religion was concerned.

By this league James secured himself against all attempts from abroad, opened a way for acquiring the confidence and affections of the English, and might entertain some prospect of domestic tranquillity, which, while he lived on bad terms with Elizabeth, he could never expect long to enjoy. Besides the turbulent disposition and inveterate feuds of the nobility, ancient maladies of the Scottish government, the spirit of fanaticism had introduced a new and dangerous disorder. The insolence of some of the preachers, who triumphed in their dominion over the populace, had at this time reached an extreme height; and they carried their arrogance so far, not only against the king, but against the whole civil power, as to excommunicate the archbishop of St. Andrews, because he had been active in parliament for promoting a law which restrained their seditious sermons: nor could that prelate save himself by any expedient from this terrible sentence, but by renouncing all pretensions to ecclesiastical authority. One Gibson said in the pulpit, that captain James Stuart (meaning the late earl of Arran) and his wife Jezebel had been deemed the chief persecutors of the church; but it was now seen that the king himself was the great offender: and for this crime the preacher denounced against him the curse which fell on Jeroboam, that he should die childless, and be the last of his race (f).

The dangers which arose from the character, principles, and pretensions of the queen of Scots, had very early engaged Elizabeth to consult, in her treatment of that unfortunate princess, the dictates of jealousy and politics, rather than of friendship or generosity: resentment of this usage had pushed Mary into enterprizes which had nearly threatened the repose and authority of Elizabeth: the rigour and restraint, thence redoubled upon the captive queen, still impelled her to attempt greater extremities; and while her impatience of confinement, her revenge (g), and her high spirit, concurred with religious zeal, and the suggestions of desperate bigots, she was at last engaged in designs which afforded her enemies, who watched the opportunity, a pretence or reason for effecting her final destruction.

The English seminary for the education of popish priests at Rheims had wrought themselves up to a high pitch of rage and animosity against Elizabeth. Intoxicated with admiration of the divine power and infallibility of the pope, they revered his bull, by which he excommunicated and deposed the queen; and some of them even asserted, that that performance had been immediately dictated by the Holy Ghost. The assassination of heretical sovereigns, and of that princess in particular, was represented as so far from being criminal, that it was the most meritorious of all enterprizes; and they taught that whoever perished in such pious attempts, enjoyed without dispute the glorious and never-fading crown of martyrdom; and they declared that it would ensure the perpetrator a plenary remission of his sins, and the crown of eternal glory in the regions of the blessed. By such doctrines they instigated John Savage, a man of desperate courage, who had served some years in the Low Countries under the prince of Parma, to attempt the life of Elizabeth; and this assassin having made a vow to persevere in his design, was sent over to England, and recommended to the confidence of the more zealous Catholics.

About the same time, John Ballard, another priest of the same seminary, had returned to Paris from his mission in England and Scotland; and as he had observed a spirit of mutiny and rebellion to be prevalent among the Catholic devotees in these countries, he had founded on that disposition, the project of dethroning Elizabeth, and of restoring by force of arms the exercise of the ancient religion. The situation of affairs abroad seemed favourable to this project: the pope, the Spaniard, the duke of Guise, concurring in interests, had formed a resolution to make some attempt against England: and Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador at Paris, strongly encouraged Ballard to hope for succours from these princes. Charles Paget alone, a zealous Catholic, and a devoted partizan and principal agent of the queen of Scots, being well acquainted with the prudence, vigour, and general popularity of Elizabeth, always maintained that so long as that princess was permitted to live, it was in vain to expect any success from an enterprize upon England; he therefore said, that the first step ought to be the assassination of that princess. Ballard, persuaded of this truth, saw more clearly the necessity of executing the design formed at Rheims: he came over to England in the disguise of a soldier, and assumed the name of captain Fortescue; and he bent his endeavours to effect at once the project of an assassination, an insurrection, and an invasion.

The first person to whom he addressed himself was Anthony Babington, of Dethic, in the county of Derby (h). Being zealously devoted to the communion of the church of Rome, he had secretly made a journey to Paris some time before; and had fallen into intimacy with Thomas Morgan, a bigoted fugitive from England, and with the bishop of Glasgow, Mary's ambassador at the court of (f) The secretary, Thirlstone, perceiving the king so much molested with the refractory disposition of the clergy, advised him to leave them to their own courses: for that in a short time they would become so intolerable, that the people would rise against them, and drive them out of the country. "True," replied the king: "If I purposed to undo the church and religion, your counsel were good: but my intention is to maintain both; therefore cannot I suffer the clergy to follow such a conduct, as will in the end bring religion into contempt and derision."—Spotswood, p. 348.

(g) Mary's extreme animosity against Elizabeth may easily be conceived, and it broke out about this time in an incident which may appear curious. While the former queen was kept in custody by the earl of Shrewsbury, she lived during a long time in great intimacy with the countess; but that lady entertaining a jealousy of an amour between her and the earl, their friendship was converted into enmity; and Mary took a method of revenge, which at once gratified her spite against the countess and that against Elizabeth. She wrote to the queen, informing her of all the malicious and scandalous stories which, she said, the countess of Shrewsbury had reported of her: that Elizabeth had given a promise of marriage to a certain person, whom she afterwards often admitted to her bed: that she had been equally indulgent to Simier the French agent, and to the duke of Anjou: that Hatton was also one of her paramours, who was even disgusted with her excessive love and fondness: that though she was, on other occasions, avaricious to the last degree, as well as ungrateful, and kind to very few, she spared no expence in gratifying her amorous passions: that notwithstanding her licentious amours, she was not made like other women; and all those who courted her marriage would in the end be disappointed: that she was so conceited of her beauty, as to swallow the most extravagant flattery from her courtiers, who could not, on these occasions, forbear even sneering at her for her folly: that it was usual for them to tell her, that the lustre of her beauty dazzled them like that of the sun, and they could not behold it with a fixed eye: she added, that the countess had said, that Mary's best policy would be to engage her son to make love to the queen; nor was there any danger that such a proposal would be taken for mockery; so ridiculous was the opinion which she had entertained of her own charms. She pretended that the countess had represented her as no less odious in her temper than profligate in her manners, and absurd in her vanity: that she had so beaten a young woman of the name of Scudamore as to break that lady's finger; and in order to cover over the matter, it was pretended that the accident had proceeded from the fall of a candlestick: that she had cut another across the hand with a knife, who had been so unfortunate as to offend her. Mary added, that the countess had informed her, that Elizabeth had suborned Rolstone to pretend friendship to her, in order to debauch her, and thereby throw infamy on her rival. See Murden's State Papers, p. 558. This imprudent and malicious letter was written a very little before the detection of Mary's conspiracy; and contributed, no doubt, to render the proceedings against her the more rigorous. How far all these imputations against Elizabeth can be credited, may perhaps appear doubtful: but her extreme fondness for Leicester, Hatton, and Essex, not to mention Mountjoy and others, with the curious passages between her and admiral Seymour, contained in Haynes, render her chastity very much to be suspected. Her self-conceit with regard to beauty, we know from other undoubted authority to have been extravagant. Even when she was a very old woman, she allowed her courtiers to flatter her with regard to her excellent beauties.—Birch, vol. ii. p. 442, 443. Her passionate temper may also be proved from many lively instances; and it was not unusual with her to beat her maids of honour. See the Sydney Papers, vol. ii. p. 38. The blow she gave to Essex before the privy council is another instance. There remains in the Museum a letter of the earl of Huntingdon's, in which he complains grievously of the queen's pinching his wife very sorely, on account of some quarrel between them. Had this princess been born in a private station, she would not have been very amiable: but her absolute authority, at the same time that it gave an uncontrolling swing to her violent passions, enabled her to compensate her infirmities by many great and signal virtues.

(h) This young gentleman was of a good family, possessed a plentiful fortune, had discovered an excellent capacity, and was accomplished in literature beyond most of his years or station.

France,

France. By continually extolling the amiable accomplishments and heroical virtues of that princess, they impelled the sanguine and unguarded mind of young Babington to make some attempt for her service; and they employed every principle of ambition, gallantry, and religious zeal, to give him a contempt of those dangers which attended any enterprize against the vigilant government of Elizabeth. Finding this man well disposed for their purpose, they sent him back to England, and secretly, unknown to himself, recommended him to the queen of Scots, as a person worth engaging in her service. She wrote him a letter full of friendship and confidence; and Babington thought that these advances now bound him in honour to devote himself entirely to the service of that unfortunate princess. During some time, he had found means of conveying to her all her foreign correspondence; but after she was placed under the custody of sir Amias Paulet, and reduced to a more rigorous confinement, he experienced so much difficulty and danger in rendering her this service, that he had desisted from every attempt of that nature.

When Ballard began to open the intentions of the Catholics to Babington, he found his zeal suspended, not extinguished: his former ardour revived on the mention of any enterprize which seemed to promise success in the cause of Mary and of the Catholic faith: but with respect to the invasion, he expressed an opinion similar to that of Paget, and represented the folly of all attempts which, during the life-time of Elizabeth, could be formed against the established religion and government of England. Ballard, encouraged by this hint, proceeded to discover to him the design undertaken by Savage; informing him that Savage had bound himself by a vow to the execution of the desired murder; and was well pleased to observe that, instead of being shocked with the project, Babington only thought it not secure enough, when entrusted to one single hand, and proposed to join five others with Savage in this desperate and villainous enterprize. In prosecution of these views, Babington employed himself in increasing the number of his associates; and he secretly drew into the conspiracy Edward, brother to the lord Windsor, who readily promised his concurrence, and many Catholic gentlemen who were discontented with the present government. Barnwel, of a noble family in Ireland, Charnoc, a gentleman of Lancashire, and Abingdon, whose father had been cofferer to the household, readily undertook the assassination of the queen. Charles Tilney, the heir of an ancient family, and Tichbourne of Southampton, when the design was proposed to them, expressed some scruples, which were removed by the arguments of Babington and Ballard. Savage alone refused during some time to share the glory of the enterprize with any others; he challenged the whole to himself; and it was with some difficulty he was induced to depart from this preposterous resolution.

The deliverance of the queen of Scots at the very same instant when Elizabeth should be assassinated, was requisite for effecting the purpose of the conspirators; and Babington undertook, with a party of a hundred horse, to attack her guards while she should be taking the air on horseback. In this enterprize he engaged Edward Windsor, brother to the lord of that name, Thomas Salisbury, Robert Gage, John Travers, John Jones, and Henry Donne; most of them men of family and interest. The conspirators much wanted, but could not find, any nobleman of note whom they might place at the head of their association, but they trusted that the great events of the queen's death and Mary's deliverance, would rouse all the zealous Catholics to arms; and that foreign forces, taking advantage of the general confusion, would easily fix the queen of Scots on the throne of England, and re-establish the ancient religion.

These desperate projects, however, had not escaped the vigilance of Elizabeth's council, particularly of sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state, who was an able, artful, and vigilant minister. He had engaged Maud, a Catholic priest, whom he retained in pay, to attend Ballard in his journey to France, and act as a spy upon his actions; by this means he got a hint of the designs entertained by the fugitives. Polly, another of his spies, had insinuated himself among the conspirators in England; he procured admission to the private meetings of Babington, Savage, and others; and though not entirely trusted, had obtained some insight into their dangerous secrets. Sir Francis was thus gratified with an opportunity of discerning the progress of the plot, and of crushing it before the measures were perfectly ripe for execution. But the bottom of the conspiracy was never fully known till Gilbert Gifford, a seminary priest, came over, and made a tender of his services to Walsingham. By his means the discovery became of the utmost importance, and involved the fate of Mary as well as of those zealous partizans of that princess.

Babington and his associates, having laid such a plan as they thought promised infallible success, were impatient to communicate the design to the queen of Scots, and to obtain her approbation and concurrence. For this service they employed Gifford, who immediately applied to Walsingham, that the interest of that minister might forward his secret correspondence with Mary. Walsingham proposed the matter to Paulet, and desired him to connive at Gifford's corrupting one of his servants: but Paulet, averse to the introducing of such a pernicious precedent into his family, desired that they would rather think of some other expedient. Gifford found a brewer who supplied the family with ale; and bribed him to convey letters to the captive queen. The letters, by Paulet's connivance, were thrust through a chink in the wall; and answers were returned by the same conveyance.

Ballard and Babington were at first diffident of Gifford's fidelity; and to make trial of him, they gave him only blank papers made up like letters: but finding by the answers that these had been faithfully delivered, they laid aside all further scruple, and conveyed by his hands the most criminal and dangerous parts of their conspiracy. Babington informed Mary of the design laid for a foreign invasion, the plan of an insurrection at home, the scheme for her deliverance, and the conspiracy for assassinating the usurper, by six noble gentlemen, as he termed them, all of them his private friends; who, from the zeal which they bore to the Catholic cause, and her majesty's service, would undertake the tragical execution. Mary replied, "that she approved highly of the design; that the gentlemen might expect all the rewards which it should ever be in her power to confer; and that the death of Elizabeth was a necessary circumstance, before any attempts were made, either for her own deliverance or an insurrection." These letters, with others to Mendoza, Charles Paget, the archbishop of Glasgow, and sir Francis Inglefield, were carried by Gifford to secretary Walsingham; were decyphered by the art of Philips, his clerk, and copies taken of them. Walsingham employed another artifice in order to obtain full insight into the plot: he subjoined to a letter of Mary's a postscript in the same cypher; in which he made her desire Babington to inform her of the names of the conspirators. The indiscretion of Babington furnished Walsingham with still another means of detection as well as of defence. That gentleman had caused a picture to be drawn, where he himself was represented standing amidst the six assassins; and a motto was subjoined, expressing that their common perils were the band of their confederacy. A copy of this picture was brought to Elizabeth, that she might know the assassins, and guard herself against their approach to her person.

Meanwhile, Babington, anxious to insure and hasten the foreign succours, resolved to dispatch Ballard into France; and he procured for him, under a feigned name, a licence to travel. In order to remove from himself all suspicion, he applied to Walsingham, pretended great zeal for the queen's service, offered to go abroad, and professed his intentions of employing the confidence which he had gained among the Catholics, to the detection and disappointment of their conspiracies. Walsingham commended his loyal purposes; and promising his own counsel and assistance in the execution of them, still fed him with hopes, and maintained a close correspondence with him. A warrant was, in the mean time, issued for the apprehension of Ballard; and this incident, joined to the consciousness of guilt, begat in all the conspirators the utmost anxiety. Some advised that they should immediately make their escape: others proposed that Savage and Charnock should without delay execute their purpose against Elizabeth; and Babington, in prosecution of this scheme, furnished Savage with money, that he might buy good cloaths, and thereby have more easy access to the queen's person. Next day they began to apprehend that they had taken the alarm too hastily; and Babington, having renewed his correspondence with Walsingham, was persuaded by that subtle minister, that the seizure of Ballard had proceeded entirely from the usual diligence of informers in the detection of popish and seminary priests.

He

He then importuned Walsingham for a licence to travel, as well as for the release of Ballard, who, he said, might be useful to him in his attempts for the discovery of sinister machinations against Elizabeth. The wary secretary made fair promises, and even persuaded Babington to take a temporary residence in his house, that they might have more frequent conferences together, on the subject of his intended voyage, before his departure for France: but observing that he was watched and guarded, he made his escape, and gave the alarm to the other conspirators. They all took to flight, covered themselves with different disguises, and lay concealed in woods or barns; but were soon discovered, and thrown into prison. In their examinations they contradicted each other; and the leaders, uninfluenced by the fear of torture, or by the hope of mercy, made a full confession of their guilt. Babington, Savage, Ballard, and four others, were hanged, in September, 1586, cut down alive, drawn, and quartered; but the seven remaining criminals were suffered to hang till they expired. The first seven acknowledged the crime on their trial; the rest were convicted by evidence.

The traitorous and sanguinary intentions of these conspirators excited such horror among the loyal subjects of Elizabeth, that their fate was little lamented, though some of them were distinguished by such qualities and accomplishments as would, if undebased by a barbarous superstition, have entitled them to the esteem of mankind. The emissaries of the ministry studiously represented the Scottish queen as the encourager of the plot which had been so fortunately discovered, and took advantage of the public clamour against Babington and his comrades, to propagate among the multitude a zealous desire of the execution of the queen of Scots. Stimulated by the fervour of loyalty, more than by the suggestions of humanity, the people adopted the vindictive passions of their sovereign, and loudly called for the accomplishment of the grand purpose for which the solemn association in defence of Elizabeth, or rather against Mary, had been formed.

Pleased with the obsequious disposition which the nation at this time exhibited, Elizabeth prepared for the final gratification of her policy and revenge. From her elevated notions of the majesty of independent sovereigns, she must have been conscious of a want of right to exercise any authority or jurisdiction over a princess, who, though deposed by a rebellious faction, and detained a prisoner in the country to which she had fled for refuge, was still a rightful queen. Notwithstanding the influence which this consideration ought to have had over her mind, she resolved to treat her captive as a subject, and to proceed against her by the laws of a kingdom in which she had received no other protection than that of a prison. She had never forgiven Mary's assumption of the English arms and title; a claim which had constantly filled her with as strong apprehensions of dethronement as the most notorious usurper could ever have entertained, though she knew that her title was supported by valid grounds, acknowledged by the whole body of her subjects, except a very small proportion, and confirmed by the strong ties of public affection. In her violent jealousy of a competitor, she resembled her grandfather Henry the Seventh; and to the terrors arising from this source we may refer the foundation of that rancour which she cherished against Mary. The rivalry of personal accomplishments contributed to the increase of the animosity which she bore to that princess; and the desire of rendering the Scottish nation subservient to her nod, prompted her not only to take every step that could prevent Mary from enjoying her throne in peace, but to deprive her, after she had entered England, of all prospect of re-establishment. From the injuries which she had heaped on her rival, she was aware that a lively resentment must have arisen in the breast of the persecuted queen, and that her Catholic friends, indignant at her sufferings, would be more zealous in her service, and more eager to attempt her rescue. These reflections gave additional force to Elizabeth's fears of revolt, and stimulated her malignity to the adoption of the most decisive measures for securing herself from the intrigues of Mary and her partizans. The effusion of her prisoner's blood appeared to her to be the most effectual for that purpose, though she might have provided for her tranquillity in a more humane and honourable manner, by a friendly and generous treatment of Mary, and by an equitable accommodation of all differences between them, than by the continued exercise of merciless power, evinced in the infliction of a long and severe imprisonment, or by the final subjection of her nearest relative to the horrors of a violent and ignominious death. In urging Elizabeth to the ultimate stroke of vengeance, her attachment to the Protestant faith, strengthened by the remonstrances of her ministers, who covered, under the alarms of Popery, their fears of the personal danger that might result to them from Mary's succession, may have had some influence, though a less forcible one than that which arose from her intemperate passions.

The lesser conspirators being dispatched, measures were now taken for the trial and conviction of the queen of Scots, on whose account, and with whose concurrence these attempts had been made against the life of Elizabeth, and the tranquillity of the kingdom. Some of the queen's counsellors were averse to this proceedure; and thought that the close confinement of a woman who was become very sickly, and who would probably put a speedy termination to their anxiety by her natural death, might give sufficient security to the government, without attempting a measure of which there scarcely remains any example in history. Leicester advised that Mary should be secretly taken off by poison, and he sent a divine to convince Walsingham of the lawfulness of that action: but Walsingham declared his abhorrence of this infamous proposition; and still insisted, in conjunction with the majority of the counsellors, for the open trial of the queen of Scots, on the charge of having violated that statute which, about two years before, had been enacted in confirmation of the confederacy for the defence of Elizabeth. The situation of England, and of the English ministers, had, indeed, been hitherto not a little dangerous. No successor of the crown was declared; but the heir of blood, to whom the people in general were likely to adhere, was, by education, an enemy to the national religion; was, from multiplied provocations, an enemy to the ministers and principal nobility; and their personal safety, as well as the security of the public, seemed to depend alone on the queen's life, who was now somewhat advanced in years. No wonder, therefore, that Elizabeth's counsellors, knowing themselves to be so noxious to the queen of Scots, endeavoured to push every measure to extremities against her; and were even more anxious than the queen herself, to prevent her from ever ascending the throne of England.

Though all England was acquainted with the detection of Babington's conspiracy, every avenue to the queen of Scots had been so strictly guarded, that she remained in utter ignorance of the matter; and it was a great surprize to her, when sir Thomas Gorges, by Elizabeth's orders, informed her, that all her accomplices were discovered and arrested. He chose the time for giving her this intelligence when she was mounted on horseback to go a hunting; and she was not permitted to return to her former place of abode, but was conducted from one gentleman's house to another, till she was lodged in Fotheringay castle, in the county of Northampton, which it was determined to make the last stage of her trial and sufferings. Her two secretaries, Nau, a Frenchman, and Curle, a Scot, were immediately arrested, and committed to the care of different keepers, that they might have no communication with each other. All Mary's papers were seized, and sent up to the council: about sixty different keys to cyphers were discovered: there were also found many letters from persons beyond sea, and several too from English noblemen, containing expressions of respect and attachment (i). The queen took no notice of this latter discovery; but the persons themselves, knowing their correspondence to be detected, thought that they had no other means of making atonement for their imprudence, than by declaring themselves thenceforth the most inveterate enemies of the queen of Scots.

It was now resolved to try Mary, not by the common statute of treasons, but by the act which had passed the former year, with the view to this very event; and the queen, in terms of that act, appointed a commission, consisting of forty-one peers and privy-counsellors, and five of the judges of her courts, whom she empowered to examine into the guilt of Mary, who was styled in the commission, "the daughter and heiress of James V. late king of Scots, commonly called queen of Scots and dowager of France." The commissioners came to Fotheringay castle, and sent to her sir Walter Mildmay, sir Amias Paulet, and Edward Barker, who delivered her a letter from Elizabeth, on the 12th of October, expressing her displeasure and indignation at the criminal machinations of Mary; intimating that a due regard to her own safety, and to the tranquillity of her realm, had compelled her to institute a public inquiry into her conduct, and requiring her to submit to a trial before those commissioners who were authorized to take cognizance of her crimes, according to the laws of England, under the protection of which she had so long lived. This arrogant epistle surprized, but did not disconcert the Scottish queen, who, with an air of dignified composure, observed to her visitants, "That it seemed strange to her, that the queen should command her, as a subject, to submit to a trial and examination before subjects: that she was an absolute independent princess, and would yield to nothing which might derogate either from her royal majesty, from the state of sovereign princes, or from the dignity and rank of her son: that, however oppressed by misfortunes, she was not yet so much broken in spirit as her enemies flattered themselves; nor would she, on any account, be accessary to her own degradation and dishonour: that she was ignorant of the laws and statutes of England; was utterly destitute of council; and could not conceive who were entitled to be called her peers, or could legally sit as judges on her trial: that though she had lived in England for many years, she had lived in captivity; and not having received the protection of the laws, she could not, merely by her involuntary residence in the country, be supposed to have subjected herself to their jurisdiction: that, notwithstanding the superiority of her rank, she was willing to give an account of her conduct before an English parliament; but could not view these commissioners in any other light than as men appointed to justify, by some colour of legal proceeding, her condemnation and execution: and that she warned them to look to their conscience and their character, in trying an innocent person; and to reflect, that these transactions would somewhere be subject to revisal, and that the theatre of the whole world was much wider than the kingdom of England."

In return, the commissioners (k) sent a new deputation, informing her that her plea, either from her royal dignity, or from her imprisonment, could not be admitted; and that they were empowered to proceed to her trial, even though she should refuse to answer before them. Burleigh the treasurer, and Bromley the chancellor, employed much reasoning to make her submit; but the person whose arguments had the chief influence was sir Christopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain. His speech was to this effect: "You are accused, madam," said he, "but not condemned, of having conspired the destruction of our lady and queen anointed. You say you are a queen: but in such a crime as this, and such a situation as yours, the royal dignity itself, neither by the civil or canon law, nor by the law of nature or of nations, is exempt from judgement. If you be innocent, you wrong your reputation in avoiding a trial. We have been present at your protestations of innocence: but queen Elizabeth thinks otherwise; and is heartily sorry for the appearances which lie against you. To examine, therefore, your cause, she has appointed commissioners; honourable persons, prudent and upright men, who are ready to hear you with equity, and even with favour, and will rejoice if you can clear yourself of the imputations which have been thrown upon you. Believe me, madam, the queen herself will rejoice, who affirmed to me at my departure, that nothing which ever befel her had given her so much uneasiness, as that you should be suspected of a concurrence in these criminal enterprizes. Laying aside, therefore, the fruitless claim of privilege from your royal dignity, which can now avail you nothing, trust to the better defence of your innocence, make it appear in open trial, and leave not upon your memory that stain of infamy which must attend your obstinate silence on this occasion."

By this artful speech Mary was persuaded to answer before the court; and thereby gave an appearance of legal procedure to the trial, and prevented those difficulties which the commissioners must have fallen into, had she persevered in maintaining so specious a plea as that of her sovereign and independent character. Her conduct in this particular must be regarded as the more imprudent; because formerly, when Elizabeth's commissioners pretended not to exercise any jurisdiction over her, and only entered into her cause by her own consent and approbation, she declined justifying herself, when her honour, which ought to have been dearer to her than life, seemed absolutely to require it.

On her first appearance before the commissioners, who met in the hall of Fotheringay castle on the 14th of October, Mary, either sensible of her imprudence, or still unwilling to degrade herself by submitting to a trial, renewed her protestation against the authority of her judges: the chancellor answered her by pleading the supreme authority of the English laws over every one who resided in England: and the commissioners accommodated matters, by ordering both her protestation and his answer to be recorded.

The lawyers of the crown then opened the charge against the queen of Scots. They proved, by intercepted letters, that she had allowed cardinal Allen and others to treat her as queen of England; and that she had kept a correspondence with lord Paget and Charles Paget, in view of engaging the Spaniards to invade the kingdom. Mary seemed not anxious to clear herself from either of these imputations. She only said, that she could not hinder others from using what style they pleased in writing to her; and that she might lawfully try every expedient for the recovery of her liberty.

An intercepted letter of her's to Mendoza was next produced; in which she promised to transfer to Philip her right to the kingdom of England, if her son should refuse to be converted to the Catholic faith, an event, she there said, of which there was no expectation while he remained in the hands of his Scottish subjects (l). Even this part of the charge she took no pains to deny, or rather she seemed to acknowledge it. She said, that she had no kingdoms to dispose of; yet was it lawful for her to give at her pleasure what was her own, and she was not accountable to any for her actions. She added, that she had formerly rejected that proposal from Spain; but now, since all her hopes in England were gone, she was fully determined not to refuse foreign assistance. There was also produced evidence to prove, that Allen and Parsons were at that very time negociating by her orders at Rome the conditions of transferring the English crown to the king of Spain, and of disinheriting her heretical son (m).

It is remarkable, that Mary's prejudices against her son were at this time carried so far, that she had even entered into a conspiracy against him, had appointed lord Claud Hamilton regent of Scotland, and had instigated her adherents to seize James's person, and to deliver him into the hands of the pope, or the king of Spain; whence he was never to be delivered, but on condition of his becoming Catholic (n).

(k) The commissioners appointed for the trial of Mary were, John Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury; sir Thomas Bromley, lord chancellor; William Cecil, baron Burleigh, lord treasurer; the marquis of Winchester; the earls of Oxford, Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Warwick, Pembroke, Leicester, and Lincoln; the viscount Montacute; the barons Howard, Hunsdon, Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Cobham, Stafford, Grey of Wilton, Lumley, Stourton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordaunt, St. John of Bletnesho, Buckhurst, Compton, and Cheyne; sir Francis Knolles, sir James Croft, sir Christopher Hatton, sir Francis Walsingham, William Davison, sir Ralph Sadler, sir Walter Mildmay, sir Amias Paulet, and John Wolley, privy counsellors; the judges Wray, Anderson, Manwood, Gawdy, and Periam.

(l) State Trials, vol. i. p. 138.

(m) This evidence was that of Curle, her secretary, whom she allowed to be a very honest man; and who, as well as Nau, had given proofs of his integrity, by keeping so long such important secrets, from the discovery of which he could have reaped the greatest profit. Mary, after all, thought that she had so little reason to complain of Curle's evidence, that she took care to have him paid a considerable sum by her will, which she wrote the day before her death. Neither did she forget Nau, though less satisfied in other respects with his conduct.

(n) The detail of this conspiracy is to be found in a letter of the queen of Scots to Charles Paget, her great confident. This letter is dated May 20, 1586, and is contained in Dr. Forbes's manuscript collections. It is a copy attested by Curle, Mary's secretary, and indorsed by lord Burleigh. What proves its authenticity beyond question is, that we find in Murden's collection, p. 516, that Mary actually wrote a letter on that day to Charles Paget; and farther, she mentions in the manuscript letter, a letter of Charles Paget's of the 10th of April: now we find by Morden, p. 506, that Charles Paget did actually write her a letter of that date.

This violence of spirit is very consistent with Mary's character. Her maternal affection was too weak to oppose the gratification of her passions, particularly her pride, her ambition, and her bigotry. Her son, having

The only part of the charge which Mary positively denied, was her concurrence in the design of assassinating Elizabeth. But in order to prove the accusation, there were produced the following evidence: copies taken in secretary Walsingham's office of the intercepted letters between her and Babington, in which her approbation of the murder was clearly expressed; the evidence of her two secretaries, Nau and Curle, who had confessed both that she received these letters from Babington, and that they had written the answers by her order; the confession of Babington, that he had written the letters and received the answers (o), and the confession of Ballard and Savage, that Babington had shewed them these letters of Mary written in the cypher, which had been settled between them.

It is evident, that this complication of evidence, though every circumstance corroborates the general conclusion, resolves itself finally into the testimony of the two secretaries, who alone were certainly acquainted with their mistress's concurrence in Babington's conspiracy, but who knew themselves exposed to all the rigours of imprisonment, torture, and death, if they refused to give any evidence which might be required of them. In the case of an ordinary criminal, this proof, with all its disadvantages, would be esteemed legal, and even satisfactory, if not opposed by some other circumstances which shake the credit of the witnesses: but on the present trial, where the absolute power of the prosecutor concurred with such important interests, and such a violent inclination to have the princess condemned; the testimony of two witnesses, even though men of character, ought to be supported by strong probabilities, in order to remove all suspicion of tyranny and injustice. The proof against Mary, it must be confessed, is not destitute of this advantage; and it is difficult, if not impossible, to account for Babington's receiving an answer, written in her name, and in the cypher concerted between them, without allowing that the matter had been communicated to that princess. Such is the light in which this matter appears, even after time has discovered every thing which could guide our judgement with regard to it: no wonder, therefore, that the queen of Scots, unassisted by counsel, and confounded by so extraordinary a trial, found herself incapable of making a satisfactory defence before the commissioners. Her reply consisted chiefly in her own denial: whatever force may be in that denial was much weakened, by her positively affirming, that she never had had any correspondence of any kind with Babington; a fact, however, of which there remains not the least question (p). She asserted, "that as Nau and Curle had taken an oath of secrecy and fidelity to her, their evidence against her ought not to be credited." She confessed, however, "that Nau had been in the service of her uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, and had been recommended to her by the king of France, as a man in whom she might safely confide." She also acknowledged Curle to be "a very honest man, but simple, and easily imposed on by Nau. If these two men had received any letters, or had written any answers, without her knowledge, the imputation, she said, could never lie on her. And she was the more inclined, she added, to entertain this suspicion against them, because Nau had, in other instances, been guilty of a like temerity, and had ventured to transact business in her name, without communicating the matter to her."

The sole circumstance of her defence, which to us may appear to have some force, was her requiring that Nau and Curle should be confronted with her, and her affirming, that they never would to her face persist in their evidence. But that demand, however equitable, was not allowed. Perhaps these secretaries were not at Fotheringay castle during the time of the trial, and could not therefore, upon Mary's demand, be produced before the commissioners (q).

There passed two incidents in this trial which may be worth observing. A letter between Mary and Babington was read, in which mention was made of the earl of Arundel and his brothers. On hearing their names, she broke into a sigh; "Alas," said she, "what has the noble house of the Howards suffered for my sake?" She affirmed, with regard to the same letter, that it was easy to forge the hand-writing and cypher of another; she was afraid that this was too familiar a practice with Walsingham, who, she also heard, had frequently practised both against her life and her son's. Walsingham, who was one of the commissioners, rose up. He protested, that in his private capacity he had never acted any thing against the queen of Scots: in his public capacity, he owned, that his concern for his sovereign's safety had made him very diligent in searching out, by every expedient, all designs against her sacred person or authority. For attaining that end, he would not only make use of the assistance of Ballard or any other conspirator; he would also reward them for betraying their companions. But if he had tampered in any manner unbefitting his character and office, why did none of the late criminals, either at their trial or execution, accuse him of such practices? Mary endeavoured to pacify him, by saying that she spoke from information; and she begged him to give thenceforth no more credit to such as slandered her, than she should to such as accused him.

Having finished the trial, the commissioners adjourned from Fotheringay castle, and met in the Star Chamber at Westminster on the 25th of October; where, after taking the oaths of Mary's two secretaries, Nau and Curle, who voluntarily, without hope or reward, vouched the authenticity of those letters before produced, they pronounced sentence of death upon the queen of Scots, and confirmed by their seals and subscriptions. The same day, a declaration was published by the commissioners and the judges, "that the sentence did nowise derogate from the title and honour of James king of Scotland; but that he was in the same place, degree, and right, as if the sentence had never been pronounced."

Elizabeth had now brought affairs with Mary to that situation which she had long desired; and had found a plausible reason for executing vengeance on a competitor, whom from the commencement of her reign she had equally dreaded and hated. But she was restrained from instantly gratifying her resentment, by several important considerations. She foresaw the invidious colours, in which this example of uncommon jurisdiction would be represented by the numerous partizans of Mary, and the reproach to which she herself might be exposed with all foreign princes, perhaps with all posterity. The rights of hospitality, of kindred, and of royal majesty, seemed, in one single instance, to be all violated; and this sacrifice of generosity to interest, of clemency to revenge, might appear equally unbecoming a sovereign and a woman. Elizabeth, therefore, who was an adept in the arts of hypocrisy, pretended the utmost reluctance to proceed to the execution of the sentence pronounced against her made some fruitless attempts to associate her with him in the title, and having found the scheme impracticable, on account of the prejudices of his Protestant subjects, at last desisted from that design, and entered into an alliance with England, without comprehending his mother. She was in such a rage at this undutiful behaviour, as she imagined it, that she wrote to queen Elizabeth, that she no longer cared what became of herself or her son in the world; the greatest satisfaction she could have before her death was, to see him and all his adherents become a signal example of tyranny, ingratitude, and impiety, and undergo the vengeance of God for their wickedness. She cared not, after taking this revenge, what became of her body: the quickest death would then be most agreeable to her. And she assured her that, if he persevered, she would disown him for her son, and would give him her malediction, would disinherit him, as well of his present possessions as of all he could expect by her; abandoning him not only to her subjects to treat him as they had done her, but to all strangers to subdue and conquer him.

James himself said to Courcelles, the French ambassador, that he had seen a letter under her own hand, in which she threatened to disinherit him, and said that he might betake him to the lordship of Darnley; for that was all he had by his father. Courcelles' Letter. There is in Jebb, vol. ii. p. 573, a letter of her's, where she throws out the same menace against him.

This scheme of seizing the king of Scots, and delivering him into the hands of the pope or the king of Spain, was proposed by Morgan to Mary. See Murden, p. 525. Mr. Hume observes, that a mother must be very violent to whom one would dare to make such a proposal: but it seems she assented to it. Was not such a woman, he asks, very capable of murdering her husband, who had so grievously offended her?

(o) State Trials, vol. i. p. 113.

(p) The volume of State Papers collected by Murden proves beyond controversy, that Mary was long in close correspondence with Babington, p. 513, 516, 532, 533. She entertained a like correspondence with Ballard, Morgan, and Charles Paget, and laid a scheme with them for an insurrection, and for the invasion of England by Spain, p. 528, 531. The same papers shew, that there had been a discontinuance of Babington's correspondence, agreeably to Camden's narration. See State Papers, p. 513, where Morgan recommends it to Mary to renew her correspondence with Babington. These circumstances prove, that no weight can be laid on Mary's denial of guilt, and that her correspondence with Babington contained particulars which could not be avowed.

(q) Queen Elizabeth was willing to have allowed Curle and Nau to be produced in the trial, and writes to that purpose to Burleigh and Walsingham, in her letter of the 7th of October, in Forbes's MS. collections. She only says, that she thinks it needless, though she was willing to agree to it. The not confronting of the witnesses was too frequently practised in the age of Elizabeth, kinswoman; affected the most tender sympathy with her prisoner; displayed all her scruples and difficulties; rejected the solicitation of her courtiers and ministers; and affirmed, "that were she not moved by the deepest concern for her people's safety, she would not hesitate a moment in pardoning all the injuries which she herself had received from the queen of Scots."

The queen summoned a new parliament to meet on the 29th of October; and both houses entered with zeal into her views, whose animosity against Mary they knew to be implacable. Moved by an affectation of delicacy, she forbore to open the assembly in person, but appointed for that purpose three commissioners, Bromley the chancellor, Burleigh the treasurer, and the earl of Derby. The reason assigned for this measure was, that the queen, foreseeing that the late sentence against the queen of Scots would be canvassed in parliament, found her tenderness and delicacy so much hurt by that melancholy incident, that she had not the courage to be present while it was under deliberation, but withdrew her eyes from what she could not behold without the utmost reluctance and uneasiness. She was also willing, that by this unusual precaution the people should see the danger to which her person was hourly exposed; and should thence be more strongly incited to take vengeance on the criminal, whose restless intrigues and bloody conspiracies had so long exposed her to the most imminent perils.

The obsequious parliament answered the queen's expectations; and it is remarkable, that the Puritans, who were Elizabeth's only parliamentary opponents, were warm advocates for the utmost severity against the royal victim for whose blood she had so long thirsted. Impelled by servility, by bigotry, and by fear, the lords and commons, with an unanimity which reflects disgrace on their temper, their spirit, their justice, and their humanity, confirmed the sentence which had been pronounced against the queen of Scots by the delegates; and an application was voted to obtain Elizabeth's consent to its publication and execution. In the petition which they presented on this occasion, they mentioned the "dangerous and execrable practices" by which Mary had assailed the life of their sovereign, the tranquillity of the state, and the present happy establishment of the true religion; adverted to the protection which the "princely magnanimity" of Elizabeth had afforded to the Scottish queen from the dangers to which she was exposed from the resentment of her own subjects; reprobated the ingratitude, malice, and barbarity shewn by the latter in conspiring with those abandoned villains who had engaged to assassinate her protectress; declaring that the sentence pronounced against her was, in every respect, "most honourable, just, and lawful;" expressed their firm persuasion, that all the traiterous plots which had, for many years past, been directed against the queen and realm of England, owed their origin to the arts of Mary and her confederates; affirmed, that if that princess should not be brought to justice for her "detestable offences and execrable treasons," the life of Elizabeth would be perpetually insecure, as conspiracies against her would be more frequent, secret, and dangerous; that the only possible means of providing for her own safety would be the execution of the sentence against Mary; and concluded with signifying their opinion, that her neglect of inflicting that doom which the offender deserved, "might procure the heavy displeasure and punishment of Almighty God," and would bring her subjects into utter despair of the continuance of the true religion among them, of the preservation of her life, of their own security, and the good estate of the realm.

To this address Elizabeth gave an answer ambiguous, embarrassed; full of real artifice and seeming irresolution She mentioned the extreme danger to which her life was continually exposed; she declared her willingness to die, did she not foresee the great calamities which would thence fall upon the nation; she made professions of the greatest tenderness to her people; she displayed the clemency of her temper, and expressed her extreme reluctance to execute the sentence against a person of her own sex, of the same dignity, and so nearly allied to her in blood; she affirmed, that the late law, by which that princess was tried, so far from being made to ensnare her, was only intended to give her warning beforehand, not to engage in such attempts as might expose her to the penalties with which she was thus openly menaced; and she begged them to think once again, whether it were possible to find any expedient, besides the death of the queen of Scots, for securing the public tranquillity. The parliament, in obedience to her commands, took the affair again under consideration; but being acquainted with the secret wishes of their sovereign, they could find no other possible expedient. They reiterated their solicitations, and intreaties, and arguments: they even remonstrated, that mercy to the queen of Scots was cruelty to them, her subjects and children: and they affirmed, that it were injustice to deny execution of the law to any individual; much more to the whole body of the people, now unanimously and earnestly suing for this pledge of her parental care and tenderness. This second address set the pretended doubts and scruples of Elizabeth again in agitation: she complained of her own unfortunate situation; expressed her uneasiness from their importunity; renewed the professions of affection to her people; and dismissed the committee of parliament in an uncertainty, what, after all this deliberation, might be her final resolution.

But although the queen affected reluctance to execute the sentence against Mary, she complied with the request of parliament in publishing it by proclamation on the 6th of December; and this act seemed to be attended with the unanimous and hearty rejoicings of the people. Lord Buckhurst, and Beale, clerk of the council, were sent to the queen of Scots, to notify to her the sentence which had been pronounced against her, with its ratification by parliament, and with the earnest applications made for its execution by that assembly, who thought that their religion could never, while she was alive, attain a full settlement and security. Mary was not in the least dismayed at this intelligence: on the contrary, she joyfully laid hold of the last circumstance mentioned to her; and insisted, that since her death was demanded by the Protestants for the establishment of their faith, she was really a martyr to her religion, and was entitled to all the merits attending that glorious character. She added, that the English had often embrued their hands in the blood of their own sovereigns: no wonder they exercised cruelty against her, who derived her descent from those monarchs. Paulet and Drury, her keepers, received orders to take down her canopy of state, and to serve her no longer with the respect due to sovereign princes. He told her that she was now to be considered as a dead person; and incapable of any dignity. This harsh treatment produced not in her any seeming emotion. She replied, that she received her royal character from the hands of the Almighty, and that as no earthly power was ever able to bereave her of it, she would resign it to him alone with her soul; that she neither acknowledged the queen as her superior, nor her heretical ministers and senators as her judges; and that, in spite of their malignity, she would die a queen.

The queen of Scots wrote her last letter to Elizabeth on the 19th of December; full of dignity, without departing from that spirit of meekness and of charity which appeared suitable to this concluding scene of her unfortunate life. She preferred no petition for averting the fatal sentence: on the contrary, she expressed her gratitude to Heaven for thus bringing to a speedy period her sad and lamentable pilgrimage. She requested some favours of Elizabeth, and entreated her that she might be beholden for them to her own goodness alone, without making applications to those ministers who had discovered such an extreme malignity against her person and her religion. She desired, that after her enemies should be satiated with her innocent blood, her body, which it was determined should never enjoy rest while her soul was united to it, might be consigned to her servants, and be conveyed by them into France, there to repose in a Catholic land, with the sacred reliques of her mother. In Scotland, she said, the sepulchres of her ancestors were violated, and the churches either demolished or profaned; and in England, where she might be interred among the ancient kings, her own and Elizabeth's progenitors, she could entertain no hopes of being accompanied to the grave with those rites and ceremonies which her religion required. She requested that no one might have the power of inflicting a private death upon her, without Elizabeth's knowledge; but that the execution should be public, and attended by the members of her household, who might bear testimony of her perseverance in the faith to her last moments, and of her submission to the will of Heaven. She begged that these servants might afterwards be allowed to depart in peace whithersoever they pleased, and that they might enjoy those legacies which which she purposed to bequeath them. She conjured her to grant these favours in the name of Jesus Christ; by their near kindred; by the soul and memory of Henry VII. the common ancestor of both; and by the royal dignity, of which they equally participated. And she declared her forgiveness of all who had testified any enmity against her, and esteemed herself happy in being called out of the world before the arrival of those miseries which threatened this island, in consequence of the neglect of true religion and virtue. Elizabeth made no answer to this letter; being unwilling to give Mary a refusal in her present situation, and foreseeing inconveniences from granting some of her requests.

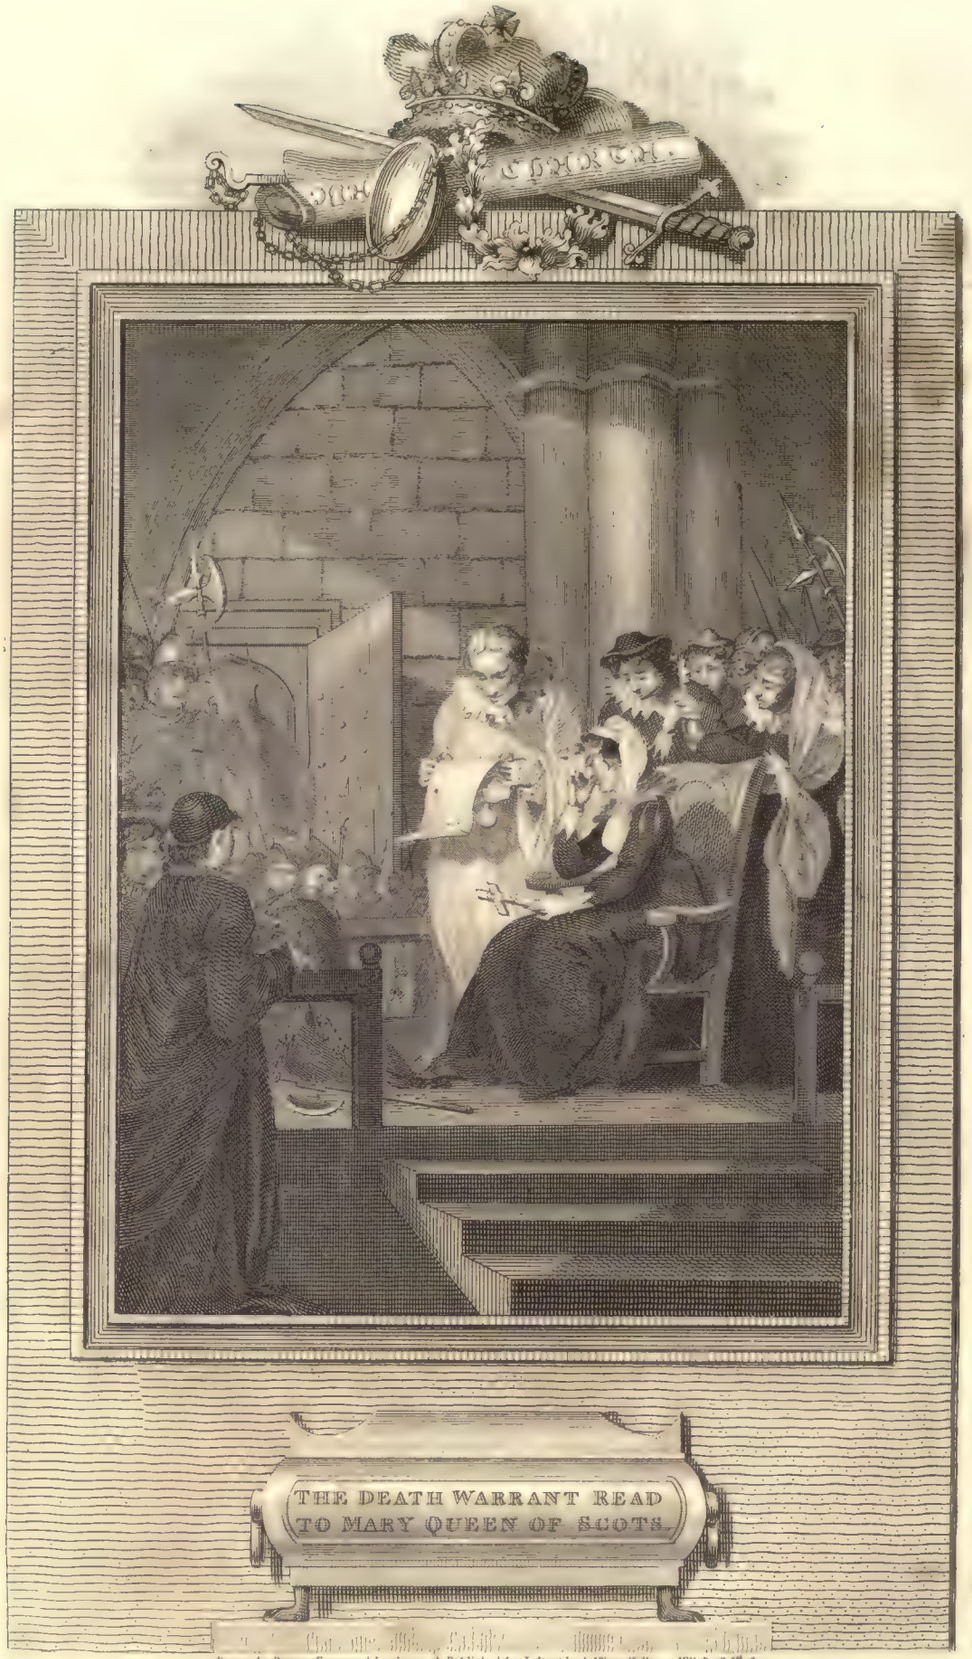
While the queen of Scots thus prepared herself to meet her fate, great efforts were made by foreign powers with Elizabeth, to prevent the execution of the sentence pronounced against her. Besides employing L'Aubespine, the French resident at London, a creature of the house of Guise, Henry sent over Pompone de Believre, as his ambassador extraordinary, with a professed intention of interceding for the life of Mary. The duke of Guise and the leagues at that time threatened very nearly the king's authority; and Elizabeth knew, that though that monarch might, from decency and policy, think himself obliged to interpose publicly in behalf of the queen of Scots, he could not secretly be displeased with the death of a princess, on whose fortune and elevation his mortal enemies had always founded so many daring and ambitious projects. It has even been asserted, that Believre had orders, after making public and vehement remonstrances against the execution of Mary, to exhort privately the queen, in his master's name, not to defer an act of justice, so necessary for their common safety (r). But whether the French king's intercession were sincere or not, it had no weight with the queen; and she still persisted in her former resolution.

The interposition of the young king of Scots, though not able to change Elizabeth's determination, seemed, on every account, to merit more regard. As soon as James heard of the trial and condemnation of his mother, his filial piety was aroused, his humanity was shocked, his pride was wounded; and he sent sir William Keith, a gentleman of his bed-chamber, to London; and wrote a letter to the queen, in which he remonstrated in very severe terms against the indignity of the procedure. He said, "that he was astonished to hear of the presumption of English noblemen and counsellors, who had dared to sit in judgement and pass sentence upon a queen of Scotland, descended from the blood-royal of England; but he was still more astonished to hear, that thoughts were seriously entertained of putting that sentence in execution: that he entreated Elizabeth to reflect on the dishonour which she would draw on her name by embruing her hands in the blood of her near kinswoman, a person of the same royal dignity, and of the same sex with herself: that in this unparalleled attempt she offered an affront to all diadems, and even to her own, and by reducing sovereigns to a level with other men, taught the people to neglect all duty towards those whom Providence had appointed to rule over them: that for his part, he must deem the injury an insult so enormous, as to be incapable of all atonement; nor was it possible for him thenceforward to remain in any terms of correspondence or alliance with a person who, without any pretence of legal authority, had deliberately inflicted an ignominious death upon his parent: and that even if the sentiments of nature and duty did not inspire him with this purpose of vengeance, his honour required it of him; nor could he ever acquit himself in the eyes of the world, if he did not use every effort and endure every hazard to revenge so great an indignity.

Soon after, James sent Patrick master of Gray, and sir Robert Melvil to enforce the remonstrances of Keith; and to employ with the queen every expedient of argument and menaces. Elizabeth was at first offended with the sharpness of these applications; and she replied in a like strain to the Scottish ambassadors. When she afterwards reflected that this earnestness was no more than what duty required of James, she was pacified; but still retained the resolution of executing the sentence against Mary. It is believed, that the master of Gray, gained by the enemies of that princess, secretly gave his advice not to spare her, assuring the queen that she had no reasons to dread the exertions of a prince so spiritless and unwarlike as James, who might easily be awed into acquiescence and submission.



Elizabeth also, from many considerations, was induced to pay small attention to the applications of James, and to disregard all the efforts which he could employ in behalf of his mother. She was well acquainted with his character and interests, the factions which prevailed among his people, and the inveterate hatred which the zealous Protestants, particularly the preachers, bore to the queen of Scots. The present incidents set these dispositions of the clergy in full light. James, observing the fixed purpose of Elizabeth, ordered prayers to be offered up for Mary in all the churches; and knowing the captious humour of the ecclesiastics, he took care that the form of the petition should be most cautious, as well as humane and charitable: "That it might please God to illuminate Mary with the light of his truth, and save her from the apparent danger with which she was threatened." But, excepting the king's own chaplains, and one clergyman more, all the preachers refused to pollute their churches by prayers for a Papist, and would not so much as prefer a petition for her conversion (s).

We may here observe, with Hume, that Elizabeth, when solicited, either by James or by foreign princes, to pardon the queen of Scots, seemed always determined to execute the sentence against her: but when her ministers urged her to interpose no more delays, her scruples and her hesitation returned; her humanity could not allow her to embrace such violent and sanguinary measures; and she was touched with compassion for the misfortunes, and with respect for the dignity of the unhappy prisoner. The courtiers, sensible that they could do nothing more acceptable to her than to employ persuasion on this head, failed not to enforce every motive for the punishment of Mary, and to combat all the objections urged against this act of justice. They said that the treatment of that princess in England had been, on her first reception, such as sound reason and policy required; and if she had been governed by principles of equity, she would not have refused willingly to acquiesce in it: that the obvious inconveniences either of allowing her to retire into France, or of restoring her by force to her throne, in opposition to the Reformers and the English party in Scotland, had obliged the queen to detain her in England till time should offer some opportunity of serving her, without danger to the kingdom or to the Protestant religion: that her usage there had been such as became her rank; her own servants in considerable numbers had been permitted to attend her; exercise had been allowed her for health, and all access of company for amusement; and these indulgences would in time have been carried farther, if by her subsequent conduct she had appeared worthy of them: that after she had instigated the rebellion of Northumberland, the conspiracy of Norfolk, the bull of excommunication of Pope Pius, an invasion from Flanders; after she had seduced the queen's friends, and incited every enemy, foreign and domestic, against her; it became necessary to treat her as a most dangerous rival, and to render her confinement more strict and rigorous: that the queen, notwithstanding these repeated provocations, had, in her favour, rejected the importunity of her parliaments, and the advice of her sagest ministers; and was still, in hopes of (r) We have, however, no satisfactory reason for entertaining such an opinion. It is probable that Henry was not sincerely disposed to hinder the completion of Elizabeth's vengeance; but that a prince to whom Mary had given no cause of offence should actually urge her oppressor to the cruelty and injustice of shedding her blood, is not to be believed without strong evidence.

(s) James, unwilling or unable to punish this disobedience, and desirous of giving the preachers an opportunity of amending their fault, appointed a new day when prayers should be said for his mother; and that he might at least secure himself from any insult in his own presence, he desired the archbishop of St. Andrew's to officiate before him. In order to disappoint this purpose, the clergy instigated one Couper, a young man who had not yet received holy orders, to take possession of the pulpit early in the morning, and to exclude the prelate. When the king came to church, and saw the pulpit occupied by Couper, he called to him from his seat, and told him, "that the place was destined for another; yet since he was there, if he would obey the charge given, and remember the queen in his prayers, he might proceed to divine service." The preacher replied, "that he would do as the Spirit of God should direct him." This answer sufficiently instructed James in his purpose; and he commanded him to leave the pulpit. As Couper seemed not disposed to obey, the captain of the guard went to pull him from his place; upon which the young man cried aloud, "That this day would be a witness against the king in the great day of the Lord;" and he denounced a woe upon the inhabitants of Edinburgh for permitting him to be treated in that manner. The audience at first appeared desirous to take part with him; but the sermon of the prelate brought them over to a more dutiful and more humane disposition.

THE DEATH WARRANT READ

her amendment, determined to delay coming to the last extremities against her: that Mary, even in this forlorn condition, retained so high and unconquerable a spirit, that she acted as competitor to the crown, and allowed her partizans every where, and in their very letters, addressed to herself, to treat her as queen of England: that she had carried her animosity so far as to encourage, in repeated instances, the atrocious design of assassinating the queen; and this crime was unquestionably proved upon her by her own letters, by the evidence of her secretaries, and by the dying confession of her accomplices: that she was but a titular queen, and at present possessed no where any right of sovereignty; much less in England, where the moment she set foot in the kingdom, she voluntarily became subject to the laws, and to Elizabeth, the only true sovereign: that even allowing her to be still the queen's equal in rank and dignity, self-defence was permitted by a law of nature, which could never be abrogated; and every one, still more a queen, had sufficient jurisdiction over an enemy, who by open violence, and still more, who by secret treachery threatened the utmost danger against her life: that the general combination of the Catholics to exterminate the Protestants was no longer a secret; and as the sole resource of the latter persecuted sect lay in Elizabeth, so the chief hope which the former entertained of final success, consisted in the person and in the title of the queen of Scots: that this very circumstance brought matters to extremity between these princesses; and rendering the life of one the death of the other, pointed out to Elizabeth the path, which either regard to self-preservation, or to the happiness of her people, should direct her to pursue: and that necessity, more powerful than policy, thus demanded of the queen that resolution which equity would authorize, and which duty prescribed.

When Elizabeth thought, that as many importunities had been used, and as much delay interposed as decency required, she at last determined to carry the sentence into execution: but even in this final resolution she could not proceed without displaying a new scene of duplicity and artifice. In order to alarm the vulgar, and that popular zeal might not give way to tenderness and compassion, rumours were previously dispersed that the Spanish fleet was arrived in Milford Haven; that the Scots had made an irruption into England; that the duke of Guise was landed in Sussex with a strong army; that the queen of Scots was escaped from prison, had raised an army, and placed herself at the head of it; that the northern counties had begun an insurrection; that there was a new conspiracy on foot to assassinate the queen, and set the city of London on fire; nay, that the queen was actually assassinated. An attempt of this nature was even imputed to L'Aubespine, the French ambassador; and that minister was obliged to leave the kingdom. The queen, affecting to be in terror and perplexity, was observed to sit much alone, pensive and silent; and sometimes to mutter to herself half-sentences, importing the difficulty and distress to which she was reduced. She at last called William Davison, a man of parts, but easy to be imposed on, and who had lately been made secretary, and she ordered him privately to draw a warrant for the execution of the queen of Scots; which, she afterwards said, she intended to keep by her, in case any attempt should be made for the deliverance of that princess. She signed the warrant; and then commanded Davison to carry it to the chancellor, in order to have the great seal appended to it. Next day she sent Killigrew to Davison, enjoining him to forbear, some time, executing her former orders; and when Davison came and told her that the warrant had already passed the great seal, she seemed to be in great agitation, and blamed him for his precipitation. Wishing to draw Davison into a snare, that she might have a pretence for imputing Mary's execution to him, she neither ordered him to issue the warrant, nor to withhold it. Davison, being in a perplexity, acquainted the privy council with this whole transaction; and as Burleigh, Hatton, and other experienced courtiers, penetrated her schemes against Davison, they resolved to gratify her wish, endeavoured to persuade him to send off Beale with the warrant: if the queen should be displeased, they promised to justify his conduct, and to take on themselves the whole blame of this measure (t). The secretary, not sufficiently aware of their intention, complied with the advice; and the warrant was dispatched to the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, and some others, ordering them to see the sentence executed upon the queen of Scots.

The two noblemen came to Fotheringay castle on the 7th of February, 1587, and being introduced to Mary by sir Amias Paulet and sir Drue Drury, they informed her of their commission, and desired her to prepare for death next morning at eight o'clock. She seemed no wise terrified, though somewhat surprized, with the intelligence; and when Beale, who accompanied them, read over the warrant, she said, with a cheerful, and even a smiling countenance, that she did not think the queen, her sister, would have consented to her death, or have executed the sentence against a person, not subject to the laws and jurisdiction of England. "But such is her will," said she, "death, which puts an end to all my miseries, shall be to me most welcome; nor can I esteem that soul worthy the felicities of heaven, which cannot support the body under the horrors of the last passage to these blissful mansions (u)." She then requested the two noblemen, that they would permit some of her servants, particularly her confessor, to attend her: but they told her, that compliance with this last demand was contrary to their conscience (v), and that Dr. Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, a man of great learning, should be present to instruct her in the principles of true religion. Her refusal to have any conference with this divine inflamed the zeal of the earl of Kent; and he, giving vent to an indecent and ill-timed burst of passion, exclaimed, "Your life will be the death of our religion; but your death will be its life." Mention being made of Babington, she constantly denied his conspiracy to have been at all known to her; and the revenge of her wrongs she resigned into the hands of the Almighty.

When the earls had left her, she ordered supper to be hastened, that she might have the more leisure after it, to finish the few affairs which remained to her in this world, and to prepare for her passage to another. It was necessary for her, she said, to take some sustenance, lest a failure of her bodily strength should depress her spirits on the morrow, and lest her behaviour should thereby betray a weakness unworthy of herself. She supped sparingly, as her manner usually was; and her wonted cheerfulness did not even desert her on this occasion. She comforted her servants under the affliction which overwhelmed them, and which was too violent for them to conceal it from her. Turning to Burgoin, her physician, she asked him, Whether he did not remark the great and invincible force of truth? "They pretend," said she, "that I must die because I conspired against the queen's life: but the earl of Kent avowed, that there was no other cause of my death, than the apprehensions, which, if I should live, they entertain for their religion. My constancy in the faith is my real crime: the rest is only a colour invented by interested and designing men." Towards the end of supper, she called in all her servants, and drank to them: they pledged her, in order, on their knees; and craved her pardon for any past neglect of their duty: she deigned, in return, to ask their pardon for her offences towards them; and a plentiful effusion of tears attended this last solemn farewel, and exchange of mutual forgiveness.

Mary's care of her servants was the sole remaining affair which employed her concern. She perused her will, in which she had provided for them by legacies: she ordered the inventory of her goods, clothes, and jewels to be brought her; and she wrote down the names of those to whom she bequeathed each particular: to some she distributed money with her own hands; and she adapted the recompence to their different degrees of rank and merit. She wrote letters of recommendation for her servants to the French king, and to her cousin the duke of Guise, whom she made the chief executor of her testament. At her wonted time she went to bed; slept some hours; and then rising, spent the rest of the night in prayer. Having foreseen the difficulty of exercising the rights of her religion, she had had the precaution to obtain a consecrated host from the hands of pope Pius; and she had reserved the use of it for this last period of her life. By this expedient she supplied, as much as she could, the want of a priest and confessor, which was refused her. Towards the morning she dressed herself in a rich habit of silk and velvet, the only one which she had reserved to herself. She told her maids, that she would willingly have left them this dress rather than the plain garb which she wore the day before; but it was necessary for her to appear at the ensuing solemnity in a decent habit.

(t) It appears by some letters published by Strype, vol. iii. book ii. c. 1. that Elizabeth had not expressly communicated her intention to any of her ministers, not even to Burleigh: they were such experienced courtiers, that they knew they could not gratify her more than by serving her without waiting till she desired them.

While she was thus engaged, Thomas Andrews, high sheriff of the county, entered the room, and informed her that the hour was come, and that he must attend her to the place of execution. She replied, "I am ready;" and bidding adieu to her servants, she leaned on two of sir Amias Paulet's guards, because of an infirmity in her limbs; and she followed the sheriff with a serene and composed countenance. In passing through a hall adjoining to her chamber, she was met by the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, sir Amias Paulet, sir Drue Drury, and many other gentlemen of distinction. Here she also saw sir Andrew Melvil, the steward of her household, who flung himself on his knees before her; and wringing his hands, cried aloud, "Ah, Madam! unhappy me! what man was ever before the messenger of such heavy tidings as I must carry, when I shall return to my native country, and shall report that I saw my gracious queen and mistress beheaded in England?" His tears prevented farther speech; and Mary too felt herself moved more from sympathy than affliction. "Cease, my good servant," said she, "cease to lament: thou hast cause rather to rejoice than to mourn: for now shalt thou see the troubles of Mary Stuart receive their long-expected period and completion. Know," continued she, "good servant, that all the world at best is vanity, and subject still to more sorrow than a whole ocean of tears is able to bewail. Hitherto I have found thee faithful, and though thou be in religion a Protestant, and I am a Catholic, yet, seeing there is but one Christ, I charge thee, as thou respectest him, to bear this last message from me, that I die a true woman to my religion, and unalterable in my affections to Scotland and to France. Heaven forgive them that have long desired my end, and have thirsted for my blood as the hart panteth after the water brooks." "O God," added she, "thou art the Author of truth, and truth itself, thou knowest the inmost recesses of my heart: thou knowest that I was ever desirous to preserve an entire union between Scotland and England, and to obviate the source of all these fatal discords. But recommend me, Melvil, to my son, and tell him, that notwithstanding all my distresses, I have done nothing prejudicial to the state and kingdom of Scotland." After these words, reclining herself, with weeping eyes, and face bedewed with tears, she kissed him. "And so," said she, "good Melvil, farewel: once again, farewel, good Melvil; and grant the assistance of thy prayers for thy queen and mistress."

She next turned to the noblemen who attended her, and made a petition in behalf of her servants, that they might be well treated, be allowed to enjoy the presents which she had bestowed upon them, and be sent safely into their own country. Having received a favourable answer, she preferred another request, that they might be permitted to attend her at her death: in order, said she, that their eyes may behold, and their hearts bear witness, how patiently their queen and mistress can submit to her execution, and how constantly she perseveres in her attachment to her religion. The earl of Kent was rather unwilling to grant the request, and told her, that they would be apt by their speeches and cries to disturb both herself and the spectators: he was also apprehensive lest they should practise some superstition not meet for him to suffer; such as dipping their handkerchiefs in her blood: for that was the instance which he made use of. "My lord," said the queen of Scots, "I will give my word (although it be but dead) that they shall not incur any blame in any of the actions which you have named. But alas! poor souls! it would be a great consolation to them to bid their mistress farewel. And I hope," added she, "that your mistress being a maiden queen, would vouchsafe in regard of womanhood, that I should have some of my own people about me at my death. I know that her majesty hath not given you any such strict command, but that you might grant me a request of far greater courtesy, even though I were a woman of inferior rank to that which I bear." Finding that the earl of Kent persisted still in his refusal, her mind, which had fortified itself against the terrors of death, was affected by this indignity, for which she was not prepared. "I am cousin to your queen," cried she, "and descended from the blood-royal of Henry VII. I am a dowager of France, and an anointed queen of Scotland." The commissioners, perceiving how invidious their obstinacy would appear, conferred a little together, and agreed that she might carry a few of her servants along with her. She made choice of four men and two maid-servants for that purpose.

She then passed into another hall, where was erected the scaffold, covered with black; and she saw with an undismayed countenance, the executioners, and all the preparations for her death. The room was crowded with spectators; and no one was so steeled against all sentiments of humanity, as not to be moved when he reflected on her royal dignity, considered the surprising train of her misfortunes, beheld her mild but inflexible constancy, recalled her amiable accomplishments, or surveyed her beauties, which, though faded by years, and yet more by her afflictions, still discovered themselves in this fatal moment. Here the warrant for her execution was read to her; and during this ceremony she was silent, but shewed in her behaviour an indifference and unconcern, as if the business had not regarded her. Before the executioners performed their office, the dean of Peterborough stepped forth; and though the queen frequently told him that he needed not concern himself about her, that she was settled in the ancient Catholic and Roman religion, and that she meant to lay down her life in defence of that faith; he still thought it his duty to persist in his lectures and exhortations, and to endeavour her conversion. The terms which he employed were, under colour of pious instructions, cruel insults on her unfortunate situation; and besides their own absurdity, may be regarded as the most mortifying indignities to which she had ever yet been exposed. He told her that the queen of England had on this occasion shewn a tender care of her; and notwithstanding the punishment justly to be inflicted on her for her manifold trespasses, was determined to use every expedient for saving her soul from that destruction with which it was so nearly threatened: that she was now standing upon the brink of eternity, and had no other means of escaping endless perdition, than by repenting her former wickedness, by justifying the sentence pronounced against her, by acknowledging the queen's favours, and by exerting a true and lively faith in Christ Jesus: that the scriptures were the only rule of doctrine, the merits of Christ the only means of salvation; and if she trusted in the inventions or devices of men, she must expect in an instant to fall into utter darkness, into a place where shall be weeping, howling, and gnashing of teeth: that the hand of death was upon her, the axe was laid to the root of the tree, the throne of the great Judge of heaven was erected, the book of her life was spread wide, and the particular sentence and judgement was ready to be pronounced upon her: and that it was now, during this important moment, in her choice, either to rise to the resurrection of life, and hear that joyful salutation, Come, ye blessed of my Father; or to share the resurrection of condemnation, replete with sorrow and anguish; and to suffer that dreadful denunciation, Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.

During this discourse Mary could not sometimes forbear betraying her impatience, by interrupting the preacher; and the dean, finding that she had profited nothing by his lecture, at last bade her change her opinion, repent her of her former wickedness, and settle her faith upon this ground, that only in Christ Jesus could she hope to be saved. She answered, again and again, with great earnestness: "Trouble not yourself any more about the matter: for I was born in the Roman Catholic religion; I have experienced its comforts during my life, in the trying seasons of sickness, calamity, and sorrow; and in this religion I am resolved to die." Even the two earls perceived, that it was fruitless to harass her any farther with theological disputes; and they ordered the dean to desist from his exhortations, and to pray for her conversion. During the dean's prayer, she employed herself in private devotion from the office of the Virgin; and after he had finished, she pronounced aloud some petitions in English for the afflicted church, for an end of her own troubles, for her son, and for queen Elizabeth; and prayed God, that that princess might long prosper, and be employed in his service. Carrying now her crucifix to her lips, she pressed it devoutly to them; and then eagerly looking upon it, she exclaimed, "O Christ! thou wert extended on the cross to save mankind when they were lost. Pardon my transgressions, gressions, and stretch out thy arms to receive me in mercy." The earl of Kent observing that in her devotions she made frequent use of the crucifix, could not forbear reproving her for her attachment to that popish trumpery as he termed it; and he exhorted her to have Christ in her heart, not in her hand. She replied with presence of mind, that it was difficult to hold such an object in her hand without feeling her heart touched with some compunction.

She now began, with the aid of her two women, to disrobe herself; and the executioner also lent his hand to assist them. She smiled, and said, that she was not accustomed to undress herself before so large an assembly, nor to be served by such valets. Her servants seeing her in this condition, ready to lay her head upon the block, burst into tears and lamentations: she turned about to them; put her finger upon her lips, as a sign of imposing silence upon them; and having given them her blessing, desired them to pray for her. One of her maids, whom she had appointed for that purpose, covered her eyes with a handkerchief; she kneeled down, without any sign of fear or trepidation before the block, and said, "In thee, O Lord, do I trust; let me never be confounded!" She then covered her eyes with a linen handkerchief, in which the eucharist had been enclosed; and stretching forth her body, and fitting her neck for the fatal stroke, she called out, "Into thy hands, O God! I commit my spirit." Her head was then severed from her body at two strokes by the executioner. He instantly held it up to the spectators, streaming with blood, and agitated with the convulsions of death: the dean of Peterborough alone exclaimed, "So perish all queen Elizabeth's enemies!" The earl of Kent alone replied, "Amen!" The attention of all the other spectators was fixed on the melancholy scene before them; and zeal and flattery alike gave place to present pity and admiration of the expiring princess (w).

Thus perished, in the forty-sixth year of her age, and nineteenth of her captivity in England, Mary Stuart, queen of Scots, a woman of great accomplishments both of body and mind, natural as well as acquired; but unfortunate in her life, and during one period very unhappy in her conduct. The beauties of her person, and graces of her air, combined to make her the most amiable of women; and the charms of her address and conversation aided the impression which her lovely figure made on the hearts of all beholders. Ambitious and active in her temper, yet inclined to cheerfulness and society; of a lofty spirit, constant, and even vehement, in her purpose, yet polite, and gentle, and affable in her demeanour; she seemed to partake only so much of the male virtues as to render her estimable, without relinquishing those soft graces which compose the proper ornament of her sex. In order to form a just idea of her character, we must set aside one part of her conduct, while she abandoned herself to the guidance of a profligate man; and must consider these faults, whether we admit them to be imprudences or crimes, as the result of an inexplicable, though not uncommon, inconstancy in the human mind, of the frailty of our nature, of the violence of passion, and of the influence which situations, and sometimes momentary incidents, have on persons whose principles are not thoroughly confirmed by experience and reflection. Enraged by the ungrateful conduct of her husband, seduced by the treacherous counsels of one in whom she reposed confidence, transported by the violence of her own temper, which never lay sufficiently under the guidance of discretion, she was betrayed into actions which may with some difficulty be accounted for, but which admit of no apology, nor even of alleviation. An enumeration of her qualities might carry the appearance of a panegyric; an account of her conduct must in some parts wear the aspect of severe satire and invective. Her numerous misfortunes, the solitude of her long and tedious captivity, and the persecutions to which she had been exposed on account of her religion, had wrought her up to a degree of bigotry during her later years; and such were the prevalent spirit and principles of the age, that it is the less wonder if her zeal, her resentment, and her interest uniting, induced her to give consent to a design which conspirators, actuated only by the first of these motives, had formed against the life of Elizabeth.

When Mary's execution was made known to Elizabeth, she affected the utmost surprize and indignation. Her countenance changed; her speech faultered; and for a long time her sorrow was so deep that she could not express it, but stood fixed like a statue in silence and mute astonishment. After her grief was able to find vent, it burst out into loud wailings and lamentations; she put herself in deep mourning for this deplorable event; and she was seen perpetually bathed in tears, and surrounded only by her maids and women. None of her ministers or counsellors dared to approach her; or if any had such temerity, she chased them from her with the most violent expressions of rage and resentment: they had all of them been guilty of an unpardonable crime, in putting to death her dear sister and kinswoman, contrary to her fixed purpose, of which they were sufficiently apprized and acquainted.

No sooner was her sorrow so much abated as to leave room for reflection, than she wrote a letter of apology to the king of Scots, and sent it by sir Robert Cary, son of lord Hunsdon. But James refused to admit sir Robert Cary within his frontiers, though he afterwards consented that Elizabeth's epistle should be received, as well as a memorial written by Cary, which tended to exculpate the queen, and to throw the blame of Mary's execution on secretary Davison, whom, he said, the queen intended to punish severely for his presumption. Elizabeth, in her letter, told him, "that she wished he knew, but not felt, the unutterable grief which she experienced, on account of that lamentable accident, which without her knowledge, much less concurrence, had happened in England: that as her pen trembled when she attempted to write it, she found herself obliged to commit the relation of it to the messenger, her kinsman; who would likewise inform his majesty of every circumstance attending this dismal and unlooked-for misfortune: that she appealed to the supreme Judge of heaven and earth for her innocence; and was also so happy, amidst her other afflictions, as to find that many persons in her court could bear witness to her veracity in this protestation: that she abhorred dissimulation; deemed nothing more worthy of a prince than a sincere and open conduct; and could never surely be esteemed so base and poor-spirited as that, if she had really given orders for this fatal execution, she could on any consideration be induced to deny them: that, though sensible of the justice of the sentence pronounced against the unhappy prisoner, she determined from clemency, never to carry it into execution; and could not but resent the temerity of those who on this occasion had disappointed her intention: and that as no one loved him more dearly than herself, or bore a more anxious concern for his welfare; she hoped that he would consider every one as his enemy who endeavoured, on account of the present incident, to excite any animosity between them."

Elizabeth, that she might the better appease James, committed Davison to prison, and ordered him to be tried in the Star Chamber for his misdemeanour. The secretary was confounded; and being sensible of the danger which must attend his entering into a contest with the queen, he expressed penitence for his error, and submitted very patiently to be railed at by those very counsellors whose persuasion had induced him to incur the guilt, and who had promised to countenance and protect him, and even to take the responsibility of the transaction upon themselves. He was condemned to imprisonment during the queen's pleasure, and to pay a fine of ten thousand pounds. He remained a long time in custody; and the fine, though it reduced him to beggary, was rigorously exacted from him. All the favour which he could obtain from the queen, was sending him small supplies from time to time to keep him from perishing in necessity. He privately wrote an apology to his friend Walsingham, which contains many curious particulars. The French and Scotch ambassadors, he said, had been remonstrating with the queen in Mary's behalf; and immediately after their departure she commanded him, of her own accord, to deliver her the warrant for the execution of that princess. She signed it readily, and ordered it to be sealed with the great seal of England. She appeared in such good humour on the occasion, that she said to him in a jocular manner, "Go tell all this to Walsingham, who is now sick: though I fear he will die of sorrow when he hears of it." She added, that though she had so long delayed the execution, lest she should seem to be actuated by malice or cruelty, she was all along sensible of the necessity of it. In the same conversation she blamed sir Drue Drury and sir Amias Paulet, that they had not before eased her of this trouble; and she expressed her desire that Walsingham would bring them to compliance in that particular. She was so bent on this purpose, that some time after she asked Davison, Whether any letter had come from Paulet with regard to the service expected of him? Davison shewed her Paulet's letter; in which that gentleman positively refused to act any thing inconsistent with the principles of honour and justice. The queen fell into a passion; and accused Paulet as well as Drury of perjury; because, having taken the oath of association, in which they had bound themselves to avenge her wrongs, they had yet refused to lend their hand on this occasion. "But others," she said, "will be found less scrupulous (x)." Davison adds, that nothing but the consent and exhortations of the whole council could have engaged him to send off the warrant: he was well aware of his danger; and remembered that the queen, after having ordered the execution of the duke of Norfolk, had endeavoured, in a like manner, to throw the whole blame and odium of that action upon lord Burleigh (y).

Elizabeth's dissimulation was so gross that it could deceive nobody who was not previously resolved to be blinded; but as James's concern for his mother was certainly more sincere and cordial, he discovered the highest resentment, and refused to admit Cary into his presence. He recalled his ambassadors from England; and seemed to breathe nothing but war and vengeance. The states of Scotland being assembled, took part in his anger; and professed that they were ready to spend their lives and fortunes in revenge of his mother's death, and in defence of his title to the crown of England. Many of his nobility instigated him to take arms: lord Sinclair, when the courtiers appeared in deep mourning, presented himself to the king in complete armour, which, he said, was the proper mourning for the queen. The Catholics took the opportunity of exhorting James to make an alliance with the king of Spain, to lay immediate claim to the crown of England, and to prevent the ruin which, from his mother's example, he might conclude would certainly, if Elizabeth's power prevailed, overwhelm his person and his kingdom. The queen was sensible of the danger attending these counsels; and after allowing James some interval to vent his grief and anger, she employed her emissaries to pacify him, and to set before him every motive of hope or fear which might induce him to live in amity with her.

Walsingham wrote to lord Thirlstone, James's secretary, a letter to the same effect. He said, That he was much surprized to hear of the violent resolutions taken in Scotland, and of the passion discovered by a prince of so much judgement and temper as James: that a war, founded merely on the principle of revenge, and that too on account of an act of justice which necessity had extorted, would for ever be exposed to censure, and could not be excused by any principles of equity or reason: that if these views were deemed less momentous among princes, policy and interest ought certainly to be attended to; and these motives did still more evidently oppose all thoughts of a rupture with Elizabeth, and all revival of exploded claims to the English throne: that the inequality between the two kingdoms deprived James of any hopes of success, if he trusted merely to the force of his own state, and had no recourse to foreign powers for assistance: that the objections attending the introduction of succours from a more potent monarch appeared so evident from all the transactions of history, that they could not escape a person of the king's extensive knowledge; but there were, in the present case, several peculiar circumstances, which ought for ever to deter him from having recourse to so dangerous an expedient: that the French monarch, the ancient ally of Scotland, might willingly use the assistance of that kingdom against England; but would be displeased to see the union of these two kingdoms in the person of James; a union which would ever after exclude him from practising that policy formerly so useful to the French, and so pernicious to the Scottish nation: that Henry, besides, infested with faction and domestic war, was not in a condition of supporting distant allies; much less would he expose himself to any hazard or expence, in order to aggrandise a near kinsman of the house of Guise, the most determined enemies of his repose and authority: that the extensive power and exorbitant ambition of the Spanish monarch rendered him a still more dangerous ally to Scotland; and as he evidently aspired to an universal monarchy in the west, and had in particular advanced some claims to England, as if he were descended from the house of Lancaster, he was at the same time the common enemy of all princes who wished to maintain their independence; and the immediate rival and competitor of the king of Scots: that the queen, by her own naval power and her alliance with the Hollanders, would probably intercept all succours which might be sent to James from abroad, and be enabled to decide the controversy in this island, with the superior forces of her own kingdom, opposed to those of Scotland: that if the king revived his mother's pretensions to the crown of England, he must also embrace her religion, by which alone they could be justified; and must thereby undergo the infamy of abandoning those principles in which he had been strictly educated, and to which he had hitherto religiously adhered: that as he would, by such an apostacy, totally alienate all the Protestants in Scotland and England, he could never gain the confidence of the Catholics, who would still entertain reasonable doubts of his sincerity: that by advancing a present

(x) Although some authors have endeavoured to vindicate Elizabeth from the charge of wishing Mary to be put to death in a private manner, the following letters will set the matter in a clear light, and prove that she gave hints to that effect; and Mr. secretary Walsingham would never have written to sir Amias Paulet, recommending that measure, if it had not been agreeable to his mistress's instructions:

"After our hearty commendations, we find, by speech lately uttered by her majesty, that she doth note in you both a lack of that care and zeal for her service that she looketh for at your hands; in that you have not, in all this time, (of yourselves, without other provocation,) found out some way to shorten the life of that queen, considering the great peril she is hourly subject to so long as the said queen shall live. Wherein, besides a kind of lack of love towards her, she noteth greatly that you have not that care of your own particular safeties, or rather of the preservation of religion, and the public good and prosperity of your country, that reason and policy commandeth; especially having so good a warrant and ground for the satisfaction of your consciences towards God, and the discharge of your credit and reputation towards the world, as the oath of association, which you both have so solemnly taken and vowed; especially, the matter wherewith she standeth charged being clearly and manifestly proved against her. And therefore she taketh it most unkindly that men, professing that love towards her that you do, should in a kind of sort, for lack of the discharge of your duty, cast the burden upon her; knowing, as you do, her indisposition to shed blood, especially of one of that sex and quality, and so near to her in blood, as the said queen is. These respects, we find, do greatly trouble her majesty; who, we assure you, hath sundry times protested that, if the regard of the prayer of her good subjects and faithful servants did not more move her than her own peril, she would never be drawn to assent to the shedding of her blood. We thought it very meet to acquaint you with these speeches, lately passed from her majesty; referring the same to your good judgement. And so we commit you to the protection of the Almighty.

At London, FRA. WALSINGHAM.
1 Feb. 1587. WILLIAM DAVISON."

"To the Right Honourable sir Amias Paulet, Knt. one of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council."

Sir Amias Paulet and sir Drue Drury, on the receipt of this letter were so much hurt, that, though they were the slaves of religious prejudices, they felt an elevation of mind which reflected the greatest disgrace upon their sovereign. Considering themselves as grossly insulted by the proposal made to them, Paulet returned the following answer:

"SIR,

"Your letter of yesterday coming to my hands this present day at five in the afternoon, I would not fail, according to your direction, to return my answer with all possible speed; which I shall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterness of mind, in that I am so unhappy to have liven to see this unhappy day, in which I am required, by direction of my most gracious sovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbiddeth. My goods, livings, and life, are at her majesty's disposition; and I am ready to lose them this next morrow, if it shall so please her; acknowledging that I hold them as of her mere and most gracious favour, and do not desire to enjoy them but with her Highness's good liking. But God forbid that I should make so foul a shipwreck of my conscience, or leave so great a blot to my poor posterity, to shed blood without law and warrant; trusting that her majesty of her accustomed clemency, and the rather by your good mediation, will take this my dutiful answer in good part, as proceeding from one who will never be inferior to any Christian subject living in duty, honour, love, and obedience, towards his sovereign. And thus I commit you to the mercy of the Almighty.

"Your most assured poor friend,

"From Fotheringay, "A. PAULET."

"Your letters coming in the plural number, seem to be meant to sir Drue Drury as well as myself; and yet, because he is not named in them, neither the letter directed unto him, he forbeareth to make any particular answer, but subscribeth in heart to my opinion.

"D. DRURY."

LORD SINCLAIR ADVISING KING JAMES TO REVENGE

claim to the crown, he forfeited the certain prospect of his succession, and revived that national animosity which the late peace and alliance between the kingdoms had happily extinguished: that the whole gentry and nobility of England had openly declared themselves for the execution of the queen of Scots; and if James shewed such violent resentment against that act of justice, they would be obliged, for their own security, to prevent for ever so implacable a prince from ruling in England: and that, however some persons might represent his honour as engaged to seek vengeance for the present offence, the true honour of a prince consisted in wisdom and moderation and justice, not in following the dictates of blind passion, or in pursuing revenge at the expence of every motive and interest. These considerations, joined to the peaceable temper of the young prince, prevailed over his ideas of resentment; and he fell gradually into a good correspondence with the court of England. It is probable, that the queen's chief object in her dissimulation with regard to the execution of Mary, was, that she might thereby afford James a decent pretence for renewing his amity with her, on which their mutual interest so much appeared to depend.

But while Elizabeth thus ensured tranquillity from the attempts of her nearest neighbour, she was not unmindful of more distant dangers. Hearing that Philip, on account of the death of Mary, though he seemed to dissemble on the occasion, was secretly preparing a large naval force to attack her; she sent sir Francis Drake with a fleet to intercept his supplies, to pillage his coast, and to destroy his shipping. Drake carried out four capital ships of the queen's, and twenty-six of different sizes, with which the London merchants, instigated by the hopes of sharing in the plunder, had supplied him. Having learned from two Dutch ships, which he met with in his passage, that a Spanish fleet, richly laden, was lying at Cadiz, ready to set sail for Lisbon, the rendezvous of the intended Armada, he bent his course to the former harbour, and made a bold and fortunate attack on the enemy. He obliged six gallies, which made head against him, to take shelter under the forts; he burned about a hundred vessels, laden with ammunition and naval stores; and he destroyed a great ship belonging to the marquis of Santa Croce. Thence he set sail for Cape St. Vincent, and took by assault the castle situated on that promontory, with three other fortresses. He next insulted Lisbon; and, finding that the merchants, who had engaged in the expedition solely in expectation of profit, were discontented at these military enterprizes, he set sail for the Terceras, with an intention of lying in wait for a rich carrack which was expected in those parts. He was so fortunate as to meet with his prize; and by this short expedition, in which the public bore so small a share, the adventurers were encouraged to attempt farther enterprizes. The English seamen learned to despise the great unwieldy ships of the enemy; the naval preparations of Spain were destroyed; the intended expedition against England was retarded a twelvemonth; and the queen thereby had leisure to take more secure measures against that formidable invasion which seemed to threaten her with dethronement, and to make this country a province of Spain.

The parliament, meeting on the 15th of February, 1587, in pursuance of their former adjournment, a motion was made in the commons to present an address of thanks to her majesty, for having put the queen of Scots to death; but this did not pass, because it would have fixed an imputation on Elizabeth, which she so eagerly sought to avoid. A petition, with a directory, or book of discipline, from the Puritans, being presented to the house, and seconded by four members, the queen sent for the book, and committed those members to the Tower, for having presumed to meddle in church matters, in contempt of her repeated inhibition. A motion was afterwards made to petition her for their release; but it was over-ruled, and they continued in confinement till the dissolution of parliament. This despotic exertion of severity did not hinder the servile commons from granting a subsidy; and, afterwards, a benevolence for supporting the war in the Netherlands. She also experienced a similar indulgence from the lords and clergy assembled in convocation.

This year Thomas Cavendish, a gentleman of Devonshire, who had dissipated a good estate by living at court, being resolved to repair his fortune at the expence of the Spaniards, fitted out three ships at Plymouth; one of a hundred and twenty tons, another of sixty, and a third of forty; and with these small vessels he ventured into the South Sea, and committed great depredations on the Spaniards. He took nineteen vessels, some of which were richly laden; and returning by the Cape of Good Hope, he came to London, and entered the river Thames in a kind of triumph. His mariners and soldiers were clothed in silk, his sails were of damask, his top-sail cloth of gold; and his prizes were esteemed the richest that had ever been brought into England.

During this campaign, the land enterprizes of the English were not very advantageous or honourable to the nation. The important place of Deventer was intrusted by Leicester to William Stanley, with a garrison of twelve hundred English; and this gentleman, being a Catholic, was alarmed at the discovery of Babington's conspiracy, and became apprehensive lest every one of his religion should thenceforth be treated with distrust in England. He entered into a correspondence with the Spaniards, betrayed the city to them for a sum of money, and engaged the whole garrison to desert with him to the Spanish service. Roland York, who commanded a fort near Zutphen, imitated his example; and the Hollanders, formerly disgusted with Leicester, and suspicious of the English, preferred loud complaints against the improvidence, if not the treachery, of his administration. Shortly after he himself arrived in the Low Countries; but his conduct was by no means calculated to give them satisfaction, or to remove the suspicions which they had entertained against him. The prince of Parma having besieged Sluys, Leicester attempted to relieve the place, first by sea, then by land; but failed in both enterprizes; and as he ascribed his bad success to the ill behaviour of the Hollanders, they were equally free in reflections upon his conduct. The breach between them became wider every day: they slighted his authority, opposed his measures, and neglected his counsels; while he endeavoured, by an imperious behaviour and by violence, to recover that influence which he had lost by his imprudent and ill-concerted measures. He was even suspected by the Dutch of a design to usurp upon their liberties; and the jealousy entertained against him began to extend even towards the queen herself. That princess had made some advances towards a peace with Spain: a congress had been opened at Bourbourg, a village near Graveline: and though the two courts, especially that of Spain, had no other intention than to amuse each of them its enemy by negociation, and mutually relax the preparations for defence or attack, the Dutch, who were determined on no terms to return under the Spanish yoke, became apprehensive lest their liberty should be sacrificed to the political interests of England. But Elizabeth, who knew the importance of her alliance with the States during the present critical situation of affairs, was resolved to give them entire satisfaction, by recalling Leicester, and ordering him to resign his government: yet lord Buckhurst, whom she had sent into Holland to enquire into the validity of those complaints which had been exhibited against her favourite, having given her such an account of his embassy as justice and probity required, incurred her immediate displeasure, and was even confined for some time, as if he had been the culprit, and the profligate Leicester a model of honesty.

After the departure of Leicester, Maurice, son of the late prince of Orange, a youth of twenty years of age, was elected by the States governor in his place; and Peregrine, lord Willoughby was appointed by the queen commander of the English forces. The measures of these two generals were much embarrassed by the malignity of Leicester, who had left a faction behind him, and who still attempted, by means of his emissaries, to disturb all the operations of the States. As soon as Elizabeth received intelligence of these disorders, she took care to redress them; and she obliged all the partizans of England to fall into unanimity with prince Maurice. But though her good sense so far prevailed over her partiality to Leicester, she never could be made fully sensible of his vices and incapacity; and the submissions which he made her restored him to her wonted favour.

But the earl of Leicester was not the only favourite which Elizabeth had: sir Christopher Hatton stood forth as his rival; and, about this time, received some signal marks of her partiality. "Being young," says Camden, "and of a comely tallness of body, and amiable countenance, he got into such favour with the queen, that she took him into her band of fifty gentlemen pensioners; and afterwards, for his modest sweetness of conditions, unto the number of her gentlemen of her privy chamber; made him captain of her guard, vice-chamberlain, and one of her privy council; and, lastly, made him lord chancellor," though he had never followed the profession of the law, on the decease of sir Thomas Bromley. Lady Shrewsbury mentions some particulars relative to the great degree of favour which this courtier enjoyed, which certainly were not calculated to preserve "the unspotted purity" of our "virgin queen." It is, however, but justice to observe, that sir Christopher Hatton by no means disgraced the high station to which he had been so unexpectedly elevated: his good natural capacity supplied the place of experience and study; and his decisions were not found deficient either in point of equity or judgement. His enemies had contributed to this promotion, in hopes that his absence from court, while he attended the business of chancery, would gradually estrange the queen from him, and give them an opportunity of undermining him in her favour.

In 1588, the intrigues and cabals of the court were silenced by the accounts which were brought from all quarters, of the vast preparations made by the Spaniards for the invasion of England, and for the entire conquest of that kingdom. Philip, though he had not yet declared war, on account of the hostilities which Elizabeth every where committed upon him, had long harboured a secret and violent desire of revenge against her. His ambition, and the hopes of extending his empire, were much encouraged by the prosperous state of his affairs at that time; by the conquest of Portugal, the acquisition of the East Indian commerce and settlements, and the yearly importation of vast treasures from America. The point on which he rested his highest glory, the perpetual object of his policy, was to support what he esteemed orthodoxy, and exterminate the enemies of the Catholic church; and as the power and credit of Elizabeth were the chief bulwarks of the Protestants, he hoped, if he could subdue that princess, to acquire the eternal renown of re-uniting the whole Christian world within the pale of his own church. Above all, his indignation against his revolted subjects in the Netherlands instigated him to attack the English, who had encouraged that insurrection, and who, by their vicinity, were so well enabled to support the Hollanders, that he could never hope to reduce these rebels while the power of that kingdom remained entire and unbroken. To subdue England seemed to him a necessary preparative to the re-establishment of his authority in the Netherlands; and notwithstanding appearances, the former was in itself, as a more important, so a more easy undertaking than the latter. That kingdom lay nearer Spain than the Low Countries, and was more exposed to invasions from that quarter; after an enemy had once obtained entrance, the difficulty seemed to be over, as it was neither fortified by art or nature; a long peace had deprived it of all military discipline and experience; and the Catholics, of which great numbers still remained in the land, would be ready, it was imagined, to join any invader who should free them from those persecutions under which they laboured, and should revenge the death of the queen of Scots, on whom they had fixed all their hopes of emancipation from the shackles of the Protestants. The fate of England must be decided in one battle at sea, and another at land; and what comparison between the English and Spaniards, either in point of naval force, or in the numbers, reputation, and veteran bravery of their armies? Besides the acquisition of so great a kingdom, success against England ensured the immediate subjection of the Hollanders, who, attacked on every hand, and deprived of all support, must yield their stubborn necks to that yoke which they had so long resisted. Happily this conquest, as it was of the utmost importance to the grandeur of the Spanish monarch, would not at present be opposed by the jealousy of other powers, naturally so much interested to prevent the success of the enterprize. A truce was lately concluded with the Turks; the Empire was in the hands of a friend and near ally; and France, the perpetual rival of Spain, was so torn with intestine commotions, that she had no leisure to pay attention to her foreign interests. This favourable opportunity, therefore, which might never again present itself, must be seized; and one bold effort made for acquiring that ascendant in Europe, to which the present greatness and prosperity of the Spaniards seemed so fully to entitle them.

These hopes and motives engaged Philip, notwithstanding his temper, to undertake this hazardous enterprize; and though the prince, now created by the pope duke of Parma, when consulted, opposed the attempt, at least represented the necessity of previously getting possession of some sea-port town in the Netherlands, which might afford a retreat to the Spanish navy, it was determined by the bigoted monarch to proceed immediately to the execution of this daring and ambitious project. During some time he had been secretly making preparations; and so soon as the resolution was fully taken, every part of his vast empire resounded with the noise of armaments, and all his ministers, generals and admirals, were employed in forwarding the design. The marquis of Santa Croce, a sea-officer of great reputation and experience was appointed to command the fleet; and by his counsels were the naval equipments conducted. In all the ports of Sicily, Naples, Spain, and Portugal, artizans were employed in building vessels of uncommon magnitude and force; naval stores were brought at a great expence; provisions amassed; armies levied and quartered in the maritime towns of Spain; and plans laid for fitting out such a fleet and embarkation as had never before had its equal in Europe. The military preparations in Flanders were no less formidable. Troops from all quarters were every moment assembling, to reinforce the duke of Parma. Capizuchi and Pinelli conducted forces from Italy: the marquis of Borgant, a prince of the house of Austria, levied troops in Germany: the Walloon and Burgundian regiments were completed or augmented: the Spanish infantry was supplied with recruits; and an army of thirty-four thousand men was assembled in the Netherlands, and kept in readiness to be transported into England. The duke of Parma employed all the carpenters whom he could procure, either in Flanders or in Lower Germany, and the coasts of the Baltic; and he built at Dunkirk, and Nieuport, but especially at Antwerp, a great number of boats and flat-bottomed vessels, for the transporting of his infantry and cavalry. The most renowned nobility and princes of Italy and Spain were ambitious of sharing in the honour of this great enterprize. Don Amadæus of Savoy, don John of Medicis, Vespasian Gonzaga, duke of Sabionetta, and the duke of Pastrana, hastened to join the army under the duke of Parma. About two thousand volunteers in Spain, many of them men of family, had enlisted in the service. No doubts indeed were entertained, but such vast preparations, conducted by officers of such consummate skill, must finally be successful. And the Spaniards, ostentatious of their power, and elated with vain hopes, had already denominated their navy the INVINCIBLE ARMADA.

Intelligence of these extraordinary preparations soon reached the court of London; and notwithstanding the secrecy of the Spanish council, and their pretending to employ this force in the Indies, it was properly concluded, that they meant to make some effort against England. The queen had foreseen the invasion; and finding that she must now contend for her crown with the whole force of Spain, she made preparations for resistance; nor was she dismayed with that power by which all Europe apprehended she must of necessity be overwhelmed. Her force indeed seemed very unequal to resist so powerful an enemy. All the sailors in England amounted at that time, according to Monson, to about fourteen thousand men. The size of the English shipping was in general so small, that except a few of the queen's ships of war, there were not four vessels belonging to the merchants which exceeded four hundred tons. The royal navy consisted only of twenty-eight sail, many of which were of small size; none of them exceeded the bulk of our largest frigates, and most of them deserved rather the name of pinnaces than of ships. The only advantage of the English fleet consisted in the dexterity and courage of the seamen, who, being accustomed to sail in tempestuous seas, and expose themselves to all dangers, as much exceeded in this particular the Spanish mariners, as their vessels were inferior in size and force to those of that nation. All the commercial towns of England were required to furnish ships for reinforcing this small navy; and they discovered on the present occasion great alacrity in defending their liberty and religion against those imminent perils with which they were threatened. The citizens of London, in order to shew their zeal in the common cause, instead of fifteen vessels, which they were commanded to equip, voluntarily fitted out double the number. The nobility and gentry hired, and armed, and manned, forty-three ships at their own charge; and all the loans of money which the queen demanded were frankly granted by the persons applied plied to. Lord Howard of Effingham, a man of courage and capacity, was admiral, and took on him the command of the navy: Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher, the most celebrated seamen in Europe, served under him. The principal fleet was stationed at Plymouth. A smaller squadron, consisting of forty vessels, English and Flemish, was commanded by lord Seymour, second son of protector Somerset; and lay off Dunkirk, in order to intercept the duke of Parma.

The land forces of England, compared to those of Spain, possessed contrary qualities to its naval power: they were more numerous than the enemy, but much inferior in discipline, reputation, and experience. An army of twenty thousand men was disposed in different bodies along the south coast; and orders were given them, if they could not prevent the landing of the Spaniards, to retire backwards, to waste the country around, and to wait for reinforcements from the neighbouring counties, before they approached the enemy. A body of twenty-two thousand foot, and a thousand horse, under the command of the earl of Leicester, was stationed at Tilbury, in order to defend the capital. The principal army consisted of thirty-four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, and was commanded by lord Hunsdon. These forces were reserved for guarding the queen's person, and were appointed to march whithersoever the enemy should appear. The fate of England, if all the Spanish armies should be able to land, seemed to depend on the issue of a single battle; and men of reflexion entertained the most dismal apprehensions, when they considered the force of fifty thousand veteran Spaniards, commanded by experienced officers, under the duke of Parma, the most consummate general of the age; and compared this formidable armament with the military power, which England, not enervated by peace, but long disused to war, could raise to oppose it.

At this trying conjuncture, the chief support of the kingdom seemed to consist in the vigour and prudence of the queen's conduct; who, undismayed by the present dangers, issued all her orders with tranquillity, raised the drooping spirits of her people, animated them to a steady resistance, and employed every resource which either her domestic situation or her foreign alliances could afford her, to avert the evil effects of the threatened attack. She sent sir Robert Sidney into Scotland; and exhorted the king to remain attached to her, and to consider the danger which at present menaced his sovereignty no less than her own, from the ambition of the Spanish tyrant (z): the ambassador found James, whose eagerness to possess the crown of England, if he should survive the queen, appears to have prevailed at all times over the suggestions of honour or the feelings of nature, well disposed to cultivate a union with Elizabeth, and that prince even kept himself prepared to march with the whole force of his kingdom to the assistance of the queen. Her authority with the king of Denmark, and the tie of their common religion, engaged this monarch, upon her application, to seize a squadron of ships which Philip had bought or hired in the Danish harbours: the Hanse Towns, though not at that time on good terms with Elizabeth, were induced by the same motives to retard so long the equipment of some vessels in their ports, that they became useless to the purpose of invading England. All the Protestants throughout Europe regarded this enterprize as the critical event, which was to decide for ever the fate of their religion; and though unable, by reason of their distance, to join their force to that of Elizabeth, they kept their eyes fixed on her conduct and fortune, and beheld with anxiety, mixed with admiration, the intrepid countenance with which she encountered that louring storm which threatened every moment to burst over her head.

The queen also was sensible that, next to the general popularity which she enjoyed, and the confidence which her subjects reposed in her prudent government, the firmest support of her throne consisted in the general zeal of the people for the Protestant religion, and the inveterate hatred which they had imbibed against the principles of the church of Rome. She took care, on the present occasion, to revive in the nation this attachment to their own sect, and this abhorrence of the opposite. The English were reminded of their former danger from the tyranny of Spain: all the barbarities exercised by Mary against the Protestants, were ascribed to the counsels of that bigoted and imperious nation: the bloody massacres in the Indies, the unrelenting executions in the Low Countries, the horrid cruelties and iniquities of the inquisition, were submitted to the contemplation of the English Protestants. A list and description was published and pictures dispersed, of the several instruments of torture with which, it was pretended, the Spanish Armada was loaded: and every artifice, as well as reason, was employed to animate the people to a vigorous defence of their religion, their laws, and their liberties.

But while the queen, in this critical situation of her affairs, roused the animosity of the nation against Popery, she treated the partizans of that communion with moderation, and conciliated their affections by the lenity which was exercised towards them. Though she knew that Sixtus Quintus, the reigning pontiff, who was famous for his capacity and his tyranny, had fulminated a new bull of excommunication against her, had deposed her, had absolved her subjects from their oaths of allegiance, had published a crusade against England, and had granted plenary indulgences to every one engaged in the present invasion; she would not believe that all her Catholic subjects could be so blinded, as to sacrifice to bigotry their duty to their sovereign, and the liberty and independence of their native country. She rejected all violent counsels, by which she was urged to seek pretences for dispatching the leaders of that party: she would not even confine any considerable number of them: and the Catholics, sensible of this good usage, generally expressed great zeal for the public service. Some gentlemen of that sect, conscious that they could not justly expect any trust or authority, entered themselves as volunteers in the fleet or army: some equipped ships at their own charge, and gave the command of them to Protestants: others were active in animating their tenants, and vassals, and neighbours, to the defence of their country: and every rank of men, burying for the present all party distinctions, and considerations of inferior import, seemed to prepare themselves with order as well as with vigour to resist the violence of the hostile banditti who sought to invade their island and enslave their persons.

The more to excite the martial spirit of the nation, the queen appeared on horseback in the camp which had been formed at Tilbury; and riding through the lines, discovered a chearful and animated countenance, and delivered the following speech, peculiarly calculated to increase the martial spirit of her troops, in a tone of voice that tended to heighten its effect: "My loving people, we have been persuaded by some, that are careful of our safety, to take heed how we commit ourselves to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery; but assure you, I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear: I have always so behaved myself, that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good-will of my subjects. And therefore I am come amongst you at this time, not as for my recreation or sport, but being resolved, in the midst and heat of the battle, to live or die amongst you all; to lay down, for my God, and for my kingdom, and for my people, my honour and my blood, even in the dust. I know I have but the body of a weak and feeble woman; but I have the heart of a king, and of a king of England too: and think foul scorn, that Parma, or Spain, or any prince of Europe, should dare to invade the borders of my realms. To which, rather than my dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already, by your forwardness, that you have deserved rewards and crowns; and we do assure you, on the word of a prince, they shall be duly paid you. In the mean time, my lieutenant-general shall be in my stead; than whom never prince commanded a more noble and worthy subject: not doubting, by your obedience to my general, by your concord in the camp, and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over those enemies of my God, of my kingdom, and of my people."

By this spirited and judicious conduct she revived the tenderness and admiration of the soldiery: an attachment to her person became a kind of enthusiasm among them: and they asked one another, Whether it were possible that Englishmen could abandon this glorious cause, could display less fortitude than appeared in the female sex, or could could ever by any dangers be induced to relinquish the defence of their heroic princess?

(z) It is said that Elizabeth made him some promises which she never fulfilled, to give him a dukedom in England, with suitable lands and revenue, to settle five thousand pounds a year on him, and pay him a guard, for the safety of his person. From a MS. of lord Royston's.

But notwithstanding their mighty preparations, Philip and Elizabeth endeavoured to amuse each other with a negociation, in order to gain time for the more effectual accomplishment of their respective plans. The duke of Parma met the English envoys in Flanders; and the conferences were opened at Bourboweg; but a truce proposed by the latter was rejected; and, as every article submitted to discussion was illusory, no plan of accommodation, of course, could take place. The conferences, however, were employed till the approach of the Spanish Armada; when the English commissioners were dismissed, with a safe conduct, to Calais.

The grand Spanish Armada was ready in the beginning of May, 1588, but the moment it was preparing to sail, the marquis of Santa Croce, the admiral, was seized with a fever, of which he soon after died. The vice-admiral, the duke of Paliano, by a strange concurrence of accidents, at the very same time suffered the same fate; and the king appointed, as commander of the fleet, the duke of Medina Sidonia, a nobleman of great family, but totally unexperienced in action, and entirely unacquainted with maritime affairs. Alcarede was appointed vice-admiral. This misfortune, besides the loss of so great an officer as Santa Croce, retarded the sailing of the Armada, and gave the English more time for their preparations to oppose them. At last, the Spanish fleet, full of hopes and alacrity, set sail from Lisbon, on the 29th of May; but next day met with a violent tempest, which scattered the ships, sunk some of the smallest, and forced the rest to take shelter in the Groine, where they waited till they could be refitted.

When news of this event was carried to England, the queen concluded that the design of an invasion would be deferred till the following season; and being always ready to lay hold on every pretence for saving money, she made Walsingham write to the admiral, directing him to lay up some of the larger ships, and to discharge the seamen: but lord Effingham, who was not so sanguine in his hopes, used the freedom to disobey these orders; and he begged leave to retain all the ships in service, though it should be at his own expence. Taking advantage of a north wind, he sailed towards the coast of Spain, with an intention of attacking the enemy in their harbours; but the wind changing to the south, he became apprehensive lest they might have set sail, and by passing him at sea, invade England, now exposed by the absence of the fleet. He returned, therefore, with the utmost expedition to Plymouth, and lay at anchor in that harbour. In the mean time, all the damages of the Armada had been repaired; and the Spaniards with fresh hopes set out again to sea, in prosecution of their enterprize (a). It is probable that the Spanish fleet passed him in a fog; for the very day after his return to port, they were seen off the coast of Cornwall.

The king of Spain's intention was, that the Armada should sail to the coast opposite to Dunkirk and Nieuport; and, having chased away all English or Flemish vessels, which might obstruct the passage (for it was never supposed they could make opposition,) should join themselves with the duke of Parma, should thence make sail to the Thames, and having landed the whole Spanish army, thus complete at one blow the entire conquest of England. In prosecution of this scheme, Philip gave orders to the duke of Medina, that in passing along the Channel, he should sail as near the coast of France as he could with safety; that he should by this policy avoid meeting with the English fleet; and, keeping in view the main enterprize, should neglect all smaller successes, which might prove an obstacle, or even interpose a delay, to the acquisition of a kingdom. After the Armada was under sail, they took a fisherman, who informed them that the English admiral had been lately at sea, had heard of the tempest which scattered the Armada, had retired back into Plymouth, and no longer expecting an invasion this season, had laid up his ships, and discharged most of the seamen. From this false intelligence the duke of Medina conceived the great facility of attacking and destroying the English ships in harbour; and he was tempted by the prospect of an advantage so important to break his orders, and make sail directly for Plymouth: a resolution to which England was indebted for her safety. The Lizard was the first land made by the Armada, about sun-set on the 19th of July; and as the Spaniards took it for the Ram-head near Plymouth, they bore out to sea with an intention of returning next day, and commencing an attack on the English navy. They were descried by Fleming, a Scottish pirate, who was roving in those seas, and who immediately set sail to inform the English admiral of their approach: another fortunate event which contributed extremely to the safety of the fleet. Effingham had just time to get out of port, when he saw the Spanish Armada coming full sail towards him, disposed in the form of a crescent, and stretching the distance of seven miles from the extremity of one division to that of the other.

The writers of that age raise their style by a pompous description of this appearance of the fleet; the most magnificent that had ever been seen upon the ocean, infusing equal terror and admiration into the minds of all beholders. The lofty masts, the swelling sails, and the towering prows of the Spanish galleons, seem impossible to be justly painted, but by assuming the diction of poetry; and an eloquent historian of Italy, in imitation of Camden, has asserted, that the Armada, though the ships bore every sail, yet advanced with a slow motion; as if the ocean groaned with supporting, and the winds were tired with impelling, so enormous a weight. The truth, however, is, that the largest of the Spanish vessels would scarcely pass for third rates in the present navy of England; yet were they so ill framed, or so ill governed, that they were quite unwieldly, and could not sail upon a wind, nor tack on occasion, nor be managed in stormy weather by the seamen. Neither the mechanics of ship-building, nor the experience of mariners, had attained so great perfection as could serve for the security and government of such bulky vessels; and the English, who had already had experience how unserviceable they commonly were, beheld without dismay their tremendous appearance.

Effingham gave orders not to come to close fight with the Spaniards; where the size of the ships, he suspected, and the numbers of the soldiers, would be a disadvantage to the English; besides, he was greatly inferior in the number of his ships, men, and guns, as well as in weight of metal: he therefore determined to cannonade them at a distance, and to wait the opportunity which winds, currents, or various accidents, must afford him, of intercepting some scattered vessels of the enemy. Nor was it long before the event answered his expectations. A great ship of Biscay, on board of which was a considerable part of the Spanish money, was supposed to have been set on fire by the gunner, who was a Dutchman, and who had committed this act in consequence of some ill treatment he had experienced; and while all hands were employed in extinguishing the flames, she fell behind the rest of the Armada: the great galleon of Andalusia was detained by the springing of her mast; and both these vessels were taken, after some resistance, by sir Francis Drake. As the Armada advanced up the Channel, the English hung upon its rear, and still infested it with skirmishes and constant canonading. Each trial of skill abated the confidence of the Spaniards, and added courage to the English; and the latter soon found, that even in close fight the size of the Spanish ships was no advantage to them. Their bulk exposed them the more to the fire of the enemy; while their cannon, placed too high, shot over the heads of the English. The alarm having now reached the coast of England, the nobility and gentry hastened out with their vessels from every harbour, and reinforced the admiral. The earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, sir Thomas Cecil, sir Robert Cecil, sir Walter Raleigh, sir Thomas Vavasor, sir Thomas Gerrard, sir Charles Blount, with many others, distinguished themselves by this generous and disinterested service of their country. The English fleet, after the conjunction of those ships, amounted to a hundred and forty sail.

The Armada had now reached Calais, and cast anchor before that place; in expectation that the duke of Parma, who had received intelligence of their approach, would put to sea and join his forces to theirs. The English admiral practised here a successful stratagem upon the Spaniards. He took eight of his smaller ships, and filling them with combustibles, sent them one after another into the midst of the enemy. The Spaniards fancied that they were fireships of the same contrivance with a famous vessel which had lately done so much execution in the Scheldt near Antwerp; and they immediately cut their cables, and took to flight with the greatest disorder and precipitation. The English fell upon them next morning while in confusion; and besides doing great damage to other ships, they took or destroyed about twelve of the enemy.

(a) The fleet consisted of a hundred and thirty vessels, of which near a hundred were galleons, and were of greater size than any ever before used in Europe. It carried on board nineteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five soldiers, eight thousand four hundred and fifty-six mariners, two thousand and eighty eight galley-slaves, and two thousand six hundred and thirty great pieces of brass ordnance. It was victualled for six months; and was attended by twenty lesser ships, called caravals, and ten salves with six oars a-piece.

It was now become apparent, that the intention for which these mighty preparations were made by the Spaniards, was entirely frustrated. The vessels provided by the duke of Parma were made for transporting soldiers, not for fighting; and that general, when urged to leave the harbour, positively refused to expose his flourishing army to such apparent hazard; while the English not only were able to keep the sea, but seemed even to triumph over their enemy. The Spanish admiral found, in many rencounters, that while he lost so considerable a part of his own navy, he had destroyed only one small vessel of the English; and he foresaw, that by continuing so unequal a combat, he must draw inevitable destruction on all the remainder. He prepared therefore to return homewards; but as the wind was contrary to his passage through the Channel, he resolved to sail northwards, and making the tour of the island, reach the Spanish harbours by the ocean. The English fleet followed him during some time; and had not their ammunition fallen short, by the negligence of the offices in supplying them, they had obliged the whole Armada to surrender at discretion. The duke of Medina had once taken that resolution; but was diverted from it by the advice of his confessor. This conclusion of the enterprize would have been more glorious to the English; but the event proved almost equally fatal to the Spaniards. A violent tempest overtook the Armada after it passed the Orkneys: the ships had already lost their anchors and were obliged to keep to sea: the mariners, unaccustomed to such hardships, and not able to govern such unwieldly vessels, yielded to the fury of the storm, and allowed their ships to drive either on the western isles of Scotland, or on the coast of Ireland, where they were miserably wrecked. Not one half of the navy returned to Spain; and the seamen as well as soldiers who remained, were so overcome with hardships and fatigue, and so dispirited by their discomfiture, that they filled all Spain with accounts of the desperate valour of the English, and of the tempestuous violence of that ocean which encompasses their islands.

Such was the miserable and dishonourable conclusion of an enterprize which had been preparing for three years, and which had exhausted the revenue and force of Spain, and which had long filled all Europe with anxiety or expectation. Philip, who was a slave to his ambition, but had an entire command over his countenance, no sooner heard of the mortifying event which blasted all his hopes, than he fell on his knees, and rendering thanks for that gracious dispensation of Providence, expressed his joy that the calamity was no greater. There is great reason, however, to doubt the truth of their accounts; particularly as Copley, an English refugee at the court of Madrid, expressly assures us, in his Memoirs, that Philip, who was at mass when he received the intelligence, evinced the greatest agitation; and immediately swore, upon the altar, that all his power and wealth should be employed to inflict vengeance upon England, and that he would either conquer that kingdom or lose his own. The duke of Medina was ordered not to appear at court; and, but for the interposition of his beautiful wife, it is probable he would have experienced a much severer punishment. All Spain was in tears; and there was scarcely a single family of distinction in the kingdom but had to deplore the loss of a husband, a parent, a child, or a relation. The Spanish priests, who had so often blest this holy crusade, and foretold its infallible success, were somewhat at a loss to account for the victory gained over the Catholic monarch by excommunicated heretics and an execrable usurper: but they at last discovered, that all the calamities of the Spaniards had proceeded from their allowing the infidel Moors to live among them.

On the 4th of September, soon after the dispersion of the Spanish Armada, died the earl of Leicester, the queen's great, but unworthy favourite. Her affection for him continued to the last. He had discovered no conduct in any of his military enterprizes, and was even suspected of cowardice; yet she entrusted him with the command of her armies during the danger of the Spanish invasion; a partiality which might have proved fatal to her, had the duke of Parma been able to land his troops in England. She had even ordered a commission to be drawn for him, constituting him her lieutenant in the kingdoms of England and Ireland; but Burleigh and Hatton represented to her the danger of entrusting such unlimited authority in the hands of any subject, and prevented the execution of that design. No wonder that a conduct so unlike the usual jealousy of Elizabeth, gave reason to suspect that her partiality was founded on some other passion than friendship. But Elizabeth seemed to carry her affection to Leicester no farther than the grave: she ordered his goods to be disposed of at a public sale, in order to reimburse herself of some debt which he owed her; and her usual attention to money was observed to prevail over her regard to the memory of the deceased. This earl was a great hypocrite, a pretender to the strictest religion, an encourager of the Puritans, and a founder of hospitals.

On the 4th of February, 1589, the queen summoned a new parliament; and received from them a supply of two subsidies and four fifteenths, payable in four years. This is the first instance that subsidies were doubled in one supply; and so unusual a concession was probably obtained from the joy of the late success, and from the general sense of the queen's necessities. Some members objected to this heavy charge, on account of the great burthen of loans which had lately been imposed upon the nation.

Elizabeth, suspecting that this house of commons, like all the foregoing, would be governed by the Puritans, resolved to obviate their enterprizes, by renewing, at the beginning of the session, her usual injunction, that the parliament should not on any account presume to treat of ecclesiastical affairs. Notwithstanding this strict inhibition, the zeal of one Damport moved him to present a bill to the commons for remedying spiritual grievances, and for restraining the tyranny of the ecclesiastical commission, which were certainly great: but when Mr. secretary Woley reminded the house of her majesty's commands, no one durst second the motion; the bill was not so much as read; and the speaker returned it to Damport without taking the least notice of it. Some members, notwithstanding the general submission, were even committed to custody on account of this attempt.

But the imperious conduct of Elizabeth appeared still more clearly in another parliamentary transaction. The right of purveyance was an ancient prerogative, by which the officers of the crown could at pleasure take provisions for the household from all the neighbouring counties, and could make use of the carts and carriages of the farmers; and the price of these commodities and services was fixed and stated. The payment of the money was often distant and uncertain; and the rates, being fixed before the discovery of the West-Indies, were much inferior to the present market price; so that purveyance, besides the slavery of it, was always regarded as a great burthen, and being arbitrary and casual, was liable to great abuses. We may fairly presume, that the hungry courtiers of Elizabeth, supported by her unlimited power, would be sure to render this prerogative very oppressive to the people; and the commons had last session found it necessary to pass a bill for regulating these exactions: but the bill was lost in the house of peers. The continuance of the abuses begat a new attempt for redress; and the same bill was now revived, and again sent up to the house of peers, together with a bill for some new regulations in the court of exchequer. Soon after the commons received a message from the upper house, desiring them to appoint a committee for a conference. At this conference, the peers informed them, that the queen, by a message delivered by lord Burleigh, had expressed her displeasure, that the commons should presume to touch on her prerogative. If there were any abuses, she said, either in imposing purveyance, or in the practice of the court of exchequer, her majesty was both able and willing to provide due reformation; but would not permit the parliament to intermeddle in these matters. The commons, alarmed at this intelligence, appointed another committee to attend the queen, and endeavoured to satisfy her of their humble and dutiful intentions. Elizabeth gave a gracious reception to the committee; she expressed her great inestimable loving care towards her loving subjects; which, she said, was greater than of her own self, or even than any of them could have of themselves. She told them, that she had already given orders for an inquiry into the abuses attending purveyance, but the dangers of the Spanish invasion had retarded the progress of the design; that she had as much skill, will, and power to rule her household as any subjects whatsoever to govern theirs, and needed as little the assistance of her neighbours; that the exchequer was her chamber, consequently more near to her than even her household, and therefore the less proper for them to intermeddle with; and that she would of herself, with advice of her council and the judges, redress every grievance in these matters, but would not permit the commons, by laws moved without her privity, to bereave her of the honour attending these regulations. The issue of this matter was the same that attended all contests between Elizabeth and her parliaments. She seems even to have been more imperious in this particular than her predecessors; at least the more remote ones: for they often permitted the abuses of purveyance (b) to be redressed by law. Edward III. a very arbitrary prince, allowed ten several statutes to be enacted for that purpose.

In so great awe did the commons stand of every courtier, as well as of the crown, that they durst use no freedom of speech which they thought would give the least offence to any of them. Sir Edward Hobby shewed in the house his extreme grief, that by some great personage, not a member of the house, he had been sharply rebuked for speeches delivered in parliament: he craved the favour of the house, and desired that some of the members might inform the great personage of his true meaning and intention in these speeches. The commons, to obviate these inconveniencies, passed a vote that no one should reveal the secrets of the house. An act was passed this session, enforcing the former statute, which imposed twenty pounds a month on every one absent from public worship: but the penalty was restricted to two-thirds of the income of the recusant. 29 Eliz. cap. 6.

The destruction of the Spanish Armada had begotten in the English nation a kind of enthusiastic passion for enterprizes against Spain; and nothing seemed now impossible to be achieved by the valour and fortune of the English. Don Antonio, prior of Crato, a natural son of the royal family of Portugal, trusting to the aversion of his countrymen against the Castilians, had advanced a claim to the crown; and flying first to France, thence to England, had been encouraged both by Henry and Elizabeth in his pretensions. A design was in consequence formed by the people, not by the court of England, to conquer the kingdom for don Antonio: sir Francis Drake and sir John Norris were the leaders in this romantic enterprize: near twenty thousand volunteers enlisted themselves in the service: and ships were hired, as well as arms provided, at the charge of the adventurers. The queen's frugality kept her from contributing more than sixty thousand pounds to the expence; and she only allowed six of her ships of war to attend the expedition. There was more spirit and bravery, than foresight or prudence, in the conduct of this undertaking; for the small stock of the adventurers did not enable them to purchase either provisions or ammunition sufficient for such an enterprize: they even wanted vessels to stow the numerous volunteers who crowded to them; and they therefore made bold to seize by force some ships of the Hanse Towns, which they met with at sea: an expedient which set them somewhat more at ease in point of room for their men, but remedied not the deficiency of their provisions. Had they sailed directly to Portugal, it is supposed, that the good-will of the people, joined to the defenceless state of the country, might have ensured them of success: but hearing that great preparations were making at the Groine for the invasion of England, they were induced to go thither and destroy this new armament of Spain. They broke into the harbour, burned some ships of war, particularly one commanded by Recalde, vice-admiral of Spain; they defeated an army of four or five thousand men, which was assembled to oppose them; they assaulted the Groine, and took the lower town, which they pillaged; and they would have taken the higher, though well fortified, had they not found their ammunition and provisions beginning to fail them. The young earl of Essex, a nobleman of promising hopes, fired with the thirst of military glory, had secretly, unknown to the queen, stolen from England, here joined the adventurers; and it was then agreed by common consent to make sail for Portugal, the main object of their expedition.

The English landed at Paniche, a sea-port town twelve leagues from Lisbon; and Norris led the army to that capital, while Drake undertook to sail up the river, and attack the city with united forces. By this time the court of Spain had prepared against the invasion; and forces were thrown into Lisbon; the Portuguese were disarmed; all suspected persons were taken into custody; and thus none of the inhabitants durst declare in favour of the invaders, however well disposed towards the pretensions of Don Antonio. The English army, however, made themselves masters of the suburbs, which abounded with riches of all kinds; but as they desired to conciliate the affections of the Portuguese, and were more intent on honour than profit, they observed a strict discipline, and abstained from plunder. In the mean time they found their ammunition and provisions much exhausted; they had not a single cannon to make a breach in the walls; the admiral had not even been able to pass some fortresses which guarded the river; there was no appearance of an insur-

(b) We may judge of the extent and importance of these abuses by a speech of Bacon's against purveyors, delivered in the first session of the first parliament of the subsequent reign, by which also we may learn, that Elizabeth had given no redress to the grievances complained of. "First," says he, "they take in kind what they ought not to take; secondly, they take in quantity a far greater proportion than cometh to your majesty's use; thirdly, they take in an unlawful manner, in a manner, I say, directly and expressly prohibited by the several laws. For the first, I am a little to alter their name; for instead of takers they become taxers: instead of taking provisions for your majesty's service, they tax your people ad redimendam vexationem; imposing upon them and extorting from them divers sums of money, sometimes in gross, sometimes in the nature of stipends annually paid, ne noceant, to be freed and eased of their oppression. Again, they take trees, which by law they cannot do; timber trees, which are the beauty, countenance, and shelter of men's houses; that men have long spared from their own purse and profit; that men esteem for their use and delight, above ten times their value; that are a loss which men cannot repair or recover. These do they take, to the defacing and spoiling of your subjects mansions and dwellings, except they may be compounded with to their own appetites. And if a gentleman be too hard for them while he is at home, they will watch their time when there is but a bailiff or a servant remaining, and put the axe to the root of the tree, ere ever the master can stop it. Again, they use a strange and most unjust exaction in causing the subjects to pay poundage of their own debts, due from your majesty unto them: so as a poor man, when he has had his hay, or his wood, or his poultry (which perchance he was full loath to part with, and had for the provision of his own family, and not to put to sale) taken from him, and that not a just price, but under the value, and cometh to receive his money, he shall have after the rate of twelve pence in the pound abated for poundage of his due payment upon so hard conditions. Nay, farther, they are grown to that extremity (as is affirmed, though it be scarce credible, save that in such persons all things are credible,) that they will take double poundage, once when the debenture is made, and again the second time, when the money is paid. For the second point, most gracious sovereign, touching the quantity which they take far above that which is answered to your majesty's use; it is affirmed unto me by divers gentlemen of good report, as a matter which I may safely vouch unto your majesty, that there is no pound profit which redoundeth unto your majesty in this course, but induceth and begetteth three pound damage upon your subjects, beside the discontentment. And to the end they may make their spoil more securely, what do they? Whereas divers statutes do strictly provide, that whatsoever they take shall be registered and attested, to the end that by making a collation of that which is taken from the country and that which is answered above, their deceits might appear, they, to the end to obscure their deceits, utterly omit the observation of this, which the law prescribeth. And therefore to descend, if it may please your majesty, to the third sort of abuse, which is of the unlawful manner of their taking, whereof this question is a branch; it is so manifold, as it rather asketh an enumeration of some of the particulars than a prosecution of all. For their price, by law they ought to take as they can agree with the subject; by abuse, they take at an imposed and enforced price: by law they ought to make but one apprizement by neighbours in the country; by abuse, they make a second apprizement at the court gate, and when the subjects cattle come up many miles, lean and out of plight by reason of their travel, then they prize them anew at an abated price: by law, they ought to take between sun and sun; by abuse, they take by twilight and in the night-time, a time well chosen for malefactors; by law they ought not to take in the highways, (a place by her majesty's high prerogative protected, and by statute by special words excepted;) by abuse, they take in the highways: by law, they ought to shew their commission, &c. A number of other particulars there are, &c." Bacon's Works, vol. iv. p. 305, 306.

Such were the abuses which Elizabeth would neither permit her parliaments to meddle with, nor redress herself. It will, however, be readily admitted, that this slight prerogative alone, which has passed almost unobserved amidst other branches of so much greater importance, was sufficient to extinguish all regular liberty. For what elector, or member of parliament, or even juryman, durst oppose the will of the court, while he lay under the lash of such an arbitrary prerogative? For a farther account of the grievous and incredible oppressions of purveyors, see the Journals of the House of Commons, vol. i. p. 190. There is a story of a carter which may be worth mentioning on this occasion. "A carter had three times been at Windsor with his cart to carry away, upon summons of a remove, some part of the stuff of her majesty's wardrobe; and when he had repaired thither once, twice, and the third time, and that they of the wardrobe had told him the third time that the remove held not, the carter, clapping his hand on his thigh, said, Now I see that the queen is a woman as well as my wife? Which words being overheard by her majesty, who then stood at the window, she said, What a villain is this? and so sent him three angels to stop his mouth." rection in their favour; sickness, from fatigue, hunger, and intemperance in wine and fruits, had seized the army: so that it was found necessary to make all possible haste to re-embark. They were not pursued by the enemy; and finding at the mouth of the river, sixty ships laden with naval stores, they seized them as lawful prize; though they belonged to the Hanse Towns, a neutral power. They sailed thence to Vigo, which they took and burned; and having ravaged the country around, they set sail and arrived in England. Above half of these gallant adventurers perished by sickness, famine, fatigue, and the sword; and England reaped more honour than profit from this extraordinary enterprize. It is computed that eleven hundred gentlemen embarked on board the fleet, and that only three hundred and fifty survived those multiplied disasters.

When these ships were on their voyage homewards, they met with the earl of Cumberland, who was outward bound, with a fleet of seven sail, all equipped at his own charge, except one ship of war which the queen had lent him. That nobleman supplied sir Francis Drake with some provisions; a generosity which saved the lives of many of Drake's men, but for which the others afterwards suffered severely. Cumberland sailed towards the Terceras, and took several prizes from the enemy; but the richest, valued at a hundred thousand pounds, perished in her return, with all her cargo, near St. Michael's Mount in Cornwal. Many of these adventurers were killed in a rash attempt at the Terceras; a great mortality seized the rest: and it was with difficulty that the few hands which remained were able to work the ships back to England.

The advantages gained over the Spaniards, and the spirit thence infused into the English, gave Elizabeth great security during the rest of her reign, yet she could not forbear keeping an anxious eye on Scotland, whose situation rendered its revolutions always of importance to her. It might have been expected, that this high spirited princess, who knew so well to brave danger, would not have retained that malignant jealousy towards her heir, with which, during the life-time of Mary, she had been so much agitated. James had indeed succeeded to all the claims of his mother; but he had not succeeded to the favour of the Catholics, which could alone render these claims dangerous: and as the queen was now advanced in years, and enjoyed an unlimited authority over her subjects, it was not likely that the king of Scots, who was of an indolent unambitious temper, would give her the least disturbance in her possession of the throne. Yet these circumstances could not remove her fearful suspicions: indeed so far from satisfying the nation by a settlement of the succession, or a declaration of James's title, she was as anxious to hinder every incident which might in any measure raise his credit, or procure him the regard of the English, as if he had been her immediate rival and competitor. Most of his ministers and favourites were her pensioners; and as she was desirous to prevent him from marrying and having children, she obliged him to throw obstacles in the way of every alliance, even the most reasonable, which could be offered him; and during some years she succeeded in this malignant policy. He had fixed on the elder daughter of the king of Denmark, who being a remote prince and not powerful, could give her no umbrage; yet did she so artfully cross this negociation, that the Danish monarch, impatient of delay, married his daughter to the duke of Brunswick. James then renewed his suit to the younger princess; and still found obstacles from the intrigues of Elizabeth, who, merely with a view of interposing delay, proposed to him the sister of the king of Navarre, a princess much older than himself, and entirely destitute of fortune. The young king, besides the desire of securing himself by the prospect of issue, from those traiterous attempts, too frequent among his subjects, had been so watched by the rigid austerity of the ecclesiastics, that he had another inducement to marry, which is not so usual with monarchs. His impatience therefore broke through all the politics of Elizabeth: the articles of marriage were settled: the ceremony was performed by proxy: and the princess embarked for Scotland; but was driven by a storm into a port of Norway (c). Although James was a great believer in sorcery, to which these storms were attributed, yet he was not deterred from taking a voyage in order to conduct his bride home: he arrived in Norway; carried the queen thence to Copenhagen; and having passed the winter in that city, he brought her next spring to Scotland, where they were joyfully received by the people. The clergy alone, who never neglected an opportunity of vexing their prince, made opposition to the queen's coronation, on account of the ceremony of anointing her, which they alleged was either a Jewish or a Popish rite; and therefore utterly antichristian and unlawful. But James was as much bent on the ceremony as they were averse to it; and after much controversy and many intrigues, his authority, which had not often happened, at last prevailed over the opposition of the dissatisfied ecclesiastics.

At length, in the beginning of 1590, after a state of great anxiety and many difficulties, Elizabeth had reached a situation where, though her affairs still required attention, and found ample employment for her active spirit, she was removed from all danger of any immediate revolution, and might regard the efforts of her enemies with some degree of confidence and security. Her successful and prudent administration had gained her, together with the admiration of foreigners, the affections of her own subjects; and after the death of the queen of Scots, even the Catholics, however discontented, pretended not to dispute her title, or adhere to any other person as her competitor. James, curbed by his factious nobility and ecclesiastics, possessed in his own country very little authority; and was solicitous to remain on good terms with Elizabeth and the English nation, in hopes that time, aided by his patient tranquillity, would secure him that rich succession to which by birth he was entitled. The Hollanders, though over-matched in their contest with Spain, still made an obstinate resistance; and such was their unconquerable antipathy to their old masters, and such the prudent conduct of young Maurice, their governor, that the subduing of that small territory, if at all possible, must be the work of years, and the result of many and great successes. Philip, who, in his powerful effort against England, had been transported by resentment and ambition beyond his usual cautious maxims, was now disabled, and still more discouraged, from adventuring again on such hazardous enterprizes. The situation also of affairs in France began principally to employ his attention; but notwithstanding all his artifice, and force, and expence, the events in that kingdom proved every day more adverse to his expectations, and more favourable to the friends and confederates of England.

The violence of the league having constrained Henry to declare war against the Hugonots, these religionists seemed exposed to the utmost danger; and Elizabeth, sensible of the intimate connexion between her own interests and those of the French Protestants, had supported the king of Navarre by her negociations in Germany, and by large sums of money, which she remitted for levying forces in that country. This great prince, not discouraged by the superiority of his enemies, took the field; and in 1587 gained at Coutras, a complete victory over the army of the French king; but as his allies, the Germans, were at the same time discomfited by the army of the league under the duke of Guise, his situation, notwithstanding his victory, seemed still as desperate as ever. The chief advantage which he reaped by this diversity of success, arose from the dissensions which by that means took place among his enemies. The inhabitants of Paris, as it were intoxicated with admiration of Guise, and strongly prejudiced against their king, whose intentions had become suspicious to them, took to arms, and obliged Henry to fly for his safety to a distant part of his kingdom. That prince, dissembling his resentment, entered into a negociation with the league; and having conferred many high offices on Guise and his partizans, summoned an assembly of the states at Blois, on pretence of finding expedients to support the intended war against the Hugonots. The various scenes of perfidy and cruelty, which had been exhibited in France, had justly begotten a mutual diffidence among all parties; yet the duke of Guise, trusting more to the timidity than to the honour of the king, rashly put himself into the hands of that monarch, and expected, by the ascendant of his own genius, to make him submit to all his exorbitant pretensions. Henry, though of an easy disposition, not steady to his resolutions, or even to his promises, wanted neither courage nor capacity; and finding all his subtilties eluded by the vigour of Guise, and even his throne exposed to the most imminent danger, he embraced more violent counsels than were natural to him, and ordered that prince and his brother, the cardinal of Guise, to be assassinated in his palace.

This cruel execution, which the necessity of it alone could excuse, had nearly proved fatal to the French monarch, and seemed at first to plunge him into greater dangers than those which he sought to avoid by taking vengeance on his enemy. The partizans of the league were inflamed with the utmost rage against him: the populace every where, particularly in his capital, renounced allegiance to him: the ecclesiastics and the preachers filled all places with execrations against his name; and the most powerful cities, and most opulent provinces, appeared to combine in a resolution, either of renouncing monarchy, or of changing their monarch. Henry, finding slender resources among his Catholic subjects, was constrained to enter into a confederacy with the Hugonots and the king of Navarre: he therefore enlisted large bodies of Swiss infantry and German cavalry: and being still supported by his chief nobility, he assembled by all these means an army of near forty thousand men, and advanced to the gates of Paris, ready to crush the league, and subdue all his enemies. The desperate resolution of one man diverted the course of these great events. Jaques Clement, a Dominican frier, inflamed by that infernal spirit of bigotry which distinguishes this century, and a great part of the following, beyond all ages of the world, embraced the resolution of sacrificing his own life, in order to save the holy mother church from the persecutions of an heretical tyrant; and being admitted, under some pretext, to the king's presence, he gave that prince a mortal wound, and was immediately put to death by the courtiers, who hastily revenged the murder of their sovereign. This memorable incident happened on the first of August, 1589.

The king of Navarre was the next heir to the crown, and he assumed the government by the title of Henry IV. but succeeded to much greater difficulties than those which surrounded his predecessor Henry III. The prejudices entertained against his religion made a great part of the nobility immediately desert him; and it was only by his promise of hearkening to conferences and instruction, that he could engage any of the Catholics to adhere to his undoubted title. The league, governed by the duke of Mayenne, brother to Guise, gathered new vigour; and the king of Spain entertained views, either of dismembering the French monarchy, or of annexing the whole to his own dominions. In these distressful circumstances Henry addressed himself to Elizabeth, and found her well disposed to contribute to his assistance, and to oppose the progress of the Catholic league, and of Philip, her inveterate and dangerous enemies. To prevent the desertion of the Swiss and German auxiliaries, she made him a present of twenty-two thousand pounds; a greater sum than, as he declared, he had ever seen before; and she sent him a reinforcement of four thousand men, under lord Willoughby, an officer of great reputation, who joined the French at Dieppe, in Normandy, in 1590. Strengthened by these supplies, Henry marched immediately to Paris; and having taken the suburbs sword in hand, he abandoned them to his soldiers, by whom they were pillaged. He employed this body of English in many other enterprizes; and still found reason to praise their courage and fidelity. The time of service at length being elapsed, he dismissed them with many high commendations. Sir William Drury, sir Thomas Baskerville, and sir John Boroughs acquired reputation this campaign, and revived in France the ancient fame of English valour.

The army, which Henry next campaign led into the field, was greatly inferior to that of the league; but as it was composed of the chief nobility of France, he feared not to encounter his enemies in a pitched battle at Yvrée, and he gained a complete victory over them. This success enabled him to blockade Paris, and he reduced that capital to the last extremity of famine; when the duke of Parma, in consequence of orders from Philip, marched to the relief of the league, and obliged Henry to raise the blockade. Having performed this important service, he retreated to the Low Countries; and, by his consummate skill in the art of war, performed these long marches in the face of the enemy, without affording the French monarch that opportunity which he sought, of giving him battle, or so much as once putting his army in disorder. The only loss which he sustained was in the Low Countries; where prince Maurice took advantage of his absence, and recovered some places which the duke of Parma had formerly conquered from the States (d).

The situation of Henry's affairs, in the beginning of 1591, though promising, was not so well advanced or established as to make the queen discontinue her succours, and she was still more confirmed in the resolution of supporting him by some advantages gained by the king of Spain. The duke of Mercœur, governor of Britanny, a prince of the house of Lorraine, had declared for the league; and finding himself hard pressed by Henry's forces, he had been obliged, in order to secure himself, to introduce some Spanish troops into the sea-port towns of that province. Elizabeth took alarm at this circumstance; and apprehended, that the Spaniards, besides infesting the English commerce by privateers, might employ these harbours as the seat of their naval preparations, and might more easily from that vicinity, than from Spain or Portugal, project an invasion of England. She therefore concluded a new treaty with Henry, in which she engaged to send over three thousand men, to be employed in the reduction of Britanny, and she stipulated that her charges should, in a twelvemonth, or as soon as the enemy was expelled, be refunded her. The English forces were commanded by sir John Norris, and under him by his brother Henry, and by Anthony Shirley. Sir Roger Williams was at the head of a small body which garrisoned Dieppe; and a squadron of ships, under the command of sir Henry Palmer, lay upon the coast of France, and intercepted all the vessels belonging to the Spaniards or the leaguers.

But as the operations of war can be little regulated beforehand by any treaty or agreement; and as Henry found it necessary to lay aside the projected enterprize against Britanny, he persuaded the English commanders to join his army, and to take a share in the hostilities which he carried into Picardy. Notwithstanding the disgust which Elizabeth received from this disappointment, he laid before her a plan for expelling the leaguers from Normandy, and persuaded her to send over a new body of four thousand men to assist him in that enterprize. The earl of Essex was appointed general of these forces; a young nobleman, who, by many exterior accomplishments, and still more real merit, was daily advancing in favour with Elizabeth, and seemed to occupy that place in her affections which Leicester, now deceased, had so long enjoyed. Essex, impatient for military fame, was extremely uneasy to lie some time at Dieppe unemployed; and had not the orders which he received from his mistress been so positive, he would gladly have accepted of Henry's invitation, and have marched to join the French army at that time in Champagne. This plan of operations was also proposed to Elizabeth by the French ambassador; but she rejected it with great displeasure; and threatened immediately to recal her troops, if Henry should persevere any longer in his present practice, of breaking all concert with her, and attending to nothing but his own interests. Urged by these motives, not long after the arrival of the earl of Essex, the French king led his army into Normandy, and laid siege to Roüen, which he reduced to great difficulties. But the league, unable of themselves to take the field against him, had again recourse to the duke of Parma, who received orders to march to their relief. He executed this enterprize with his usual abilities and success; and, for the present, frustrated all the projects of Henry and Elizabeth. This princess, who kept still in view the interests of her own kingdom in all her foreign transactions, was impatient under these disappointments, blamed Henry for his negligence in the execution of treaties, and complained that the English forces were thrust foremost in every hazardous undertaking. It is probable, however, that their own ardent courage, and their desire of distinguishing themselves in so celebrated a theatre of war, were the causes why they so often enjoyed this perilous honour.

Notwithstanding the indifferent success of former expeditions, the queen was sensible how necessary it was to support Henry against the league and the Spaniards; she therefore formed a new treaty with him, in which they agreed never to make peace with Philip but by common consent; she promised to send him a new supply of four thousand men; and he stipulated to repay her charges in a twelvemonth, to employ these forces, joined to a body of French troops, in an expedition against Britanny, and to consign into her hands a sea-port town of that province, for a retreat to the English. Henry knew the impossibility of executing some of these articles, and the imprudence of fulfilling others; but finding them rigidly insisted on by Elizabeth, he accepted of the succours she offered, and trusted that he might easily, on some pretence, be able to excuse his failure in executing his part of the treaty. This campaign was the least successful of all those which he had yet carried on against the league.

While these military operations were carrying on in France, Elizabeth employed her naval power against Philip, and endeavoured by every possible means to intercept his West Indian treasure, the source of that greatness which had rendered him so formidable to all his neighbours. She sent a squadron of seven ships, under the command of lord Thomas Howard for this service; but the king of Spain, informed of her purpose, fitted out a great force of fifty-five sail, and dispatched them to escort the Indian fleet. They fell in with the English squadron; and, by the courageous obstinacy of sir Richard Grenville, the vice-admiral, who refused to make his escape by flight, they took one vessel, the first English ship of war that had yet fallen into the hands of the Spaniards (e). The rest of the squadron returned safely into England; frustrated of their expectations, but solacing themselves with the idea that their attempt had not been altogether fruitless in doing mischief to the enemy. The Indian fleet had been so long detained in the Havanna from the fear of the English naval power, that they were obliged at last to set sail in an improper season, and most of them perished by shipwreck before they reached the Spanish harbours. The earl of Cumberland made a like unsuccessful enterprize against the Spanish trade. He carried out one ship of the queen's, and seven others equipped at his own expence; but the prizes which he made did not compensate the charges.

The spirit of these expensive and hazardous adventures was very prevalent in England. Sir Walter Raleigh, who had enjoyed great favour with Elizabeth, finding his interest begin to decline, determined to recover her good graces by some important undertaking; and as his reputation was high among his countrymen, he persuaded great numbers to engage with him as volunteers in an attempt on the West Indies, in 1592. The fleet was detained so long in the Channel by contrary winds, that the season was lost: Raleigh was recalled by the queen: sir Martin Frobisher succeeded to the command, and made a privateering voyage against the Spaniards. He took one rich carrack near the island of Flores, and destroyed another. About the same time Thomas White, a Londoner, took two Spanish ships, which, besides fourteen hundred chests of quicksilver, contained above two millions of bulls for indulgences (f).

Although this war did great damage to Spain, it was attended with considerable expence to England; and Elizabeth's ministers computed, that since the commencement of it, she had spent in Flanders and France, and on her naval expeditions, above one million two hundred thousand pounds; a charge which, notwithstanding her extreme frugality, was too burdensome for her narrow revenues to support. She summoned therefore a parliament, in February, 1593, in order to obtain a supply: but she either thought her authority so established that she needed to make them no concessions in return, or she rated her power and prerogative above money: for there never was any parliament whom she treated in a more haughty manner, whom she made more sensible of their own weakness, or whose privileges she more openly violated. When the speaker, sir Edward Coke, made the three usual requests, of freedom from arrests, of access to her person, and of liberty of speech, she replied to him by the mouth of Puckering, lord keeper, that liberty of speech was granted to the commons, but they must know what liberty they were entitled to; not a liberty for every one to speak what he listeth, or what cometh in his brain to utter; their privilege extended no farther than a liberty of Aye or No; that she enjoined the speaker, if he perceived any idle heads so negligent of their own safety as to attempt reforming the church, or innovating in the commonwealth, that he should refuse the bills exhibited for that purpose, till they were examined by such as were fitter to consider of these things, and could better judge of them: that she would not impeach the freedom of their persons; but they must beware lest, under colour of this privilege, they imagined that any neglect of their duty could be covered or protected: and that she would not refuse them access to her person, provided it were upon urgent and weighty causes, and at times convenient, and when she might have leisure from other important affairs of the realm.

But notwithstanding the menacing and contemptuous air of this speech, the intrepid and indefatigable Peter Wentworth, not discouraged by his former ill success, ventured to transgress the imperial orders of Elizabeth. He presented to the lord keeper a petition, in which he desired the upper house to join with the lower in a supplication to her majesty for entailing the succession of the crown; and he declared that he had a bill ready prepared for that purpose. This method of proceeding was sufficiently respectful and cautious; but the subject was always extremely disagreeable to the queen, and what she had expressly prohibited any one from meddling with: she therefore sent Wentworth immediately to the Tower; committed sir Thomas Bromley, who had seconded him, to the Fleet prison, together with Stevens and Welsh, two members to whom sir Thomas had communicated his intention. About a fortnight after, a motion was made in the house, to petition the queen for the release of these members; but it was answered by all the privy-counsellors there present, that her majesty had committed them for causes best known to herself, and that to press her on that head would only tend to the prejudice of the gentlemen whom they meant to serve: she would release them whenever she thought proper, and would be better pleased to do it of her own proper motion, than from their suggestion. So great was the queen's power, or so servile the house, that the members readily acquiesced in this reasoning.

Such an arbitrary act, at the commencement of the session, might well repress all farther attempts for freedom: but the religious zeal of the Puritans was not so easily restrained; and it inspired a courage which no human motive was able to surmount. Morrice, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and attorney of the court of wards, made a motion for redressing the abuses in the bishops' courts, but above all, in the high commission court; where subscriptions, he said, were exacted to articles at the pleasure of the prelates; where oaths were imposed, obliging persons to answer to all questions without distinction, even though they should tend to their own

(e) This action of sir Richard Grenville is so singular as to merit a more particular relation. He was engaged alone with the whole Spanish fleet of fifty-three sail, which had ten thousand men on board; and from the time the fight began, which was about three in the afternoon, to the break of day next morning, he repulsed the enemy fifteen times, though they continually shifted their vessels, and boarded with fresh men. In the beginning of the action he himself received a wound; but he continued doing his duty above deck till eleven at night, when receiving a fresh wound, he was carried down to be dressed. During this operation he received a shot in the head, and the surgeon was killed by his side. The English began now to want powder; all their small arms were broken or become useless: of this number, which were but a hundred and three at first, forty were killed, and almost all the rest wounded; their masts were beat overboard, their tackle cut in pieces, and nothing but a hulk left, unable to move one way or other. In this situation sir Richard proposed to the ship's company, to trust to the mercy of God, not to that of the Spaniards, and to destroy the ship with themselves, rather than yield to the enemy. The master gunner, and many of the seamen, agreed to this desperate resolution; but others opposed it, and obliged Grenville to surrender himself prisoner. He died a few days after; and his last words were: "Here die I, Richard Grenville, with a joyful and quiet mind; for that I have ended my life as a true soldier ought to do, fighting for his country, queen, religion, and honour: my soul willingly departing from this body, leaving behind the lasting fame of having behaved as every valiant soldier is in his duty bound to do." The Spaniards lost in this sharp, though unequal action, four ships, and about a thousand men. And Grenville's vessel perished soon after with two hundred Spaniards on board of her. See Hacluyt's Voyages, vol. ii. part 2. p. 169. Camden, p. 565.

(f) This commodity was useless to the English, but it had cost the king of Spain three hundred thousand florins, and would have been sold by him in the Indies for five millions.

crimination; and where every one who refused entire satisfaction to the commissioners was imprisoned, without relief or remedy. This motion was seconded by some members; but the ministers and privy-counsellors opposed it, and foretold the consequences which ensued. The queen sent for the speaker, and after requiring him to deliver to her Morrice's bill, she told him that it was in her power to call parliaments, in her power to dissolve them, in her power to give assent or dissent to any determination which they should form: that her purpose in summoning this parliament was twofold, to have laws enacted for the farther enforcement of uniformity in religion, and to provide for the defence of the nation against the exorbitant power of the Spanish monarch: that these two points ought, therefore, to be the object of their deliberations: she had enjoined them already by the mouth of the lord keeper, to meddle neither with matters of state nor religion; and she wondered how any one could be so assuming as to attempt a subject so expressly contrary to her prohibition: that she was highly offended with this presumption; and took the present opportunity to reiterate the commands given by the keeper, and to require that no bill, regarding either state affairs, or reformation in causes ecclesiastical, be exhibited in the house: and that, in particular, she charged the speaker upon his allegiance, if any such bills were offered, absolutely to refuse them a reading, and not so much as permit them to be debated by the members. This command from the queen was submitted to without farther question. Morrice was seized in the house itself by a serjeant at arms, discharged from his office of chancellor of the duchy, incapacitated from any practice in his profession as a common lawyer, and kept some years prisoner in Tilbury castle.

The queen having thus expressly pointed out both what the house should and should not do, the commons were as obsequious to the one as to the other of her injunctions. They passed an act intitled, "An act to retain her majesty's subjects in their due obedience." This was a law expressly made against recusants, and was indeed such a law as was suited to the severe character of Elizabeth, and to the persecuting spirit of the age. It was meant, as the preamble declares, to obviate such inconveniences and perils as might grow from the wicked practices of seditious sectaries and disloyal persons: for these two species of criminals were always, at that time confounded together, as equally dangerous to the peace of society. It was enacted, that any person above sixteen years of age, who obstinately refused during the space of a month to attend public worship, should be committed to prison; that if after being condemned for this offence, he persist three months in his refusal, he must abjure the realm; and that if he either refuse this condition, or return after banishment, he should suffer capitally as a felon without benefit of clergy (g). This law bore equally hard upon the Puritans and upon the Catholics; and, had it not been imposed by the queen's authority, was certainly in that respect, much contrary to the private sentiments and inclinations of the majority of the members of the house of commons. Very little opposition, however, appears there to have been openly made to it (h).

The expences of the war with Spain, as before mentioned, having reduced the queen to great difficulties, the grant of subsidies seems to have been the most important business of this parliament; and it was a signal proof of the high spirit of Elizabeth that, while conscious of a present dependence on the commons, she opened the session with the most haughty treatment of them, and covered her weakness under such a lofty appearance of superiority. The commons, however, notwithstanding the queen's haughty and imperious behaviour, readily voted two subsidies and four fifteenths; but this sum not appearing sufficient to the court, an unusual expedient was fallen upon to induce them to make an enlargement in their concessions. The peers informed the commons in a conference, that they could not give their assent to the supply voted, thinking it too small for the queen's occasions: they therefore proposed a grant of three subsidies and six fifteenths; and desired a farther conference in order to persuade the commons to agree to this measure. But this measure gave offence to the commons, who had acquired the privilege of beginning bills of subsidy, insomuch, that on account of this procedure of the lords, they at first absolutely rejected the proposal; but being afraid, on reflection, that they had by this refusal given offence to their superiors, they both agreed to the conference, and afterwards voted the additional subsidy.

The queen, notwithstanding this unusual concession of the commons, ended the session with a speech, containing some reprimands to them, and full of the same high pretensions which she had assumed at the opening of the parliament. She took notice, by the mouth of the lord keeper, that certain members spent more time than was necessary; by indulging themselves in harangues and reasonings: and she expressed her displeasure on account of their not paying due reverence to privy-counsellors, "who," she told them, "were not to be accounted as common knights and burgesses of the house, who are counsellors but during the parliament: whereas the others are standing counsellors, and for their wisdom and great service are called to the council of the state." The queen also, in her own person, made the parliament a spirited harangue; in which she spoke of the justice and moderation of her government, expressed the small ambition she had ever entertained of making conquests, displayed the just grounds of her quarrel with the king of Spain, and discovered how little she apprehended the power of that monarch, even though he should make a greater effort against her than that of his invincible Armada. "But I am informed," added she, "that when he attempted this last invasion, some upon the sea coast forsook their towns, fled up higher into the country, and left all naked and exposed to his entrance: but I swear unto you, by God, if I knew those persons, or may know of any that shall do so hereafter, I will make them feel what it is to be so fearful in so urgent a cause." By this menace, she probably gave the people to understand, that she would execute martial law upon such cowards: for there was no statute by which a man could be punished for changing his place of abode.

The king of France, though he had hitherto made war on the league with great bravery and reputation, though he had this campaign gained considerable advantages over them, and though he was assisted by a considerable body of English under Norris, who carried hostilities into the heart of Britanny, was become sensible that he never could by force of arms alone render himself master of his kingdom. The nearer he seemed by his military successes to approach to a full possession of the throne, the more discontent and jealousy arose among those of the Catholic persuasion who adhered to him; and a party was formed in his own court to elect some Catholic monarch of the royal blood, if Henry should any longer refuse to satisfy them by declaring his conversion to the church of Rome. This prince was far from being a bigot to his sect; and as the Hugonots, who formed the bravest and most faithful part of his army, were determined zealots, he apprehended, that if he had at that time abjured their faith, they would instantly have abandoned him to the pretensions and usurpations of the Catholics. The more bigoted Catholics, he knew, particularly those of the league, had entertained an unsurmountable prejudice against his person, and diffidence of his sincerity, so that even his abjuration would not reconcile them to his title; and he must either expect to be entirely excluded from the throne, or be admitted to it on such terms as would leave him little more than the shadow of royalty. In this delicate situation he had resolved to temporize; to retain the Hugonots by continuing in the profession of their religion; to gain the moderate Catholics by giving them hopes of his conversion; to attach both to his person by conduct and success; and he hoped either that the animosity arising from war against the league, would make them drop gradually the question of religion, or that he might in time, after some victories over his enemies and some conferences with divines, make finally, with more decency and dignity, that abjuration, which must have appeared at first mean as well as suspicious to both parties.

Taking into consideration all the circumstances which agitated his kingdom, and which seemed likely to exclude him from the throne, if the Catholic party should prevail, (and they were by far the most numerous in his dominions,) he at length determined to renounce the Protestant religion, and was solemnly received by the French prelates into the bosom of the church.

Elizabeth, who was herself attached to the Protestants, chiefly

chiefly by her interests and the circumstances of her birth, and who seems to have entertained some propensity during her whole life to the Catholic superstition, at least to the ceremonies of that church, pretended to be extremely displeased with this abjuration of Henry; and she wrote him an angry letter, reproaching him with this interested change of his religion. Sensible, however, that the league and the king of Spain were still their common enemies, she hearkened to his apologies; continued her succours both of men and money; and formed a new treaty, in which they mutually stipulated never to make peace but by common consent.

The intrigues of the Spanish court were not confined to France and England. By means of the never-failing pretence of religion, joined to the influence of money, Philip excited new disorders in Scotland, and gave fresh alarms to Elizabeth. George Ker, brother to lord Newbottle, had been taken, while he was passing secretly into Spain; and papers were found about him, by which a dangerous conspiracy of some Catholic noblemen with Philip was discovered. The earls of Angus, Errol, and Huntley, the heads of three potent families, had entered into a confederacy with the Spanish monarch; and had stipulated to raise all their forces; to join them to a body of Spanish troops, which Philip promised to send into Scotland; and after re-establishing the Catholic religion in that kingdom, to march with their united power in order to effect the same purpose in England. Graham of Fintry, who had also entered in this conspiracy, was taken, arraigned, and executed. Elizabeth sent lord Borough ambassador into Scotland, and exhorted the king to exercise the same severity on the three earls, to confiscate their estates, and by annexing them to the crown, both increase his own demesnes, and set an example to all his subjects of the dangers attending treason and rebellion. In this dilemma James applied to his neighbour Elizabeth for assistance; but so far was she from giving him any aid, that she rather contributed to increase his inquietude, by countenancing the turbulent disposition of the earl of Bothwel, a nobleman descended from a natural son of James V. Bothwel more than once attempted to render himself master of the king's person; and being expelled the kingdom for these traitorous enterprizes, he took shelter in England, was secretly protected by the queen, and lurked near the borders, where his power lay, with a view of still committing some new violence. He succeeded at last in an attempt on the king; and, by the mediation of the English ambassador, imposed dishonourable terms upon that prince: but James, by the authority of the convention of states, annulled this agreement as extorted by violence; again expelled Bothwel; and obliged him to take shelter in England. Elizabeth pretended ignorance of the place of his retreat, and never executed the treaties, by which she was bound to deliver up all the rebels and fugitives to the king of Scotland. During these disorders, increased by the refractory disposition of the ecclesiastics, the prosecution of the Catholic earls remained in suspense; but at length the parliament passed an act of attainder against them, in 1594, and the king prepared himself to execute it by force of arms. The noblemen, though they obtained a victory over the earl of Argyle, who acted by the king's commission, found themselves hard pressed by James himself, and agreed on certain terms to leave the kingdom. Bothwel, being detected in a confederacy with them, forfeited the favour of Elizabeth; and was obliged to take shelter first in France, then in Italy, where he died some years after in great poverty.

The queen's established authority secured her from all such attempts as James was exposed to from the mutinous disposition of his subjects; and her enemies found no other means of giving her domestic disturbance than by such traitorous and perfidious machinations as ended in their own disgrace, and in the ruin of their criminal instruments. Roderigo Lopez, a Jew, domestic physician to the queen, being imprisoned on suspicion, confessed that he had received a bribe to poison her from the count de Fuentes and Ibarra, who had succeeded the duke of Parma, lately deceased, in the government of the Netherlands. For the murder of the queen they were to have received fifty thousand ducats from the king of Spain; but Roderigo Lopez maintained, that he had no other intention than to cheat Philip of his money, and never meant to fulfil his engagement. He was, however, executed at Tyburn for the conspiracy; and the queen complained to Philip of these dishonourable attempts of his ministers, but could obtain no satisfaction. York and Williams, two English traitors, were afterwards executed for a conspiracy with Ibarra, equally atrocious.

Instead of avenging herself, by retaliating in a like manner, Elizabeth sought a more honourable vengeance, by supporting the king of France, and assisting him in finally breaking the force of the league, which, after the conversion of that monarch, went daily to decay, and was threatened with speedy ruin and dissolution. Norris commanded the English forces in Britanny, and assisted at the taking of Morlaix, Quimpercorentin, and Brest, towns garrisoned by Spanish forces. In every action, the English, though they had so long enjoyed domestic peace, discovered a strong military disposition; and the queen, though herself a heroine, found more frequent occasion to reprove her generals for encouraging their temerity, than for countenancing their fear or caution: sir Martin Frobisher, her brave admiral, perished with many others before Brest. Morlaix had been promised to the English for a place of retreat; but the duke d'Aumont, the French general, eluded this promise, by making it to be inserted in the capitulation, that none but Catholics should be admitted into that city.

In 1595, the French king, who had long carried on hostilities with Philip, was at last provoked, by the taking of Chatelet and Dourlens, and the attack of Cambray, to declare war against that monarch. Elizabeth being threatened with a new invasion in England, and with an insurrection in Ireland, recalled most of her forces, and sent Norris, who commanded her forces in Britanny, to take the lead of those in Ireland. Finding also, that the French league was almost dissolved, and that the most considerable leaders had made an accommodation with their prince, she thought that he could well support himself by his own force and valour; and she began to be more sparing in his cause of the blood and treasure of her subjects.

Elizabeth had become disgusted by some transactions of the States of Holland, joined to the remonstrances of her minister Burleigh, made her also inclined to diminish her charges on that side; and she even demanded, in 1596, by her ambassador, sir Thomas Bodley, to be reimbursed all the money which she had expended in supporting them. The States, besides alleging the conditions of the treaty, by which they were not bound to repay her till the conclusion of a peace, pleaded the poverty and distress they were then in, the great superiority of the Spaniards, and the difficulty in supporting the war; much more in being able to discharge such considerable sums as they owed to Elizabeth. After much negociation, a new treaty was formed; by which the States engaged to free the queen immediately from the charge of the English auxiliaries, computed at forty thousand pounds a-year; to pay her annually twenty thousand pounds for some years; to assist her with a certain number of ships; and to conclude no peace or treaty without her consent. They also bound themselves, on concluding a peace with Spain, to pay her annually the sum of a hundred thousand pounds for four years; but on this condition, that the payment should be in lieu of all demands, and that they should be supplied, though at their own charge, with a body of four thousand auxiliaries from England.

Elizabeth, however, retained in her hands the cautionary towns, which were a great check on the rising power of the States; and she committed the important trust of Flushing to sir Francis Vere, a brave officer, who had distinguished himself by his valour in the Low Countries. She gave him the preference to Essex, who expected so honourable a command; and though this nobleman was daily rising both in reputation with the people, and in favour with herself, the queen thought proper on this occasion to give him a refusal. Sir Thomas Baskerville was sent over to France at the head of two thousand English, with which Elizabeth, by a new treaty concluded with Henry, engaged to supply that prince. Some stipulations for mutual assistance were formed by the treaty; and all former engagements were renewed. This body of English were maintained at the expence of the French king; yet did Henry esteem the supply of considerable advantage, on account of the great reputation acquired by the English in so many fortunate enterprizes undertaken against the common enemy. In the great battle of Tournholt, gained in 1597, by prince Maurice, the English auxiliaries under sir Francis Vere and sir Robert Sydney had acquired great honour; and the success of that day was universally ascribed to their valour.

Though

Though Elizabeth, at a considerable expence of blood and treasure, made war against Philip in France and the Low Countries, the most severe blows which she gave him were by those naval expeditions which either she or her subjects scarcely ever intermitted during one season. In 1594, Richard Hawkins, son of sir John, the famous navigator, procured the queen's commission, and sailed with three ships to the South Sea by the Straits of Magelhaens; but his voyage proved unfortunate, and he himself was taken prisoner on the coast of Chili. James Lancaster was supplied the same year with three ships and a pinnace by the merchants of London; and was more fortunate in his adventure. He took thirty-nine ships of the enemy; but not content with this success, he made an attack on Fernambouc in Brazil, where he knew great treasures were at that time laid up. As he approached the shore he saw it lined with great numbers of the enemy; but not being daunted at this appearance, he placed the stoutest of his men in boats, and ordered them to row with such violence on the landing place as to split them in pieces. By this bold action he both deprived his men of all resource but in victory, and so terrified the enemy, that they fled, after a short resistance; and he returned home with the treasure which he had so bravely acquired. In 1595, sir Walter Raleigh, who had forfeited the queen's friendship by an intrigue with a maid of honour, and who had been thrown into prison for this misdemeanor, no sooner recovered his liberty, than he was pushed by his active and enterprizing genius to attempt some great action. The success of the first Spanish adventurers against Mexico and Peru had begotten an extreme avidity in Europe; and a prepossession universally took place, that in the inland parts of South America, called Guiana, a country as yet undiscovered, there were mines and treasures far exceeding any which Cortes or Pizzaro had met with. Raleigh, whose turn of mind was somewhat romantic and extravagant, undertook at his own charge the discovery of this wonderful country. Having taken the small town of St. Joseph in the isle of Trinidado, where he found no riches, he left his ship, and sailed up the river Oroonoko in pinnaces, but without meeting any thing to answer his expectations. On his return, he published an account of the country, full of the grossest and most palpable falsehoods that were ever attempted to be imposed on the credulity of mankind.

The same year, sir Francis Drake and sir John Hawkins undertook a more important expedition against the Spanish settlements in America; and they carried with them six ships of the queen's, and twenty more which either were fitted out at their own expence, or were furnished by private adventurers. Sir Thomas Baskerville was appointed commander of the land forces, which they carried on board. Their first design was to attempt Porto Rico, where, they knew, a rich carrack was at that time stationed; but as they had not preserved the requisite secrecy, a pinnace, having strayed from the fleet, was taken by the Spaniards, and betrayed the intentions of the English. Preparations were made in that island for their reception; and the English fleet, notwithstanding the brave assault which they made on the enemy, was repulsed with loss. Sir John Hawkins soon after died; and sir Francis Drake pursued his voyage to Nombre di Dios, on the isthmus of Darien; where, having landed his men, he attempted to pass forward to Panama, with a view of plundering that place, or, if he found such a scheme practicable, of keeping and fortifying it. But he met not with the same success which had attended his first enterprizes in those parts. The Spaniards, taught by experience, had every where fortified the passes, and had stationed troops in the woods, who so infested the English by continual alarms and skirmishes, that they were obliged to return, without being able to effect any thing of consequence. Drake himself, from the intemperance of the climate, the fatigues of his journey, and the vexation of his disappointment, was seized with a distemper, of which he soon after died. Sir Thomas Baskerville took the command of the fleet, which was in a weak condition; and after having fought a battle near Cuba with a Spanish fleet, of which the event was not decisive, he returned to England. The Spaniards suffered some loss from this expedition; but the English reaped no profit.

The bad success of this enterprize in the West Indies made the English rather attempt the Spanish dominions in Europe, where, they heard, Philip was making great preparations for a new invasion of England. A powerful fleet was equipped at Portsmouth, which consisted of a hundred and seventy vessels, seventeen of which were capital ships of war; the rest tenders and small vessels: twenty-four ships, according to Carte, were added by the Hollanders. In this fleet there were computed to be embarked six thousand three hundred and sixty soldiers, a thousand volunteers, and six thousand seven hundred and seventy-two seamen, beside the Dutch. The land forces were commanded by the earl of Essex: the navy by lord Effingham, high admiral. Both these commanders had expended great sums of their own in the armament: for such was the spirit of Elizabeth's reign. Lord Thomas Howard, sir Walter Raleigh, sir Francis Vere, sir George Carew, and sir Coniers Clifford had each of them the command of a ship in this expedition, and were appointed council to the general and admiral.

The fleet set sail on the first of June, 1596; and meeting with a fair wind, bent its course to Cadiz, at which place, by sealed orders delivered to all the captains, the general rendezvous was appointed. They sent before them some armed tenders, which intercepted every ship that could carry intelligence to the enemy; and they themselves were so fortunate when they came near Cadiz, as to take an Irish vessel, by which they learned, that that port was full of merchant ships of great value, and that the Spaniards, having no dread of an attack, lived in perfect security. This intelligence much encouraged the English fleet, and gave them the prospect of a fortunate issue to the expedition.

After a fruitless attempt to land at St. Sebastian's on the western side of the island of Cadiz; it was, upon deliberation, resolved by the council of war to attack the ships and gallies in the bay. Essex strenuously recommended the adoption of this plan; and when he found the resolution adopted, he threw his hat into the sea, and gave symptoms of the most extravagant joy. But he was highly displeased, when Effingham informed him, that the queen, anxious for his safety, and dreading the effects of his youthful ardour, had secretly given orders that he should not be permitted to command the van in the attack. That duty was performed by sir Walter Raleigh and lord Thomas Howard; but Essex no sooner came within reach of the enemy than he forgot the promise which the admiral had exacted from him, to keep in the midst of the fleet; he broke through and pressed forward into the thickest of the fire. The Spaniards were soon obliged to slip anchor and retreat farther into the bay, where they ran many of their ships aground. Essex then landed his men at the fort of Puntal; and immediately marched to the attack of Cadiz, which the English soon carried sword in hand. The generosity of Essex, not inferior to his valour, made him stop the slaughter, and treat his prisoners with the greatest humanity, and even affability and kindness. The English made rich plunder in the city; but missed a much richer by the resolution which the duke of Medina, the Spanish admiral, took of setting fire to the ships, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. The loss of the Spaniards in this enterprize was computed to amount to twenty millions of ducats; besides the indignity which they suffered from the sacking of one of their chief cities, and the destruction in their harbour of a fleet of such force and value.

Essex regarded this success as a step to future atchievements: he insisted on keeping possession of Cadiz; and undertook with four hundred men and three months provisions, to defend the place till succours should arrive from England: but the admiral strenuously rejected his advice; and all the other seamen and soldiers were satisfied with the honour they had acquired; and were impatient to return home in order to secure their plunder. Every other proposal of Essex to annoy the enemy met with a like reception; his scheme for intercepting the carracks at the Azores, for assaulting the Groine, for taking St. Andero, and St. Sebastian: and the English, finding it so difficult to drag this impatient warrior from the enemy, at last left him on the Spanish coast, attended by a very few ships. The admiral, on his return to England, was created earl of Nottingham; and his promotion gave great disgust to Essex (i).

(i) In the preamble of the patent it was said, that the new dignity was conferred on him on account of his good services in taking Cadiz, and destroying the Spanish ships; a merit which Essex pretended to belong solely to himself; and he offered to maintain this plea by single combat against the earl of Nottingham, or his sons, or any of his kindred.

The atchievements in the subsequent year proved not so fortunate; but as the Indian fleet very narrowly escaped the English, Philip had still reason to see the great hazard and disadvantages of that war in which he was engaged, and the superiority which the English, by their naval power and their situation, had acquired over him. The queen having received intelligence that the Spaniards, though their fleets were so much shattered and destroyed by the expedition to Cadiz, were preparing a squadron at Ferrol and the Groine, and were marching troops thither with a view of making a descent in Ireland, was resolved to prevent their expedition, and to destroy the shipping in those harbours. She prepared a large fleet of a hundred and twenty sail, of which seventeen were her own ships, forty-three were smaller vessels, and the rest tenders and victuallers: she embarked on board this fleet five thousand new-levied soldiers, and added a thousand veteran troops, whom sir Francis Vere brought from the Netherlands. The earl of Essex, commander in chief both of the land and sea forces, was at the head of one squadron: lord Thomas Howard was appointed vice-admiral of another: sir Walter Raleigh of the third: lord Mountjoy commanded the land-forces under Essex: Vere was appointed marshal: sir George Carew lieutenant of the ordnance, and sir Christopher Blount first colonel. The earls of Rutland and Southampton, the lords Grey, Cromwell, and Rich, with several other persons of distinction, embarked as volunteers. On this occasion Essex declared his resolution either to destroy the new Armada which threatened England, or to perish in the attempt.

This fleet set sail from Plymouth on the 9th of July, 1597; but were no sooner out of harbour than they met with a furious storm, which shattered and dispersed them; they were therefore obliged to return to port, where they were detained till the 17th of August; and before they could be refitted Essex found that their provisions were so far spent, or damaged by the sea-water, that it would not be safe to carry so numerous an army along with him. He dismissed therefore all the new recruits, and resolved to take only the thousand veterans under Vere; and laying aside all thoughts of attacking Ferrol or the Groine, he confined the object of his expedition to the intercepting of the Indian fleet; which had at first been considered only as a secondary enterprize which he was to attempt.

The Indian fleet in that age, by reason of the imperfection of navigation, had a stated course as well as season, both in their going out from, and in their return to Europe; and there were certain islands at which, as at fixed stages, they always touched, and where they took in water and provisions. The Azores being one of these places where about this time the fleet was expected, Essex bent his course thither; and informed Raleigh, that, on his arrival, he intended to attack Fayal, one of these islands. By some accident the squadrons were separated; and Raleigh arriving first before Fayal, thought it more prudent, after waiting some time for the general, to begin the attack alone, lest the inhabitants should by farther delay have leisure to make preparations for their defence (k). Although Essex was highly offended with Raleigh, he was soon appeased, and both received him into favour, and restored the other officers to their commands. This incident, however, though the quarrel was seemingly accommodated, laid the first foundation of that violent animosity which afterwards took place between these two gallant commanders.

Essex made next a disposition proper for intercepting the Indian galleons; and sir William Monson, whose station was the most remote of the fleet, having fallen in with them, made the signals which had been agreed on. That able officer, in his Memoirs, ascribes Essex's failure, when he was so near attaining so great an advantage, to his want of experience in seamanship; and the account which he gives of the errors committed by that nobleman, appears very reasonable as well as candid. The Spanish fleet, finding that the enemy was upon them, made all the sail possible to the Terceras, and got into the safe and well-fortified harbour of Angra, before the English fleet could overtake them: three ships only were intercepted, but they were so rich as to repay all the charges of the expedition.

The causes of the miscarriage in this expedition were much canvassed in England, upon the return of the fleet; and though the courtiers took part differently, as they affected either Essex or Raleigh, the people in general, who bore an extreme regard to the gallantry, spirit, and generosity of the former, were inclined to justify every circumstance of his conduct. The queen, who loved the one as much as she esteemed the other, maintained a kind of neutrality, and endeavoured to share her favours with an impartial hand between the parties. Sir Robert Cecil, second son of lord Burleigh, was a courtier of promising hopes, much connected with Raleigh; she made him secretary of state, preferably to sir Thomas Bodley, whom Essex recommended to that office. However, that she might not give offence to Essex, she promoted him to the dignity of earl marshal of England; an office which had been vacant since the death of the earl of Shrewsbury. Essex might perceive from this conduct, that she never intended to give him the entire ascendant over his rivals, and might thence learn the necessity of moderation and caution. But his temper was too high for submission; his behaviour too open and candid to practise the arts of a court; and his free sallies, while they rendered him but more amiable in the eyes of good judges, gave his enemies many advantages against him.

There was, however, a striking difference in the conduct of Elizabeth to her two favourites. To Leicester she had been accustomed to grant whatever he could require, while she frequently refused to comply with the most reasonable requests of Essex. But the motives of such conduct may be easily explained: the former she knew too timid to attempt any thing to her prejudice; and that, notwithstanding his ambition, he was neither capable of conceiving, nor of executing, projects hostile to the welfare of the state. She knew also, that had he been viciously inclined, his want of influence would have rendered his schemes ineffectual: equally hated and despised by the English, and by foreigners, no man would have degraded himself so far as to become the instrument of his aggrandizement. The case was far different with Essex; his lofty and impetuous temper would neither submit to menace nor contempt; loyal, generous, frank, and sincere, he was beloved by the people, esteemed by his equals, and feared by his enemies. His natural understanding, improved by study, and a taste for literature, rendered him still more dangerous in the eyes of a princess, whose mind was ever open to suspicion; she deemed it imprudent to suffer a man of this disposition to acquire too great an influence; and she often made him experience mortifications which he did not deserve, in order to check his pride, and to prevent him from aspiring to a still higher title than that of favourite. Perhaps too, her conduct might be actuated by another motive; she might have experienced in Essex a degree of coolness that ill-suited the warmth of her constitution; though the natural consequence of the difference of their ages, and of her favourite's affection for a young and beautiful wife.

The Spanish war, though successful, had exhausted the queen's exchequer, so that on the 24th of October, 1597, she assembled a parliament; where Yelverton, a lawyer, was chosen speaker of the house of commons (l). Elizabeth took care, by the mouth of sir Thomas Egerton, lord (k) He succeeded in the enterprize; but Essex, jealous of Raleigh, expressed great displeasure at his conduct, and construed it as an intention of robbing the general of the glory which attended that action: he cashiered therefore Sydney, Bret, Berry, and others, who had concurred in the attempt; and would have proceeded to inflict the same punishment on Raleigh himself, had not lord Thomas Howard interposed with his good offices, and persuaded Raleigh, though high-spirited, to make submissions to the general.

(l) It is usual for the speaker to disqualify himself for the office, but the reasons employed by this speaker are so singular, that they may be worth transcribing. "My estate," said he, "is nothing correspondent for the maintenance of this dignity; for my father dying, left me a younger brother, and nothing to me but my bare annuity. Then growing to man's estate, and some small practice of the law, I took a wife, by whom I have had many children; the keeping of us all being a great impoverishing to my estate, and the daily living of us all nothing but my daily industry. Neither from my person nor my nature doth this choice arise: for he that supplieth this place ought to be a man big and comely, stately and well-spoken, his voice great, his carriage majestical, his nature haughty, and his purse plentiful and heavy: but contrarily the stature of my body is small, myself not so well-spoken, my voice low, my carriage lawyer-like, and of the common fashion, my nature soft and bashful, my purse thin, light, and never yet plentiful. If Demosthenes, being so learned and eloquent as he was, one whom none surpassed, trembled to speak before Phocion at Athens; how much more shall I, being unlearned and unskilful to supply the place of dignity, charge and trouble, to speak before so many Phocions as here be? Yea, which is the greatest, before the unspeakable majesty and sacred personage of our dread sovereign: the terror of whose countenance would appal and abash even the stoutest hearts; yea, whose very name will pull down the greatest courage. For how mightily do the estate and name of a prince reject the haughtiest stomach even of their greatest subjects!" D'Ewes, p. 459.

keeper, to inform this assembly of the necessity of a supply. She said, "That the wars formerly waged in Europe had commonly been conducted by the parties without farther view than to gain a few towns, or at most a province, from each other; but the object of the present hostilities, on the part of Spain, was no other than utterly to bereave England of her religion, her liberty, and her independence: that these blessings, however, she herself had hitherto been able to preserve, in spite of the devil, the pope, and the Spanish tyrant, and all the mischievous designs of all her enemies: that in this contest she had disbursed a sum triple to all the parliamentary supplies granted her; and, besides expending her ordinary revenues, had been obliged to sell many of the crown lands and that she could not doubt but her subjects, in a cause where their own honour and interest were so deeply concerned, would willingly contribute to such moderate taxations as should be found necessary for the common defence." The parliament granted her three subsidies and six fifteenths; the same supply which had been given four years before, but which had then appeared so unusual, that they had voted it should never afterwards be regarded as a precedent.

The commons, this session, ventured to engage in two controversies about forms with the house of peers; a prelude to those just encroachments which, as they assumed more courage, they afterwards made upon the prerogatives of the crown. They complained, that the lords failed in civility to them by receiving their messages sitting with their hats on; and that the keeper returned an answer in the same negligent posture: but the upper house proved to their full satisfaction, that they were not entitled by custom and the usage of parliament to any more respect. Some amendments had been made by the lords to a bill sent up by the commons; and these amendments were written on parchment, and returned with the bill to the commons. The lower house took umbrage at the novelty: they pretended that these amendments ought to have been written on paper, not on parchment; and they complained of this innovation to the peers. The peers replied, that they expected not such a frivolous objection from the gravity of the house; and that it was not material whether the amendments were written on parchment or on paper, nor whether the paper were white, black, or brown. The commons were offended at this reply, which seemed to contain a mockery of them; and they complained of it, though without obtaining any satisfaction.

An application was also made this session, by way of petition, to the queen from the lower house, against monopolies; an abuse which had arisen to an enormous height, and they received a gracious, though a general answer; for which they returned their thankful acknowledgments. But not to give them too much encouragement in such applications she told them, in the speech which she delivered at their dissolution. "That with regard to these patents, she hoped that her dutiful and loving subjects would not take away her prerogative, which is the chief flower in her garden, and the principal and head pearl in her crown and diadem; but that they would rather leave these matters to her disposal." The commons also took notice of some transactions in the court of high commission; but not till they had previously obtained permission from her majesty to that purpose.

Elizabeth had reason to foresee that parliamentary supplies would now become more necessary to her than ever; and that the principal burden of the war with Spain would thenceforth lie upon England. Henry had received an overture for peace with Philip; but before he would proceed to a negociation he gave intelligence of it to his allies, the queen and the States; that if possible a general pacification might be made by common agreement.

These two powers sent ambassadors to France in the beginning of 1598, in order to remonstrate against peace; the queen, sir Robert Cecil, and Henry Herbert; the States, Justin Nassau, and John Barnevelt. Henry said to these ministers, That his early education had been amidst war and danger, and he had passed the whole course of his life either in arms or in military preparations: that after the proofs which he had given of his alacrity in the field, no one could doubt but he would willingly, for his part, have continued in a course of life to which he was now habituated, till the common enemy were reduced to such a condition as no longer to give umbrage either to him or to his allies: that no private interests of his own, not even those of his people, nothing but the most invincible necessity, could ever induce him to think of a separate peace with Philip, or make him embrace measures not entirely conformable to the wishes of all his confederates: that his kingdom, torn with the convulsions and civil wars of nearly half a century, required some interval of repose, ere it could reach a condition in which it might sustain itself, much more support its allies: that after the minds of his subjects were composed to tranquillity, and accustomed to obedience, after his finances were brought into order, and after agriculture and the arts were restored, France, instead of being a burden, as at present, to her confederates, would be able to lend them effectual succour, and amply to repay them all the assistance which she had received during her calamities: and that, if the ambition of Spain would not at present grant them such terms as they should think reasonable, he hoped that in a little time he should attain such a situation as would enable him to mediate more effectually, and with more decisive authority, in their behalf.

From the behaviour and speeches of Henry, the ambassadors were sensible of his sincerity; and they therefore remonstrated with the less vehemence against the measures which they saw Henry was determined to pursue. The States knew that that monarch was interested never to permit their final ruin; and having private assurances that he would still, notwithstanding the peace, give them assistance both of men and money, they were well pleased to remain on terms of amity with him. His greatest concern was to give satisfaction to Elizabeth for this breach of treaty; but as Spain refused to treat with the Dutch as a free state, and Elizabeth would not negociate without her ally, Henry was obliged to conclude at Vervins a separate peace, by which he recovered possession of all the places seized by Spain during the course of the civil wars, and procured to himself leisure to pursue the domestic settlement of his kingdom. His capacity for the arts of peace was not inferior to his military talents; and, in a little time, by his frugality, order, and wise government, he raised France from the desolation and misery in which she was involved, to a more flourishing condition than she had ever before enjoyed.

Elizabeth was now advised by some of her counsellors to embrace pacific measures; and they set before her the advantages of tranquillity, security and frugality, as more considerable than any success which could attend the greatest victories. But this high-spirited princess, though at first adverse to war, seemed now to be elated with her various victories, and was unwilling to stop the course of her prosperous fortune. She considered that she had now entire security against any dangerous invasion; and that the war must thenceforth be conducted by sudden enterprizes and naval expeditions, in which she possessed an undoubted superiority: that the weak condition of Philip in the Indies, opened to her the view of the most durable advantages; and the yearly return of his treasure by sea afforded a continual prospect of important, though more temporary successes: that, after his peace with France, if she should consent to an accommodation, Philip would be able to turn his whole force against the revolted provinces of the Netherlands, which, though they had surprisingly increased their power by commerce and good government, were still unable, if not supported by their confederates, to maintain war against so potent a monarch: and that, as her defence of that commonwealth was the original ground of the quarrel, it was unsafe as well as dishonourable to abandon its cause, till she had placed it in a state of greater security.

These reasons were frequently inculcated on her by the earl of Essex, whose passion for glory, as well as his military talents, made him earnestly desire the continuance of war, from which he expected to reap so much advantage and distinction as a warrior. The rivalship between this nobleman and lord Burleigh made each of them insist the more strenuously on his own counsel; but as Essex's person was agreeable to the queen, as well as his advice conformable to her inclinations, the favourite seemed daily to acquire an ascendant over the minister. Essex indeed spoke to the heart, while Burleigh only appealed to the head. Had Essex been endowed with caution and self-command equal to his shining qualities, he would have so riveted himself in the queen's confidence, that none of his enemies had ever been able to impeach his credit; but his lofty spirit could ill submit to that implicit implicit deference which the queen's arbitrary temper required, and which she had ever been accustomed to receive from all her subjects. Being once engaged in a dispute with her about the choice of a governor for Ireland, (he recommending sir George Carew, in opposition to sir George Knolles, whom the queen preferred,) he was so heated in the argument, that he entirely forgot the rules both of duty and civility; and turned his back upon her in a contemptuous manner. Her anger, naturally prompt and violent, rose at this provocation; and she instantly gave him a box on the ear; adding a passionate expression suited to his impertinence. Instead of recollecting himself, and making the submissions due to her sex and station, he clapped his hand to his sword, and swore that he would not bear such usage, were it from Henry VIII. himself; and immediately withdrew from court in a transport of passion. Egerton the chancellor, who loved Essex, exhorted him to repair his indiscretion, by proper acknowledgements; and entreated him not to give that triumph to his enemies, that affliction to his friends, which must ensue from his supporting a contest with his sovereign, and deserting the service of his country; but Essex was deeply stung with the dishonour which he had received; and seemed to think, that an insult which might be pardoned in a woman, was become a mortal affront when it came from his sovereign. "If the vilest of all indignities," said he, "is done me, does religion enforce me to sue for pardon? Doth God require it? Is it impiety not to do it? Why? Cannot princes err? Cannot subjects receive wrong? Is an earthly power infinite? Pardon me, my lord, I can never subscribe to these principles. Let Solomon's fool laugh when he is stricken; let those that mean to make their profit of princes, shew no sense of princes' injuries: let them acknowledge an infinite absoluteness on earth, that do not believe an absolute infiniteness in heaven:" (alluding probably to the character and conduct of sir Walter Raleigh, who lay under the reproach of impiety:) "As for me," continued he, "I have received wrong, I feel it: my cause is good, I know it; and whatsoever happens, all the powers on earth can never exert more strength and constancy in oppressing, than I can shew in suffering every thing that can or shall be imposed upon me. Your lordship, in the beginning of your letter, makes me a player, and yourself a looker on: and me a player of my own game, so you may see more than I: but give me leave to tell you, that since you do but see, and I do suffer, I must of necessity feel more than you."

Notwithstanding this spirited letter, which Essex had wrote and shewn to his friends; and they were so imprudent as to disperse copies of it; yet the queen's partiality for him was so prevalent, that she reinstated him in his former favour; and her kindness to him appeared rather to have acquired new force from this short interval of anger and resentment. The death of Burleigh, his antagonist, which happened on the 14th of August, seemed to ensure him constant possession of the queen's confidence; and nothing indeed but his own indiscretion could thenceforth have shaken his well-established credit (m). None of her other inclinations or affections could ever overcome her confidence in so useful a counsellor; and as he had had the generosity or good sense to pay assiduous court to her during her sister's reign, when it was dangerous to appear her friend, she thought herself bound in gratitude, when she mounted the throne, to persevere in her attachments to him. He seems not to have possessed any shining talents of address, eloquence, or imagination; and was chiefly distinguished by solidity of understanding, probity of manners, and indefatigable application in business: virtues which, if they do not always enable a man to attain high stations, do certainly qualify him best for filling them. Of all the queen's ministers he alone left a considerable fortune to his posterity; a fortune not acquired by rapine or oppression, but gained by the regular profits of his offices, and preserved by frugality.

The last public act of lord Burleigh was the concluding of a new treaty with the Dutch; who, after being in some measure deserted by the king of France, were glad to preserve the queen's alliance by submitting to any terms which she pleased to require of them. The debt which they owed her was now settled at eight hundred thousand pounds: of this sum they agreed to pay, during the war, thirty thousand pounds a year; and these payments were to continue till four hundred thousand pounds of the debt should be liquidated. They engaged also, during the time that England should continue the war with Spain, to pay the garrisons of the cautionary towns. They stipulated, that if Spain should invade England, or the Isle of Wight or Jersey, or Scilly, they should assist her with a body of five thousand foot, and five hundred horse; and that in case she undertook any naval armament against Spain, they should join an equal number of ships to her's. By this treaty the queen was eased of an annual charge of a hundred and twenty thousand pounds.

Shortly after the death of Burleigh, intelligence was brought to England, that Philip the Second, Elizabeth's greatest enemy, after languishing under many infirmities, expired in an advanced age at Madrid. This haughty prince, desirous of an accommodation with his revolted subjects in the Netherlands, but disdaining to make in his own name the concessions necessary for that purpose, had transferred to his daughter, married to archduke Albert, the title to the Low Country provinces; but as it was not expected that this princess could have posterity, and as the reversion on failure of her issue was still reserved to the crown of Spain, the States considered this deed only as the change of a name, and persisted with equal obstinacy in their resistance to the Spanish arms. The other powers also of Europe made no distinction between the courts of Brussels and Madrid; and the secret opposition of France, as well as the avowed efforts of England, operated against the progress of Albert, as it had done against that of Philip.

Notwithstanding the dominion of the English over Ireland had appeared to be established above four centuries, it may safely be affirmed, that their authority had hitherto been little more than nominal. The Irish princes and nobles, divided among themselves, readily paid the exterior marks of obeisance to a power which they were not able to resist; but as no durable force was ever kept on foot to retain them in their duty, they relapsed still into their former state of independence. Most of the English institutions by which that island was governed, were to the last degree absurd, and such as no state before had ever thought of, for preserving dominion over its conquered provinces.

The English nation, highly inflamed by the project of subduing France, (a project whose success was the most improbable, and would to them have proved the most pernicious,) neglected all other enterprizes, to which their situation so strongly invited them, and which in time would have brought them an accession of riches, grandeur, and security. The small army which the English maintained in Ireland, were never supplied regularly with pay; and as no money could be levied on the island, which possessed none, they gave their soldiers the privilege of free quarter upon the natives. Rapine and insolence added to the hatred which prevailed between the conquerors and the conquered: want of security among the Irish introducing despair, nourished still more the sloth natural to that uncultivated people.

But the English carried farther their ill-judged tyranny. Instead of inviting the Irish to adopt the more civilized customs of their conquerors, they refused, though earnestly solicited, to communicate to them the privilege of their laws, and even marked them out as aliens and enemies. Thrown out of the protection of justice, the natives could find no security but in force; and flying the neighbourhood of cities, which they could not approach with safety, they sheltered themselves in their bogs and forests from the insolence of their tyrannical and inhuman masters. Being treated like wild beasts, they became such; and joining the ardour of revenge to their yet untamed barbarity, they grew every day more intractable and dangerous.

As the English princes deemed the conquest of the dispersed Irish to be more the object of time and patience than the source of military glory, they willingly delegated that office to private adventurers, who, enlisting soldiers at their own charge, reduced provinces of that island, which they converted to their own profit. Separate jurisdictions and principalities were established by these lordly conquerors:

(m) Lord Burleigh died in an advanced age; and by a rare fortune was equally regretted by his sovereign and the people. He had risen gradually from small beginnings, by the mere force of merit; and though his authority was never entirely absolute or uncontrolled with the queen, he was still, during the course of near forty years, regarded as her principal minister.

conquerors: the power of peace and war was assumed: military law was exercised over the Irish, whom they subdued; and by degrees over the English, by whose assistance they conquered: and, after their authority had once taken root, deeming the English institutions less favourable to barbarous dominion, they degenerated into mere Irish, and abandoned the garb, language, manners and laws of their mother country.

By this imprudent conduct of England, the natives of Ireland remained still in that abject condition, into which the northern and western parts of Europe were sunk, before they received civility and slavery from the refined policy and bravery of Rome. Even at the end of the sixteenth century, when every Christian nation was cultivating with ardour the civil arts of life, that island, lying in a temperate climate, enjoying a fertile soil, accessible in its situation, possessed of innumerable harbours, was still, notwithstanding these advantages, inhabited by a people whose customs and manners approached nearer those of savages than of any other class of people.

But as the rudeness and ignorance of the Irish were extreme, they were sunk below the reach of that curiosity and desire of novelty, by which every other people in Europe had been seized at the beginning of that century, and which had engaged them in innovations and religious disputes, with which they were still so violently agitated. The ancient superstition, the practices and observances of their fathers, mingled and polluted with many wild opinions, still maintained an unshaken empire over them; and the example alone of the English was sufficient to render the reformation odious to the prejudiced and discontented Irish. The old opposition of manners, laws, and interest, was now inflamed by religious antipathy; and the subduing and civilizing of that country seemed to become every day more difficult and more impracticable.

The animosity against the English was carried so far by the Irish, that, in an insurrection raised by two sons of the earl of Clanricarde, they put to the sword all the inhabitants of the town of Athenry, though Irish; because they began to conform themselves to English customs, and had embraced a more civilized form of life than had been hitherto practised by their ancestors.

The usual revenue of Ireland amounted only to six thousand pounds a year: the queen, though with much repining, commonly added twenty thousand more, which she remitted from England: and with this small revenue a body of a thousand men was supported, which on extraordinary emergencies was augmented to two thousand. This small force, as might naturally be expected, tended rather to provoke the Irish than to subdue their animosity. The insurrections of the Irish therefore became more formidable; for they were now provided with officers and soldiers, with discipline and arms.

In 1560, Shan O'Neale, or the great O'Neale, as the Irish called him, because head of that potent clan, raised a rebellion in Ulster; but after some skirmishes he was received into favour upon his submission, and his promise of a more dutiful behaviour for the future. This impunity tempted him to undertake a new insurrection in 1567; but being pushed by sir Henry Sidney, lord deputy, he retreated into Clandeboy, and rather than submit to the English, he put himself into the hands of some Scottish islanders who commonly infested those parts by their incursions. The Scots, who retained a quarrel against him on account of former injuries, violated the laws of hospitality, and murdered him at a festival to which they had invited him (n).

The earl of Desmond, in 1569, gave sir Henry Sidney (one of the wisest and most active governors that Ireland had enjoyed for several reigns) great disturbance, from the hereditary animosity which subsisted between that nobleman and the earl of Ormond, descended from the only family established in Ireland, that had steadily maintained its loyalty to the English crown. The earl of Thomond, in 1570, attempted a rebellion in Connaught, but was obliged to fly into France before his designs were ripe for execution. Stukely, another fugitive, found such credit with the pope, Gregory the XIIIth, that he flattered that pontiff with the prospect of making his nephew, Buon Compagno, king of Ireland; and as if this project had already taken effect, he accepted the title of marquis of Leinster from the new sovereign. He went next into Spain; and after having received great encouragement and rewards from Philip, who intended to employ him as an instrument in disturbing Elizabeth, he was found to possess too little interest for executing the high promises which he had made to the Spanish monarch. He retired into Portugal; and following the fortunes of don Sebastian, he perished with that gallant prince in his bold but unfortunate expedition against the Moors.

After some interval, lord Gray succeeded to the government of Ireland; and in 1579 suppressed a new rebellion of the earl of Desmond, though supported by a body of Spaniards and Italians. The rebellion of the Rourks followed a few years after; occasioned by the strict and equitable administration of sir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, who endeavoured to repress the tyranny of the chieftains over their vassals. The queen, finding that Ireland had become extremely burthensome to her, tried several expedients for reducing it to a state of greater order and submission. She encouraged the earl of Essex, father to that nobleman who was afterwards her favourite, to attempt the subduing and planting of Clandeboy, Ferny, and other territories, part of some late forfeitures: but that enterprize proved unfortunate; and Essex died of a distemper occasioned, as is supposed, by the vexation which he had conceived from his disappointments. An university was founded in Dublin with a view of introducing arts and science into that kingdom, and civilizing the uncultivated manners of the natives: but the most unhappy expedient employed in the government of Ireland was that made use of in 1585 by sir John Perrot, at that time lord deputy: he put arms into the hands of the Irish inhabitants of Ulster, in order to enable them, without the assistance of the government, to repress the incursions of the Scottish islanders, by which that province was much infested. At the same time, the invitations of Philip, joined to their zeal for the Catholic system, engaged many of the gentry to serve in the Low Country wars: by which means Ireland became provided with officers and soldiers, with discipline and arms, became formidable to the English, and was thenceforth able to maintain a more regular war against her ancient arbitrary rulers.

Hugh O'Neale, nephew to Shan O'Neale, a perfidious and cruel tyrant, had been raised by the queen to the dignity of earl of Tyrone; but having murdered his cousin, son of that rebel, and being acknowledged head of his clan, he preferred the pride of barbarous licence and dominion to the pleasures of opulence and tranquillity, so that he fomented all those disorders by which he hoped to weaken or overturn the English government. He was noted for the vices of perfidy and cruelty; and was also eminent for courage, a virtue which their disorderly course of life requires, and which notwithstanding, being less supported by the principle of honour, is commonly more precarious among them, than among a civilized people. Tyrone, actuated by this spirit, secretly fomented the discontents of the Maguires, O'Donnels, O'Rourks, Macmahons, and other rebels; yet, trusting to the influence of his deceitful oaths and professions, he put himself into the hands of sir William Russel, who, in the year 1594, was sent over deputy to Ireland. Contrary to the advice and protestation of sir Henry Bagnal, marshal of the army, he was dismissed; and returning to his own country, he embraced the resolution of raising an open rebellion, and of relying no longer on the lenity or inexperience of the English government. He entered into a correspondence with Spain: he procured thence a supply of arms and ammunition: and having united all the Irish chieftains in a dependence upon himself, he began to be regarded as a formidable enemy.

The native Irish were so poor, that their country afforded few other commodities than cattle and oatmeal, which were easily concealed or driven away on the approach of the enemy; and as Elizabeth was averse to the expence requisite for supporting her armies, the English found much difficulty in pushing their advantages, and in pursuing the rebels into the bogs, woods, and other fast-(n) Shan O'Neale was a man equally noted for his pride, his violence, his debaucheries, and his hatred to the English nation. He is said to have put some of his followers to death because they endeavoured to introduce the use of bread after the English fashion. Though so violent an enemy to luxury, he was extremely addicted to riot; and was accustomed after his intemperance had thrown him into a fever, to plunge his body into mire, that he might allay the flame which he had raised by his former excesses. Such was the life led by this haughty barbarian, who scorned the title of the earl of Tyrone, which Elizabeth intended to have restored to him, and who assumed the rank and appellation of king of Ulster. He used also to say, that though the queen was his sovereign lady, he never made peace with her but at her seeking.

nesses, to which they retreated. From these motives sir John Norris, who commanded the English army, willingly hearkened to any proposals of truce or accommodation made him by Tyrone; and after the war was spun out by these artifices for some years, that gallant Englishman, finding that he had been deceived by treacherous promises, and that he had performed nothing worthy of his ancient reputation, was seized with a languishing distemper, and died of vexation. Sir Henry Bagnal, who succeeded him in the command, was still more unfortunate. When he was advancing to relieve the fort of Black-water, besieged by the rebels, he was surrounded in disadvantageous ground; his soldiers, discouraged by part of their powder's accidentally taking fire, were put to flight; and though the pursuit was stopped by Montacute, who commanded the English horse, fifteen hundred men, together with the general himself, were left dead upon the field (o).

The Irish rebellion having rose to an astonishing height, the English council was resolved to adopt more vigorous measures; and the queen cast her eye on Charles Blount (p), lord Mountjoy, as a man endowed with talents equal to the undertaking. But the young earl of Essex, ambitious of glory, and desirous of obtaining this government for himself, opposed the choice of Mountjoy; and represented the necessity of appointing for that important employment some person more experienced in military affairs than this nobleman, more practised in business, and of higher quality and reputation. By this description he was understood to mean himself; and no sooner was his desire known, than his enemies, even more zealously than his friends, conspired to gratify his wishes. Many of his friends thought that he never ought to consent, except for a short time, to accept of any employment which must remove him from court, and prevent him from cultivating that personal inclination which the queen so visibly bore him. His enemies hoped, that if by his absence she had once leisure to forget the charms of his person and conversation, his impatient and lofty demeanor would soon disgust a princess who usually exacted such profound submission and implicit obedience from all her servants. But Essex was incapable of entering into such cautious views; and even Elizabeth, who was extremely desirous of subduing the Irish rebels, and who was much prepossessed in favour of Essex's genius, readily agreed to appoint him governor of Ireland, by the title of lord lieutenant (q); and to ensure him of success, she levied an army of sixteen thousand foot and thirteen hundred horse, which she afterwards augmented to twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse: a force which, it was apprehended, would be able in one campaign to effect an entire conquest of Ireland. Nor did Essex's enemies, the earl of Nottingham, sir Robert Cecil, sir Walter Raleigh, and lord Cobham, throw any obstacles in the way of these preparations; but hoped that the higher the queen's expectations of success were raised, the more difficult it would be for the event to correspond to them. With a similar view, they rather seconded than opposed those exalted encomiums, which Essex's numerous and sanguine friends dispersed, of his high genius, of his elegant endowments, his heroic courage, his unbounded generosity, and his noble birth; nor were they displeased to observe that passionate fondness which the people every where expressed for this nobleman. These artful politicians had studied his character; and finding that his open and undaunted spirit, if taught temper and reserve from opposition, must become invincible, they resolved rather to give full breath to those sails which were already too much expanded, and to push him upon dangers of which he seemed to make such small account. And the better to make advantage of his indiscretions, spies were set upon all his actions and even expressions; and his vehement spirit, which, while he was in the midst of the court and environed by his rivals, was unacquainted with disguise, could not fail, after he thought himself surrounded by none but friends, to give a pretence for malignant suspicions and constructions.

Essex left London in March, 1599, attended with the acclamations of the populace; and what did him more honour, accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry. The first act of authority which he exercised after his arrival in Ireland, was an indiscretion, but of the generous kind; and in both these respects suitable to his character. This was the appointment of his intimate, the earl of Southampton, to be general of the horse; a nobleman who had incurred the queen's displeasure, by secretly marrying without her consent, and whom she had therefore enjoined Essex not to employ in any command under him. She no sooner heard of this instance of disobedience than she reprimanded him, and ordered him to recal his commission to Southampton. But Essex, who had imagined that some reasons which he opposed to her first injunctions had satisfied her, had the imprudence to remonstrate against these second orders; and it was not till she reiterated her commands, that he could be prevailed on to displace his friend.

Essex, on his landing at Dublin, deliberated with the Irish council concerning the proper methods of carrying on the war against the rebels; and here he was guilty of a capital error, which was the ruin of his enterprize. He had always while in England blamed the conduct of former commanders, who artfully protracted the war, who harassed their troops in small enterprizes, and who, by agreeing to truces and temporary pacifications with the rebels, had given them leisure to recruit their broken forces. In conformity to these views, he had always insisted upon leading his forces immediately into Ulster against Tyrone, the chief enemy; and his instructions had been drawn agreeably to these his declared resolutions. But the Irish counsellors persuaded him that the season was too early for such an undertaking, and that as the morasses in which the northern Irish usually sheltered themselves, would not as yet be passable to the English forces, it would be better to employ the present time in an expedition into Munster. But doubtless their secret reason for this advice was, that many of them possessed estates in that province, and were desirous to have the enemy dislodged from their neighbourhood: yet the same selfish spirit which had induced them to give this counsel, made them soon after disown it, when they found the bad consequences with which it was attended.

All the rebels of Munster being obliged by Essex either to submit or to fly into the neighbouring provinces, the Irish, from the greatness of the queen's preparations, had concluded that she intended to reduce them to total subjection, or even to effect their extermination, they considered their defence as a common cause; and the English forces were no sooner withdrawn, than the inhabitants of Munster relapsed into rebellion, and renewed their confederacy with their other countrymen. The English army, meanwhile, by the fatigue of long and tedious marches, and by the influence of the climate, was become sickly; and on its return to Dublin, the 16th of June, was surprisingly diminished in number. The courage of the soldiers was even much abated; for though they had prevailed in some trifling enterprizes against lord Cahir and others; yet had they sometimes met with more resistance than they expected from the Irish, whom they affected to despise; and as they were raw and unexperienced troops, a considerable body of them had been put to flight at the Glins, by an inferior number of the rebels. Essex was so enraged at this misbehaviour, that he cashiered all the officers, and decimated the private men. But though by this act of severity he intimidated the soldiers, he increased their aversion to the service. The Irish in the mean time had fortified the most important posts in the province of Ulster, and were strengthened by a considerable body of their countrymen.

Elizabeth was extremely disgusted when she heard that so considerable a part of the season was consumed in these frivolous expeditions; and was still more surprised that Essex persevered in the same practice which he had so much condemned in others, and which he knew to be so contrary to her purpose and intention. The queen's council had persuaded her, that the reduction of the rebels was an object of the greatest facility; and this opinion had indeed been supported by Essex himself, who had listened only to the dictates of courage, and the suggestions of enthusiasm. The queen reprimanded him with great severity: and in his answer to her letter, he confessed, that though, previous to his departure, he had encouraged a vain hope of reducing a people with whose strength and whose spirit he was wholly unacquainted, he was now convinced that the undertaking was more difficult than he had conceived it to be, from the reports of many who pretended to be well acquainted with the nature of the country and the inclinations of the natives. That nobleman, in order to give his troops leisure to recruit from their sickness and fatigue, left the main army in quarters, and marched with a small body of fifteen hundred men into the county of Ophelie against the O'Connors and O'Mores, whom he forced to a submission: but, on his return to Dublin, he found the army so much diminished, that he wrote to the English council an account of its condition, and informed them, that if he did not immediately receive a reinforcement of two thousand men, it would be impossible for him this season to attempt any thing against Tyrone. That there might be no pretence for farther inactivity, the queen immediately sent over the number demanded; and Essex began at last to assemble his forces for the expedition into Ulster. The army was so averse to this enterprize, and so terrified with the reputation of Tyrone, that many of them counterfeited sickness, many of them deserted; and Essex found, that after leaving the necessary garrisons, he could scarcely lead four thousand men against the rebels. He marched, however, with this small army; but was soon sensible, that in so advanced a season it would be impossible for him to effect any thing of importance against an enemy who, though superior in number, was determined to avoid every decisive action. Essex, despairing to surmount the numerous obstacles that occurred to the accomplishment of his project, convinced of the resentment of his sovereign, and probably aware of the treachery of his secret enemies, was induced to accept a conference proposed by a message sent him by Tyrone; and a place near the two camps was appointed for that purpose. The generals met without any of their attendants, and a river ran between them, into which Tyrone entered to the depth of his saddle; but Essex stood on the opposite bank. After half an hour's conference, where Tyrone behaved with great submission to the lord lieutenant, a cessation of arms was concluded till the first of May, renewable from six weeks to six weeks; but which might be broken off by either party upon a fortnight's warning. Essex also received from Tyrone proposals for a peace, in which that rebel had inserted many unreasonable and exorbitant conditions; and there appeared afterwards some reason to suspect that he had here commenced a very unjustifiable correspondence with the enemy.

(o) This victory, so unusual to the Irish, roused their courage, supplied them with arms and ammunition, and raised the reputation of Tyrone, who assumed the character of the deliverer of his country, and patron of Irish liberty.

(p) Sir Robert Naunton emphatically styles him, another child of her favour.

(q) The more to encourage him in his undertaking, she granted him by his patent more extensive authority than had ever before been conferred on any lieutenant; the power of carrying on or finishing the war as he pleased, of pardoning the rebels, and of filling all the most considerable employments in the kingdom.

So unexpected an issue of an enterprize, the greatest and most expensive that Elizabeth had ever undertaken, provoked her extremely against Essex; since on the success of the expedition she had founded the most sanguine hopes. He wrote several letters to the queen and council, complaining of his enemies, lamenting that their calumnies should be believed against him. The queen, however, took care to inform him of her dissatisfaction; and commanded him to remain in Ireland till farther orders.

Essex soon heard of Elizabeth's anger, and of the promotion of his principal enemy, sir Robert Cecil, to the office of master of the wards, an office to which he himself aspired; and dreading that, if he remained any longer absent, the queen would be totally alienated from him, he hastily embraced a resolution which, he knew, had once succeeded with the earl of Leicester, the former favourite of Elizabeth. Leicester, being informed while in the Low Countries that his mistress was extremely displeased with his conduct, disobeyed her orders by coming over to England; and having pacified her by his presence, by his apologies, and by his flattery and insinuation, disappointed all the expectations of his enemies. Essex, therefore, weighing more the similarity of circumstances than the difference of character between himself and Leicester, immediately set out for England; and making speedy journies, he arrived at court before any one was in the least apprised of his intentions. Though besmeared with dirt and sweat, he hastened up stairs to the presence chamber, thence to the privy chamber; nor stopped till he was in the queen's bed-chamber, who was newly risen, and was sitting with her hair about her face. He immediately threw himself on his knees, kissed her hand, and entreated her to listen to the benevolent suggestions of her own mind, rather than to the malicious insinuations of his enemies. He then proceeded to justify his conduct in Ireland; and particularly mentioned the disaffection of the army as alone sufficient to authorize the conclusion of a truce, which he had purposely left at her option to revoke or confirm. The joy and surprize of Elizabeth at the unexpected sight of the man she loved, joined to his submissive but impassioned discourse, made a lively impression on her senses. Though her reason urged her to elude, her heart checked the reprehensions ere they reached her lips, and converted them into expressions of kindness. The meeting was tender and affectionate, and Essex retired content with his reception. He was even heard to express great satisfaction, and to thank God that though he had suffered much trouble and many storms abroad, he found a sweet calm at home.

But this placability of Elizabeth was merely the result of her surprize, and of the momentary satisfaction which she felt on the sudden and unexpected appearance of her favourite: after he had departed, and she had leisure for recollection, all his faults recurred to her mind; and she thought it necessary, by some severe discipline, to subdue that haughty imperious spirit, who, presuming on her partiality, had pretended to domineer in her counsels, to engross all her favour, and to act, in the most important affairs, without regard to her orders and instructions. When Essex waited on her in the afternoon, he found her extremely altered in her carriage towards him; her mind had been poisoned against him by his enemies; and she ordered him to be confined to his chamber; to be twice examined by the council; and though his answers were calm and submissive, she committed him to the custody of lord keeper Egerton, and held him sequestered from all company, even from that of his countess, nor was so much as the intercourse of letters permitted between them. Essex dropped many expressions of humiliation and sorrow, none of resentment: he professed an entire submission to the queen's will; declared his intention of retiring into the country, and of leading thenceforth a private life, remote from courts and business; but though he affected to be so entirely cured of his aspiring ambition, the vexation of this disappointment, and of the triumph gained by his enemies, preyed upon his spirits, and he fell into a distemper which endangered his life (r).

In the beginning of 1600, Essex being allowed the company of his countess, and having entertained more promising hopes of his future fortunes, was so much restored in his health, as to be thought past danger. A belief was instilled into Elizabeth, that his distemper had been entirely counterfeit, in order to move her compassion. So changeable was the queen in her temper now she was in an advanced age of life, that she relapsed into her former rigour against him. He wrote her a letter, and sent her a rich present on New-Year's day; as was usual with the courtiers at that time: she read the letter, but rejected the present. After some interval, however, of severity, she allowed him to retire to his own house: and though he remained still under custody, and was sequestered from all company, he was so grateful for this mark of lenity, that he sent her a letter of thanks on the occasion. "This farther degree of goodness," said he, "doth sound in my ears as if your majesty spake these words, Die not, Essex; for though I punish thine offence, and humble thee for thy good, yet will I one day be served again by thee. My prostrate soul makes this answer: I hope for that blessed day. And in expectation of it, all my afflictions of body and mind are humbly, patiently, and cheerfully borne by me." The countess of

(r) The queen had always declared to all the world, and even to the earl himself, that the purpose of her severity was to correct, not to ruin him; and when she heard of his sickness, she was not a little alarmed with his situation. She ordered eight physicians of the best reputation and experience to attend and consult on his case; and being informed that the issue was much to be apprehended, she sent Dr. James to him with some broth, and desired that physician to deliver him a message, which she probably deemed of still greater virtue than all the medicines they might be able to give him. She directed the doctor to inform him, that if she thought such a step consistent with her honour, she would herself pay him a visit. The bystanders, who carefully observed her countenance, remarked that in pronouncing these words, her eyes were suffused with tears. When the symptoms of the queen's returning affection towards Essex were known, they gave great alarm to the faction which had declared their opposition to him. Sir Walter Raleigh, in particular, the most violent as well as the most ambitious of his enemies, was so affected with the appearance of this sudden revolution, that he was seized with sickness in his turn; and the queen was obliged to apply the same salve to his wound, and to send him a favourable message, expressing her desire of his recovery. The medicine which the queen administered to these aspiring rivals was successful with both.

Essex, daughter of sir Francis Walsingham, possessed, as well as her husband, a refined taste in literature; and the chief consolation which Essex enjoyed during this period of anxiety and expectation, consisted in her company, and in reading with her those instructive and entertaining authors, which even during the time of his greatest prosperity he had never entirely neglected.

There were, however, several incidents which kept alive the queen's anger against Essex. Every account which she received from Ireland, convinced her more and more of his misconduct in that government, and of the insignificant purposes to which he had employed so much force and treasure. Tyrone, so far from being quelled, had thought proper, in less than three months, to break the truce; and joining with O'Donnel, and other rebels, had over-run almost the whole kingdom. He boasted that he was certain of receiving a supply of men, money, and arms from Spain: he pretended to be champion of the Catholic religion; and he openly exulted in the present of a phœnix plume, which the pope, Clement VIII. in order to encourage him in the prosecution of so good a cause, had consecrated, and had conferred upon him. The queen, that she might check his progress, returned to her former intention of appointing Mountjoy lord-deputy; and though that nobleman, who was an intimate friend of Essex, and desired his return to the government of Ireland, did at first very earnestly excuse himself, on account of ill health, she compelled him to accept of the employment. Mountjoy found the island in a most desperate condition; but he had not the same enemies to encounter with Essex; the troops were neither inspired with terror, nor inclined to mutiny; his officers were not the instruments of intrigue, nor his soldiers the objects of corruption. He therefore immediately advanced against Tyrone in Ulster. He penetrated into the heart of that country, the chief seat of the rebels: he fortified Derry and Mount-Norris, in order to bridle the Irish: he chased them from the field, and obliged them to take shelter in the woods and morasses: he employed, with equal success, sir George Carew in Munster; and by these promising enterprizes, he gave new life to the queen's authority in that island.

As the comparison of Mountjoy's administration with that of Essex contributed to alienate Elizabeth from her favourite, she received additional disgust from the partiality of the people, who, prepossessed with an extravagant idea of Essex's merit, complained of the injustice done him by his removal from court, and by his confinement. Libels were secretly dispersed against Cecil and Raleigh, and all his enemies; and his popularity, which was always great, seemed rather to be increased than diminished by his misfortunes. Elizabeth, in order to justify her conduct with regard to him, had often expressed her intentions of having him tried in the Star Chamber for his offences; but her tenderness for him prevailed at last over her severity; and she was contented to have him only examined by the privy-council. The attorney-general, Coke, opened the cause against him, and treated him with the cruelty and insolence which that great lawyer usually exercised against the unfortunate. He displayed in the strongest colours, all the faults committed by Essex in his administration of Ireland: his making Southampton general of the horse, contrary to the queen's injunctions; his deserting the enterprize against Tyrone, and marching to Leinster and Munster; his conferring knighthood on too many persons; his secret conference with Tyrone; and his sudden return from Ireland, in contempt of her majesty's commands. He also exaggerated the indignity of the conditions which Tyrone had been allowed to propose; odious and abominable conditions, said he; a public toleration of an idolatrous religion, pardon for himself and every traitor in Ireland, and full restitution of lands and possessions to all of them. The solicitor-general, Fleming, insisted upon the wretched situation in which the earl had left that kingdom; and Francis (s), son of sir Nicholas Bacon, who had been lord-keeper in the beginning of the present reign, closed the charge with displaying the undutiful expressions contained in some letters written by the earl.

When Essex came to plead in his own defence, he renounced, with great submission and humility, all pretensions to an apology; and declared his resolution never, on this or any other occasion, to have any contest with his sovereign. He said, that, having severed himself from the world, and abjured all sentiments of ambition, he had no scruple to confess every failing or error, into which his youth, folly, or manifold infirmities might have betrayed him; that his inward sorrow for his offences against her majesty was so profound, that it exceeded all his outward crosses and afflictions, nor had he any scruple of submitting to a public confession of whatever she had been pleased to impute to him; that in his acknowledgements he retained only one reserve, which he never would relinquish but with his life, the assertion of a loyal and unpolluted heart, of an unfeigned affection, of an earnest desire ever to perform to her majesty the best service which his poor abilities would permit; and that if this sentiment were allowed by the council, he willingly acquiesced in any condemnation or sentence which they could pronounce against him. This submission was uttered with so much eloquence, and in so pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from many of the audience. All the privy-counsellors, in giving their judgement, made no scruple of doing the earl justice with regard to the loyalty of his intentions. Even Cecil, whom he believed his capital enemy, treated him with regard and humanity. And the sentence pronounced by the lord-keeper Egerton (to which the council assented) was in these words: "If this cause," said he, "had been heard in the Star-Chamber, my sentence must have been for as great a fine as ever was set upon any man's head in that court, together with perpetual confinement in that prison which belongeth to a man of his quality, the Tower. But since we are now in another place, and in a course of favour, my censure is, that the earl of Essex is not to execute the office of a counsellor, nor that of earl marshal of England, nor of master of the ordnance; and to return to his own house, there to continue a prisoner till it shall please her majesty to release this and all the rest of his sentence." The earl of Cumberland made a slight opposition to this sentence; and said, that if he thought it would stand he would have required a little more time to deliberate; that he deemed it too severe; and that any commander in chief might easily incur a like penalty. "But however," added he, "in confidence of her majesty's mercy, I agree with the rest." The earl of Worcester delivered his opinion in a couple of Latin verses; importing, "that where the Gods are offended, even misfortunes ought to be imputed as crimes, and that accident is no excuse for transgressions against the Divinity."

It was indeed generally expected that Essex would soon be reinstated in his former credit; and it was thought, as is usual in reconcilements founded on inclination, that he would acquire an additional ascendant over the queen, and after all his disgraces would again appear more a favourite than ever. They were confirmed in this hope when they saw that, though he was still prohibited from appearing at court, he was continued in his office of master of the horse, and was restored to his liberty, and that all his friends had access to him. Essex himself seemed determined to persevere in that conduct which had hitherto been so successful, and which the queen, by all this discipline, had endeavoured to render habitual to him: he wrote to her, that he kissed her majesty's hands, and the rod with which she had corrected him; but that he could never recover his wonted cheerfulness, till she deigned to

(s) Bacon, so much distinguished afterwards by his high offices, and still more by his profound genius for the sciences, was nearly allied to the Cecil family, being nephew to lord Burleigh, and cousin-german to the secretary: but notwithstanding his extraordinary talents, he had met with so little protection from his powerful relations, that he had not yet obtained any preferment in the law, which was his profession. But Essex, who could distinguish merit, and who passionately loved it, had entered into an intimate friendship with Bacon; had zealously attempted, though without success, to procure him the office of solicitor-general; and in order to comfort his friend under the disappointment, had conferred on him a present of land to the value of eighteen hundred pounds. The public could ill excuse Bacon's appearance before the council, against so munificent a benefactor; though he acted in obedience to the queen's commands. The queen herself, surprized at the part he had taken in this affair, asked him, what had become of his ancient friendship? Her safety, and the welfare of the state, were the motives he urged in excuse for his ill-timed zeal; but no one was a dupe to his affectation of patriotism, and his sentiments were justly appreciated. But Elizabeth was so well pleased with his behaviour, that she imposed on him a new task, of drawing a narrative of that day's proceedings, in order to satisfy the public of the justice and lenity of her conduct.—Bacon, who wanted firmness of character more than humanity, gave to the whole transaction the most favourable turn for Essex; and, in particular, painted out, in elaborate expression, the dutiful submission which that nobleman discovered in the defence that he made for his conduct. When he read the paper to her, she smiled at that passage, and observed to Bacon, that old love, she saw, could not easily be forgotten. He replied, that he hoped she meant that of herself, admit him to that presence, which had ever been the chief source of his happiness and enjoyment: and that he had now resolved to make amends for his past errors, to retire into a country solitude, and say with Nebuchadnezzar, "Let my dwelling be with the beasts of the field; let me eat grass as an ox, and be wet with the dew of heaven; till it shall please the queen to restore me to my understanding." The queen was much pleased with these sentiments, and replied, that she heartily wished his actions might correspond with his expressions; that he had tried her patience a long time, and it was but fitting she should now make some experiment of his submission; that her father would never have pardoned so much obstinacy; but that, if the furnace of affliction produced such good effects, she should ever after have the better opinion of her chemistry.

The earl of Essex possessed a monopoly of sweet wines; and as his patent was near expiring, he patiently expected that the queen would renew it, and he considered this event as the critical circumstance of his life, which would determine whether he could ever hope to be reinstated in credit and authority. But Elizabeth, though gracious in her deportment, was of a temper somewhat haughty and severe; and being continually surrounded with Essex's enemies, means were found to persuade her, that his lofty spirit was not yet sufficiently subdued, and that he must undergo this farther trial, before he could again be safely received into favour. She therefore denied his request; and even added, in a contemptuous style, that an ungovernable beast must be stinted in his provender.

The rigorous conduct of the queen was now pushed one step too far, proved the final ruin of this young nobleman, and was the source of infinite sorrow and vexation to the queen herself. Essex, who had with great difficulty so long subdued his proud spirit, and whose patience was now exhausted, imagining that the queen was entirely inexorable, burst at once all restraints of submission and of prudence, and determined to seek relief, by proceeding to the utmost extremities against his enemies. Even during his greatest favour he had ever been accustomed to carry matters with a high hand towards his sovereign; and as this practice gratified his own temper, and was sometimes successful, he had imprudently imagined that it was the only proper method of managing her. But being now reduced to despair, he threw off all appearance of duty and respect. Disdaining the sober counsels of his friends, he listened to the interested advice of certain persons, who led him to expect, from the assistance of the giddy multitude, that revenge upon his enemies in the council which he thought was denied him from the throne. Intoxicated with the public favour, which he already possessed, he practised again every art of popularity; and endeavoured to increase the general good-will by a hospitable manner of life, little suited to his situation and circumstances. His former employments had given him great connexions with men of the military profession; and he now entertained a friendship with all desperate adventurers, whose attachment he hoped might, in his present views, prove serviceable to him. He secretly courted the confidence of the Catholics; but his chief trust lay in the Puritans, whom he openly caressed, and whose manners he seemed to have entirely adopted. He engaged the most celebrated preachers of that sect to resort to Essex-house; he had daily prayers and sermons in his family; and he invited many of the zealots in London to attend those pious exercises (t).

But the greatest imprudence of this nobleman proceeded from the openness of his temper, by which he was ill qualified to succeed in such difficult and dangerous enterprizes. He indulged himself in great liberties of speech, and was even heard to say of the queen, that she was now grown an old woman, and was become as crooked in her mind as in her body. Some court ladies, whose favours Essex had formerly neglected, carried her these stories, and incensed her to a high degree against him. Elizabeth was ever remarkably jealous on this head; and though she was now approaching to her seventieth year, she allowed her courtiers, and even foreign ambassadors, to compliment her upon her beauty; nor had all her good sense been able to cure her of this preposterous vanity.

There was also an expedient employed by Essex, which, if possible, was more provoking to the queen than his sarcastic observations on her age and deformity; and that was, his secret applications to the king of Scots, her heir and successor. That prince had this year very narrowly escaped a dangerous, though ill-formed, conspiracy of the earl of Gowry; and even his deliverance was attended with this disagreeable circumstance, that the obstinate ecclesiastics persisted, in spite of the most incontestible evidence, to maintain to his face, that there had been no such conspiracy. James, harassed with his turbulent and factious subjects, cast a wistful eye to the succession of England; and, in proportion as the queen advanced in years, his desire increased of mounting that throne, on which, besides acquiring a great addition of power and splendour, he hoped to govern a people so much more tractable and submissive. He negociated with all the courts of Europe, in order to ensure himself friends and partizans: he even neglected not the court of Rome and that of Spain; and though he engaged himself in no positive promise, he flattered the Catholics with hopes that, in the event of his succession, they might expect some more liberty than they were at present indulged with. Elizabeth was the only sovereign in Europe to whom he never dared to mention his right of succession: he knew that, though her advanced age might now invite her to think of fixing an heir to the crown, she never could bear the prospect of her own death without horror, and was determined still to retain him, and all other competitors, in an entire dependence upon her.

The earl of Essex was descended by the female line from the royal family; and some of his sanguine partizans had been so imprudent as to mention his name among those of other pretenders to the crown; but the earl took care, by means of Henry Lee, whom he secretly sent into Scotland, to assure James, that Elizabeth was inclined to favour the succession of the Infanta of Spain, whose pretended right had been asserted in a recent publication; but that he was himself so far from entertaining such ambitious views, that he was determined to use every expedient for extorting an immediate declaration in favour of James's right of succession. James willingly hearkened to this proposal; but did not approve of the violent methods which Essex intended to employ. Essex had imprudently communicated his scheme to lord Mountjoy, deputy of Ireland; and as no man ever commanded more the cordial affection and attachment of his friends, he had even engaged a person of that virtue and prudence to entertain thoughts of bringing over his army into England, and of forcing the queen to declare the king of Scots her successor. And such was Essex's impatient ardour, that, though James declined this dangerous expedient, he still endeavoured to persuade Mountjoy not to desist from the project; but the deputy, who thought that such violence, though it might be justifiable, when supported by a sovereign prince, next heir to the crown, would be rash and criminal, if attempted by subjects, absolutely refused his concurrence. The correspondence, however, between Essex and the court of Scotland was still conducted with great secrecy and cordiality; and that nobleman, besides conciliating the favour of James, represented all his own adversaries as enemies to that prince's succession, and as men entirely devoted to the interests of Spain, and partizans of the chimerical title of the Infanta.

The archduke Albert and the Infanta had made some advances to the queen for peace; and Boulogne, as a neutral town, was chosen for the place of conference. Sir Henry Nevil, the English resident in France, Herbert, Edmondes, and Beale, were sent thither as ambassadors from England; and negociated with Zuniga, Carillo, Richardot, and Verheiken, ministers of Spain, and the archduke, on the 26th of May, 1600; but the conferences were soon broken off by disputes with regard to the ceremonial. Among the European states England had ever been allowed the precedency above Castile, Arragon, Portugal, and the other kingdoms of which the Spanish monarchy was composed; and Elizabeth insisted, that this ancient right was not lost on account of the junction of these states, and that that monarchy in its present situation, though it surpassed the English in extent as well as in power, could not be compared with it in point of antiquity, (t) Such was the disposition now beginning to prevail among the English, that, instead of feasting and public spectacles, the methods anciently practised to gain the populace, nothing so effectually ingratiated an ambitious leader with the public, as these fanatical entertainments. And as the puritanical preachers frequently inculcated in their sermons the doctrine of resistance to the civil magistrate, they prepared the minds of their hearers for those seditious projects which Essex was secretly meditating.

the only durable and regular foundation of precedency among kingdoms as well as noble families. That she might shew, however, a pacific disposition, she was content to yield to an equality; but the Spanish ministers, as their nation had always disputed precedency even with France, to which England yielded, would proceed no farther in the conference, till their superiority of rank were unequivocally acknowledged. During the preparations for this abortive negociation the earl of Nottingham, the admiral, lord Buckhurst, treasurer, and secretary Cecil, had discovered their inclination to peace; but as the English nation, flushed with success, and sanguine in their hopes of plunder and conquest, were generally averse to that measure; so that it was easy for a person so popular as Essex to infuse into the multitude an opinion, that these ministers had sacrificed the interests of their country to Spain, and would even make no scruple of receiving a sovereign from that hostile nation.

Not content, however, with these arts for decrying his adversaries, Essex proceeded, in 1601, to concert more violent methods of ruining them. In these measures he was chiefly instigated by Henry Cuffe, his secretary, a man of a bold and arrogant spirit, who had acquired a great ascendant over his patron. A select council of malcontents was formed, who commonly met at Drury-house, and were composed of sir Charles Davers, to whom the house belonged, the earl of Southampton, sir Ferdinando Gorges, sir Christopher Blount, sir John Davies, and John Littleton; and Essex, who boasted that he had a hundred and twenty barons, knights, and gentlemen of note at his devotion, and who trusted still more to his authority with the populace, communicated to his associates those secret designs with which his confidence in so powerful a party had inspired him. The result of the confederacy was, to take up arms; its object to compel the queen to banish all the secret or avowed enemies of Essex from the council, the court, and the kingdom. By some it was proposed to begin with attacking the palace; while others were of opinion, that the Tower should be first secured. The first enterprize being preferred, a method was concerted for executing it. It was agreed that sir Christopher Blount, with a choice detachment, should possess himself of the palace gates; that Davies should seize the hall; Davers the guard-chamber and presence-chamber; and that Essex should rush in from the Meuse, attended by a body of his partizans; should entreat the queen, with all demonstrations of humility, to remove his enemies; should oblige her to assemble a parliament; and should with common consent settle a new plan for the regulation of the government.

During these deliberations, many reasons of suspicion were carried to the queen; and she sent Robert Sackville, son of the treasurer, to Essex-house on the 7th of February, 1601, on pretence of a visit, but in reality with a view of discovering whether there were in that place any unusual concourse of people, or any extraordinary preparations which might threaten an insurrection. Soon after secretary Herbert took Essex a summons to attend the council, which met at the treasurer's house; and while he was musing on this circumstance, and comparing it with the late unexpected visit from Sackville, a private note was conveyed to him, by which he was warned to provide for his own safety. He now concluded that all his plans of conspiracy were discovered, or at least suspected; and that the easiest punishment which he had reason to apprehend, was a new and more severe confinement; he therefore excused himself to the council on pretence of an indisposition; and he immediately dispatched messages to his more intimate confederates, requesting their advice and assistance in the present critical situation of his affairs. They deliberated, whether they should abandon all their projects, and fly the kingdom; or instantly seize the palace with the force which they could assemble; or rely upon the affections of the citizens, who were generally known to have a great attachment to the earl. Essex declared against the first expedient, and professed himself determined to undergo any fate rather than submit to live the life of a fugitive. To seize the palace seemed impracticable, without more preparations; especially as the queen seemed now aware of their projects, and, as they heard, had used the precaution of doubling her ordinary guards. There remained, therefore, no expedient but that of betaking themselves to the city; and, while the prudence and feasibility of this resolution was under debate, a person arrived, probably employed by his enemies, as if he had received a commission for the purpose, gave them assurance of the affections of the Londoners, and affirmed, that they might securely rest any project on that foundation, since they were determined to give him assistance against all opponents. This intelligence was confirmed by others, who assured him, that Smith, the sheriff, would raise a thousand men for his service. The popularity of Essex had chiefly buoyed him up in all his vain undertakings; and he fondly imagined, that with no other assistance than the good-will of the multitude, he might overturn Elizabeth's government, confirmed by time, revered for wisdom, supported by vigour, and concurring with the general sentiments of the nation. The wild project of raising the city was immediately resolved on; the execution of it was delayed till next day; and emissaries were dispatched to all Essex's friends, informing them that Cobham and Raleigh had laid schemes against his life, and entreating their presence and assistance.

Next day (February 8,) there appeared at Essex-house the earls of Southampton and Rutland, the lords Sandys and Monteagle, with about three hundred gentlemen of birth and fortune; and Essex informed them of the danger to which he pretended the machinations of his enemies exposed him. To some he said, that he would throw himself at the queen's feet, and crave her justice and protection: to others, he boasted of his interest in the city, and affirmed, that whatever might happen, this resource could never fail him. The queen was informed of these designs; by means of intelligence conveyed, as is supposed, to Raleigh, by sir Ferdinando Gorges; and, having ordered the magistrates of London to keep the citizens in readiness, she sent Egerton, lord keeper, to Essex-house, with the earl of Worcester, sir William Knollys, controller, and Popham, chief justice, in order to learn the cause of these unusual commotions. They were with difficulty admitted through a wicket; but all their servants were excluded except the purse-bearer. After some altercation, in which they charged Essex's retainers, upon their allegiance, to lay down their arms, and were menaced in their turn by the angry multitude who surrounded them, the earl, who found that matters were past recal, resolved to leave them prisoners in his house, and to proceed to the execution of his former project. He sallied forth with about two hundred attendants, armed only with walking swords; and in his passage to the city, was joined by the earl of Bedford and lord Cromwel. He cried aloud, "For the queen! for the queen! a plot is laid for my life;" and then proceeded to the house of Smith the sheriff, on whose aid he had great reliance. The citizens flocked about him in amazement; but though he told them that England was sold to the Infanta, and exhorted them to arm instantly, otherwise they could not do him any service, no one shewed a disposition to join him. The sheriff, on the earl's approach to his house, stole out at the back door, and made the best of his way to the mayor. Essex, meanwhile, observing the coldness of the citizens, and hearing that he was proclaimed a traitor by the earl of Cumberland and lord Burleigh, began to despair of success, and thought of retreating to his own house. He found the streets in his passage barricadoed and guarded by the citizens under the command of sir John Levison. In his attempt to force his way, Tracy, a young gentleman to whom he bore great friendship, was killed with two or three of the Londoners; and the earl himself, attended by a few of his partizans, retired towards the river, and taking boat, arrived at Essex-house. He there found that Gorges, whom he had sent before to capitulate with the lord keeper and the other counsellors, had given all of them their liberty, and had gone to court with them. He was now reduced to despair; and appeared determined, in prosecution of lord Sandys's advice, to defend himself to the last extremity, and rather to perish, like a brave man, with his sword in his hand, than basely by the hands of the executioner: but after some parley, and after demanding in vain, first hostages, then conditions, from the besiegers, he surrendered at discretion; requesting only civil treatment, and a fair and impartial hearing.

Essex and Southampton were immediately conveyed to the archbishop's palace at Lambeth, where they passed the night, and the next morning were conducted to the Tower. The rest of the conspirators were confined in different places. The ministers were very studious to keep alive the apprehensions of the queen; and artfully prolonged her fears till the trial of the earl of Essex was over. In the city, and at the palace, the guards were ordered to be doubled; and the public, as well as the sovereign, were taught to believe that the danger was not yet passed. An officer of the name of Lea, was apprehended for having said to sir Robert Crofts, "Might not seven or eight honest fellows, as we are, throw ourselves at her majesty's feet, and represent the injury that is done to so many brave gentlemen, who may one day do her good service?" This insinuation being reported by Crofts, was interpreted into a design of releasing Essex from confinement. Lea was thrown into prison, and executed at Tyburn, with an indecent and unjust precipitation, that precluded the possibility of legal investigation or juridical proof. He died with intrepidity; and, in his last moments, loudly protested his innocence: and swore, that he had neither uttered any speech, nor conceived any project, repugnant to his duty and allegiance. Neither indeed can it be supposed that this person was guilty of any crime, except that of being one of the friends of the earl of Essex; therefore the enemies of that nobleman thought fit to cause him to be accused and—not tried but—executed, that they might work the more effectually on the mind of Elizabeth, to compass the destruction of her favourite. Osborne, who relates this anecdote, farther says, that another man was executed at Smithfield, only for having written to his father, to inform him of the imprisonment of Essex and his associates. Thus we perceive that the enemies of Essex kept not back, even from the commission of murder, to accomplish their villainous ends.

On the 19th of February, the queen gave orders for the trial of the most considerable of the criminals. The earls of Essex and Southampton were arraigned before a jury of twenty-five peers, where lord Buckhurst acted as high steward. The guilt of the prisoners was too apparent to admit of any doubt; and, besides the insurrection known to every body, the treasonable conferences at Drury-house were proved by undoubted evidence. Sir Ferdinando Gorges was produced in court: the confessions of the earl of Rutland, of the lords Cromwel, Sandys, and Monteagle, of Davers, Blount, and Davies, were only read to the peers, according to the practice of that age. The confessions of Essex's partizans being read to him, he listened to them with calmness and attention; and, in his defence, comforted himself with general declarations of his innocence, and the purity of his intentions. From the former actions of his life, and the bent of his disposition, it is indeed probable that he never seriously meant to endanger the life or abridge the authority of his sovereign; but had been actuated solely by a mad desire of inflicting unlawful vengeance on his enemies, who had been studious to ruin his fortune, and to destroy his reputation. Still, however, his conduct was unjustifiable; and the sentence of death that was pronounced on him, was warranted by law and sanctioned by justice (u). When sentence was pronounced, Essex spoke like a man who expected nothing but death: but he added, that he should be sorry if he were represented to the queen as a person that despised her clemency; though he should not, he believed, make any cringing submissions to obtain it. Southampton's behaviour was more mild and submissive: he entreated the good offices of the peers in so modest and becoming a manner as excited compassion in every beholder.

Though the earl of Essex behaved nobly on the present occasion, leaving the task of reproach to the admonitions of conscience and the stings of remorse, yet did Cecil, by this one act, affix an indelible stigma upon his name, transmitting to posterity a memorable example of an unnatural connection between splendour of talents and baseness of mind. After Essex had passed some days in the solitude and reflections of a prison, his proud heart was at last subdued, not by the fear of death, but by the sentiments of religion; a principle which he had before attempted to make the instrument of his ambition, but which now took a more firm hold of his mind, and prevailed over every other motive and consideration. His spiritual directors persuaded him, that he never could obtain the pardon of Heaven unless he made a full confession of his disloyalty; and he gave in to the council an account of all his criminal designs, as well as of his correspondence with the king of Scots. He spared not even his most intimate friends, such as lord Mountjoy, whom he had engaged in these conspiracies; and he sought to pacify his present remorse by making such atonements as, in any other period of his life, he would have deemed more blameable than those attempts themselves which were the objects of his penitence. Sir Harry Nevil, in particular, a man of merit, he accused of a correspondence with the conspirators; though it appears that this gentleman had never assented to the proposals made him, and was no farther criminal than in not revealing the earl's treason; an office to which every man of honour naturally bears the strongest reluctance. Nevil was thrown into prison, and underwent a severe persecution: but, as the queen found Mountjoy an able and successful commander, she continued him in his government, and sacrificed her resentment to the public service.

Elizabeth affected extremely the praise of clemency; and in every great example which she had made during her reign, she had always appeared full of reluctance and hesitation: but the present situation of Essex called forth all her tender affections, and kept her in the most real agitation and irresolution. She felt a perpetual combat between resentment and inclination, pride and compassion, the care of her own safety and concern for her favourite; and her situation, during this interval, was perhaps more an object of pity than that to which Essex himself was reduced. She signed the warrant for his execution: she countermanded it; she again resolved on his death; she felt a new return of tenderness. Essex's enemies told her, that he himself desired to die, and had assured her, that she could never be in safety while he lived: it is likely that this proof of penitence and of concern for her would produce a contrary effect to what they intended, and would revive all the fond affection which she had so long indulged towards the unhappy prisoner. But what chiefly hardened her heart against him was his supposed obstinacy in never making, as she hourly expected, any application to her for mercy; and she finally, in a transport of rage, pronounced his final doom, and signed that warrant which was to terminate a life more dear to her than her own. He discovered at his death symptoms rather of penitence and piety than of fear; and willingly acknowledged the justice of the sentence by which he suffered. The execution, on the 25th of February, was private in the Tower, agreeably to his own request. He was apprehensive, he said, lest the favour and compassion of the people would too much raise his heart in those moments, when humiliation under the afflicting hand of Heaven was the only proper sentiment which he could indulge. And the queen, no doubt, thought that prudence required the removing of so melancholy a spectacle from the public eye (v).

The earl of Essex was but thirty-four years of age, when his rashness, imprudence, and violence, brought him to this untimely end. We must here, as in many other instances, lament the inconstancy of human nature, that a person endowed with so many noble virtues, generosity, sincerity, friendship, valour, eloquence, and industry, should, in the latter period of his life, have given reins to his ungovernable passions, and involved not only himself but many of his friends in utter ruin. The queen's tendernes and passion for him, as it was the cause of those premature honours which he attained, seems, on the whole, the chief circumstance which brought on his unhappy fate. Confident of her partiality towards him, as well as of his own merit, he treated her with a haughtiness which neither her love nor her dignity could bear; and as her amorous inclinations, in so advanced an age, would naturally make her appear ridiculous, if not odious, in his eyes, he was engaged by an imprudent openness, of which he made profession, to discover too easily those sentiments to her.

(u) The most remarkable circumstance in Essex's trial was Bacon's appearance against him. He was none of the crown lawyers; so was not obliged by his office to assist at this trial: yet did he not scruple in order to obtain the queen's favour, to be active in bereaving of life his friend and patron, whose generosity he had often experienced. He compared Essex's conduct, in pretending to fear the attempts of his adversaries, to that of Pisistratus the Athenian, who cut and wounded his own body; and making the people believe that his enemies had committed the violence, obtained a guard for his person, by whose assistance he afterwards subdued the liberties of his country.

(v) Sir Walter Raleigh, who went to the Tower on purpose, and who beheld Essex's execution from a window, increased much by this action the general hatred under which he already laboured: it was thought that his sole intention was to feast his eyes with the death of an enemy; and no apology which he could make for so ungenerous a conduct, could be accepted by the public. The cruelty and animosity with which he urged on Essex's fate, even when Cecil relented, were still regarded as the principles of this unmanly behaviour.

The

The many reconciliations and returns of affection, of which he had still made advantage, induced him to venture on new provocations, till he pushed her beyond all bounds of patience; and he forgot, that though the sentiments of the woman were ever strong in her, those of the sovereign had still, in the end, appeared predominant.

Some of Essex's associates, Cuffe, Davers, Blount, Meric, and Davies, were tried and condemned, and all of these, except Davies, were executed. The queen pardoned the rest; being persuaded that they were drawn in merely from their friendship to that nobleman, and their care of his safety; and were ignorant of the more criminal part of his intentions. Southampton's life was saved with great difficulty; but he was detained in prison till the accession of James the First.

The king of Scots, apprehensive lest his correspondence with Essex might have been discovered, and have given offence to Elizabeth, sent the earl of Marre and lord Kinloss as ambassadors to England, in order to congratulate the queen on her escape from the late insurrection and conspiracy. They were also ordered to make secret inquiry whether any measures had been taken by her for excluding him from the succession, as well as to discover the inclinations of the chief nobility and counsellors, in case of the queen's demise. They found the dispositions of men as favourable as they could wish; and they even entered into a correspondence with secretary Cecil, whose influence, after the fall of Essex, was now unlimited, and who was resolved, by this policy, to acquire in time the confidence of the successor. He therefore assured the ambassadors that their sovereign might make himself easy with regard to the succession. He knew how jealous Elizabeth ever was of her authority, and he therefore carefully concealed from her his attachment to James: but he afterwards asserted, that nothing could be more advantageous to her than this correspondence; because the king of Scots, secure of mounting the throne by his undoubted title, aided by those connections with the English ministry, was the less likely to give any disturbance to the present sovereign. He also persuaded that prince to remain in quiet, and patiently to expect that time should open to him the inheritance of the crown, without pushing his friends on desperate enterprizes, which would totally incapacitate them from serving him. James's equity, as well as his natural facility of disposition, easily inclined him to embrace that resolution; and in this manner the minds of the English were silently but universally disposed to admit, without opposition, the succession of the Scottish line: the death of Essex, by putting an end to faction, had been rather favourable than prejudicial to that great event.

Henry the Fourth of France, who was little prepossessed in favour of James, and who, for obvious reasons, was averse to the union of England and Scotland, ordered his ambassador to insinuate to Cecil his willingness to concur in any measure for disappointing the hopes of the Scottish monarch; but as Cecil shewed an entire disapprobation of such schemes, the court of France took no farther steps in that matter; and thus, the only foreign power which could give any considerable disturbance to James's succession, was induced to acquiesce in it. Henry made a journey in the summer of 1601 to Calais, that he might fortify the frontiers of his kingdom; and the queen hearing of his intentions went to Dover, in hopes of having a personal interview with a monarch, whom, of all others, she most loved and most respected. The king of France, who felt the same sentiments towards her, would gladly have accepted of the proposal; but as many difficulties occurred, it appeared necessary to lay aside, by common consent, the project of an interview. Elizabeth, however, wrote successively two letters to Henry, one by Edmondes, another by sir Robert Sydney; in which she expressed a desire of conferring, about a business of importance, with some minister in whom that prince reposed entire confidence. The marquis of Rosni, afterwards created duke of Sully, the king's favourite and prime minister, came to Dover in disguise; and the Memoirs of that able statesman contain a full account of his conference with Elizabeth. The queen received the marquis of Rosni with every mark of respect. She held a long conference with him on the situation of affairs in Europe; on which she expatiated with such clearness, such promptitude, and discernment, that Rosni remained lost in astonishment. He was now convinced, that she herself was the source whence the energy of her government was derived; and he plainly perceived, that she had a perfect knowledge of the political interests of the different European powers, of their respective strength, their situation, and resources; from whence, and from deep experience, she was enabled to judge of their means of attack and defence. Rosni was equally surprized to find, that though she had never conferred with Henry on the interests of Europe, they had both entertained the same ideas, and laid the same plan. They had both conceived the design of forming a new political system, and of establishing a balance of power, in order to check the aggrandizement of the house of Austria. This was only to be effected by giving birth to new states, whose wealth and power might be founded on the ruins of that which they meant to humble. Elizabeth proposed to unite the forces of France with those of England, for the purpose of establishing, on a solid foundation, the independence of the Seventeen Provinces of the Netherlands; but, in humbling the house of Austria, she meant that both these powers should proportion their desires to their circumstances, and not seek to extend their own influence so far as to excite the jealousy of the neighbouring princes; that in despoiling Spain of the Low Countries, they should not think of securing to themselves any part of a territory, the possession of which, by encreasing their power, might render them just objects of apprehension to the other potentates of Europe. "For," said she, "if the king, my brother, should display a wish to become proprietor, or only liege-lord of the United Provinces, I do not conceal from you, that I should conceive a well-founded jealousy of him: on the other hand, I should not be offended were he to entertain the same fears with regard to me." The chief object of her conference with Rosni, and of the grand project she had conceived, was to restore Germany to the same state of liberty it had formerly enjoyed, as to the election of its emperors, and the nomination of the king of the Romans; to render the United Provinces independent on Spain, and to form them into a powerful republic, by the annexation, if necessary, of some of the dismembered provinces of Germany; to make the same arrangements in Switzerland, by adding to it certain frontier counties, particularly Franche Compté, and Alsace; and, finally, to reduce all religions to those which appeared the most generally adopted in Europe, viz. the Catholic, the Lutheran, and the Calvinistic.

Henry the Fourth had conceived the same plan, but had never communicated his thoughts on the subject to any other person than Rosni. That nobleman hearing the queen develope this project with equal eloquence and sagacity, did not hesitate to explain to her the ideas of his sovereign, and to profess his own admiration of herself. But as she had frankly opened all her plans to him, he thought it necessary, in return, to explain, without reserve, the state of the French finances, and the impossibility of Henry's engaging, at that time, in such extensive schemes, which would require such vast supplies of men and money. He acknowledged, that his sovereign was endeavouring to collect all the necessary forces for that purpose, but that a delay of some years was indispensably requisite; the house of Austria being too powerful to fall beneath the efforts of a league into which France could not enter, and too rich not to overturn the feeble endeavour which that kingdom could make at the present period, though supported by England and the United Provinces. He observed, that it would be useless and imprudent to carry on a war merely defensive, against an enemy thus powerful; and that, during the delay necessary for restoring to their proper strength the military and naval forces of France, her finances, her government, and commerce, they might endeavour to engage in the league such of the sovereign princes of Germany as were most exposed to the tyranny of Spain. Rosni concluded by telling the queen, that Henry would be greatly pleased, if the reasons he had urged met with her approbation; and if he might be permitted to hope that, from their alliance, a source of mutual advantage and immortal honour might be derived. Elizabeth perfectly agreed with the friend of her ally on the necessity of delay; and the accomplishment of their plan was accordingly deferred till the necessary preparations could be made; but her successor on the throne had a mind that was incapable of conceiving or adopting a project thus extensive; and, when Henry was putting it in execution, he was arrested by the hand of death. The marquis of Rosni departed, filled with just admiration at the solidity of Elizabeth's judgement, judgement, and the greatness of her mind; and he owns, that she was entirely worthy of that high reputation which she enjoyed in Europe.

The queen's magnanimity in forming such extensive projects was the more remarkable, as, besides her having fallen so far into the decline of life, the affairs of Ireland, though conducted with abilities and success, were still in disorder, and made a great diversion of her forces. The expence, incurred by this war, lay heavy upon her narrow revenues; and her ministers, taking advantage of her disposition to frugality, proposed to her an expedient of saving, which, though she at first disapproved of it, she was at last induced to embrace. It was represented to her, by lord Buckhurst, that the great sums of money remitted to Ireland for the pay of the English forces, came, by the necessary course of circulation, into the hands of the rebels, and enabled them to buy abroad all necessary supplies of arms and ammunition, which, from the extreme poverty of that kingdom, and its want of every useful commodity, they could not otherwise find means to purchase. It was therefore recommended to her, that she should pay her forces in base money; and it was asserted, that, besides the great saving to the revenue, this species of coin could never be exported with advantage, and would not pass in any foreign market. Some of her counsellors, however, who seemed to possess more wisdom, maintained, that if the pay of the soldiers were raised in proportion, the Irish rebels would necessarily reap the same benefit from the base money, which would always be taken at a rate suitable to its value; if the pay were not raised, there would be danger of a mutiny among the troops, who, whatever names might be affixed to the pieces of metal, would soon find from experience, that they were defrauded in their income. But Elizabeth, though she justly valued herself on fixing the standard of the English coin, (which had been greatly debased by her predecessors,) and had innovated very little in that delicate article, was seduced by the specious arguments employed by the treasurer on this occasion; and she coined a great quantity of base money, which he made use of in the pay of her soldiers in Ireland.

Lord Mountjoy, the deputy, was a man of abilities; and foreseeing the danger of mutiny among the troops, he led them instantly into the field, and resolved, by means of strict discipline, and by keeping them employed against the enemy, to obviate those inconveniences which were justly to be apprehended. He made military roads, and built a fortress at Moghery; he drove the Mac-Genises out of Lecade; he harassed Tyrone in Ulster with inroads and lesser expeditions; and by destroying every where, and during all seasons, the provisions of the Irish, he reduced them to perish by famine in the woods and morasses, to which they were obliged to retreat. At the same time, sir Henry Docwray, who commanded another body of forces, took the castle of Derry, and put garrisons into Newton and Ainogh; and having seized the monastery of Donnegal near Balishannon, he threw troops into it, and defended it against the assaults of O'Donnel, and a numerous body of Irish soldiery. Nor was sir George Carew idle in the province of Munster. He seized the titular earl of Desmond, and sent him over, with Florence Macarty, another chieftain, prisoner to England. He arrested many suspected persons, and took hostages from others. Having likewise got a reinforcement of two thousand men from England, he threw himself into Corke, which he supplied with arms and provisions; and put every thing in a condition for resisting the Spanish invasion, which was daily expected to take place. The deputy, informed of the danger to which the southern provinces were exposed, left the prosecution of the war against Tyrone, who was reduced to great extremities; and marched with his army into Munster.

At last the Spaniards, under don John d'Aquila, arrived at Kinsale, on the 23rd of September; and sir Richard Piercy, who commanded in the town with a small garrison of a hundred and fifty men, found himself obliged to abandon it on their appearance. These invaders amounted to four thousand men, and the Irish discovered a strong propensity to join them, in order to free themselves from the English government, with which they were extremely discontented (w). The Irish also bore a great favour to the Spaniards, having entertained the opinion that they themselves were descended from that nation; and their attachment to the Catholic religion proved a new cause of affection to the invaders. D'Aquila assumed the title of general in the holy war for the preservation of the faith in Ireland; and he endeavoured to persuade the people that Elizabeth was, by several bulls of the pope, deprived of her crown; that her subjects were absolved from their oaths of allegiance; and that the Spaniards were come to deliver the Irish from the dominion of the devil. Mountjoy found it necessary to act with vigour, in order to prevent a total insurrection of the Irish; and having collected his forces, he formed the siege of Kinsale by land; while sir Richard Levison, with a small squadron, blockaded it by sea. He had no sooner begun his operations, than he heard of the arrival of another body of two thousand Spaniards under the command of Alphonso Ocampo, who had taken possession of Baltimore and Barehaven; and he was obliged to detach sir George Carew to oppose their progress. Tyrone, meanwhile, with Randal, Mac-Surley, Tirel baron of Kelly, and other chieftains of the Irish, had joined Ocampo with all their forces, and were marching to the relief of Kinsale. The deputy, informed of their design by intercepted letters, made preparations to receive them; and being reinforced by Levison with six hundred marines, he posted his troops on an advantageous ground, which lay on the passage of the enemy, leaving some cavalry to prevent a sally from d'Aquila and the Spanish garrison. When Tyrone, with a detachment of Irish and Spaniards, approached, he was surprized to find the English so well posted, and ranged in good order; and he immediately sounded a retreat: but the deputy gave orders to pursue him; and having thrown these advanced troops into disorder, he followed them to the main body, whom he also attacked, and put to flight, with the slaughter of twelve hundred men. Ocampo was taken prssoner: Tyrone fled into Ulster; O'Donnel made his escape into Spain; and d'Aquila, finding himself reduced to the greatest difficulties, was obliged to capitulate upon such terms as the deputy prescribed to him: he surrendered Kinsale and Baltimore, and agreed to evacuate the kingdom. This great blow, joined to other successes, gained by Wilmot, governor of Kerry, and by Roger and Gavin Harvey, threw the rebels into dismay, and gave a prospect of the final reduction of Ireland.

The Irish war, though successful, was extremely burthensome on the queen's revenue; and besides the supplies granted by parliament, which were indeed very small, but which they ever regarded as mighty concessions, she had been obliged, notwithstanding her great frugality, to employ other expedients, such as selling the royal demesnes and crown jewels, and exacting loans from the people; in order to support this cause, so essential to the honour and interests of England. The necessity of her affairs obliged her again to summon a parliament, which met on the 27th of October, 1601; and it here appeared that, since the death of Essex she had lost much of her popularity; and when she appeared in public, she was no longer received with those acclamations of joy which were wont to assail her ears. But although these marks of indifference gave her great uneasiness, she did not seem disposed to court the favour of her subjects by unusual indulgences; on the contrary, at the present meeting of parliament, she displayed the same jealousy of her prerogative, the same despotic disposition, which she had ever evinced on similar occasions.

The active reign of Elizabeth had enabled many persons to distinguish themselves in civil and military employments; and the queen, who was not able, from her revenue, to give them any rewards proportioned to their services, had made use of an expedient which had been employed by her predecessors, but which had never been carried to such an extreme as under her administration. She granted her servants and courtiers patents for monopolies; and these patents they sold to others, who were thereby enabled to raise commodities to what price they pleased, and who put invincible restraints upon all commerce, industry, and emulation in the arts (x). These monopolists were so exhorbitant in their demands, that in some places they raised (w) One chief ground of their complaint was the introduction of trials by jury; an institution abhorred by that people, though nothing contributes more to the support of that equity and liberty, for which the English laws are so justly celebrated.

(x) It is astonishing to consider the number and importance of those commodities which were thus assigned over to patentees. Currants, salt, iron, powder, cards, calf skins, felts, pouldavies, ox-shin-bones, train-oil, lists of cloth, pot-ashes, anniseeds, vinegar, sea-coals, steel, aquavitæ, brushes, pots, bottles, saltpetre, lead, accidences, oil, calamine-stone, oil of blubber, glasses, paper, starch, tin, sulphur, new drapery, raised the price of salt from sixteen-pence a bushel, to fourteen or fifteen shillings. Such high profits naturally begat intruders upon their commerce; and in order to secure themselves against encroachments, the patentees were armed with high and arbitrary powers from the council, by which they were enabled to oppress the people at pleasure, and to exact money from such as they thought proper to accuse of interfering with their patent (y). And while all domestic intercourse was thus restrained, lest any scope should remain for industry, almost every species of foreign commerce was confined to exclusive companies, who bought and sold at any price that they themselves thought proper to offer or exact.

These grievances, the most intolerable for the present, and the most pernicious in their consequences that ever were known in any age, or under any government, had been mentioned in the last parliament, and a petition had even been presented to the queen complaining of the patents; but she still persisted in defending her monopolists against her people. A bill was now introduced into the lower house, abolishing all these monopolies; and as the former application had been unsuccessful, a law was insisted on as the only certain expedient for correcting these abuses. The courtiers, on the other hand, maintained that this matter regarded the prerogative, and that the commons could never hope for success if they did not make application, in the most humble and respectful manner, to the queen's goodness and beneficence. The topics which were advanced in the house, and which came equally from the courtiers and the country gentlemen, and were admitted by both, will appear the most extraordinary to such as are prepossessed with an idea of the privileges enjoyed by the people during that age, and of the liberty possessed under the administration of Elizabeth. It was asserted that the queen inherited both an enlarging and a restraining power; by her prerogative she might set at liberty what was restrained by statute or otherwise, and by her prerogative she might restrain what was otherwise at liberty. That the royal prerogative was not to be canvassed nor disputed nor examined; and did not even admit of any limitation: that absolute princes, such as the sovereigns of England, were a species of divinity: that it was in vain to attempt tying the queen's hands by laws or statutes; since, by means of her dispensing power, she could loosen herself at pleasure: and that even if a clause should be annexed to a statute, excluding her dispensing power, she could first dispense with that clause, and then with the statute. After all these warm debates, more worthy of a Turkish divan than of an English house of commons, according to our present idea of this assembly, the queen, who perceived how odious monopolies had become, and what heats were likely to arise, sent for the speaker, and desired him to acquaint the house, that she would immediately cancel the most grievous and oppressive of these patents.

The house was struck with astonishment, and admiration, and gratitude, at this extraordinary instance of the queen's goodness and condescension. A member said, with tears in his eyes, that if a sentence of everlasting happiness had been pronounced in his favour, he could not have felt more joy than that with which he was at present overwhelmed. Another observed, that this message from the sacred person of the queen was a kind of gospel or glad tidings, and ought to be received as such, and be written in the tablets of their hearts. And it was farther remarked, that in the same manner as the Deity would not give his glory to another, so the queen herself was the only agent in their present prosperity and happiness. The house voted, That the speaker, with a committee, should ask permission to wait on her majesty, and return thanks to her for her gracious concessions to her people.

When the speaker, with the other members, was introduced to the queen, they all flung themselves on their knees; and remained in that posture a considerable time, till she thought proper to express her desire that they should rise (z). The speaker displayed the gratitude of the commons; because her sacred ears were ever open to hear them, and her blessed hands were stretched out to relieve them! They acknowledged, he said, in all duty and thankfulness, that before they called, her preventing grace and all-deserving goodness watched over them for their good; more ready to give than they could desire, much less deserve. He remarked, that the attribute which was most proper to God, to perform all he promiseth, appertained also to her; and that she was all truth, all constancy, and all goodness. And he concluded with these expressions, "Neither do we present our thanks in words or any outward sign, which can be no sufficient retribution for so great goodness; but in all duty and thankfulness, prostrate at your feet, we present our most loyal and thankful hearts, even the last drop of blood in our hearts, and the last spirit of breath in our nostrils, to be poured out, to be breathed up for your safety." The queen heard very patiently this speech, so fraught with fulsome and gross adulation, in which she was flattered in phrases appropriated to the Supreme Being; and she returned an answer full of such expressions of tenderness towards her people, as ought to have appeared equally fulsome after the late instances of rigour which she had employed, and from which nothing but necessity had caused her to depart. Thus was this critical affair happily terminated; but how must the perusal of this speech make every Englishman of the present day blush for his ancestors; who belied the spirit, while they betrayed the liberties of their country; and by their extreme servility degraded their very nature.

The commons, in gratitude, granted her a supply quite unprecedented, of four subsidies and eight fifteenths; and they were so dutiful as to vote this supply before they received any satisfaction in the business of monopolies, which they justly considered as of the utmost importance to the interest and happiness of the nation. Had they attempted to extort that concession by keeping the supply in suspense, so haughty was the queen's disposition, that this appearance of constraint and jealousy had been sufficient to have produced a denial of all their requests, and to have forced her into some acts of authority still more violent and arbitrary.

The remaining events of this reign are neither numerous nor important. The queen, finding that the Spaniards had involved her in so much trouble, by fomenting and assisting the Irish rebellion, resolved to give them employment at home; and, in 1602, she fitted out a squadron of nine ships, under sir Richard Levison, admiral, and sir William Monson, vice-admiral, whom she sent on an expedition to the coast of Spain. The admiral, with part of the squadron, met the galleons loaded with treasure; but was not strong enough to attack them. The vice-admiral also fell in with some rich ships; but they escaped for a like reason: and these two brave officers, that their expedition might not prove intirely fruitless, resolved to attack the harbour of Coimbra in Portugal; where they received intelligence, a very rich carrack had taken shelter. The harbour was guarded by a castle: there were eleven gallies stationed in it: and the militia of the country, to the number, as was believed, of twenty thousand men, appeared in arms on the shore: yet, notwithstanding these obstacles, and others derived from the winds and tides, the English squadron broke into the harbour, dismounted the guns of the castle, sunk, or burnt, or put to flight, the gallies, and obliged the carrack to surrender. They brought her home to England, and she was valued at a million of ducats: a sensible loss to the Spaniards; and a supply still more important to Elizabeth.

The affairs of Ireland, after the defeat of Tyrone and the expulsion of the Spaniards, hastened to a settlement. Lord Mountjoy divided his army into small parties, and harassed the rebels on every side: he built Charlemont, and many other small forts, which were impregnable to the Irish, and guarded all the important passes of the drapery, dried pilchards, transportation of iron ordnance, of beer, of horn, of leather, importation of Spanish wool, of Irish yarn: these are but a part of the commodities which had been appropriated to monopolists. When this list was read in the house, a member cried, Is not bread in the number? Bread! said every one with astonishment: Yes, I assure you, replies he, if affairs go on at this rate, we shall have bread reduced to a monopoly before next parliament.

(y) The patentees of saltpetre having the power of entering into every house, and of committing what havoc they pleased in stables, cellars, or wherever they suspected salt-petre might be gathered; commonly extorted money from those who desired to free themselves from this damage or trouble.

(z) We learn from Hentzner's Travels, that no one spoke to queen Elizabeth without kneeling; though now and then she raised some with waving her hand. Nay, wherever she turned her eye, every one fell on his knees. Her successor first allowed his courtiers to omit this ceremony; and as he exerted not the power, so he relinquished the appearance of despotism. Even when queen Elizabeth was absent, those who covered her table, though persons of quality, neither approached it nor retired from it without kneeling, and that often three times.

country: the activity of sir Henry Docwray and sir Arthur Chichester permitted no repose or security to the rebels: and many of the chieftains, after skulking, during some time, in woods and morasses, submitted to mercy, and received such conditions, as the deputy was pleased to impose upon them. Tyrone himself made application, in 1603, by Arthur Mac-Baron, his brother, to be received upon terms; but Mountjoy would not admit him except he made an absolute surrender of his life and fortunes to the queen's mercy. He appeared before the deputy at Millefont, in a habit and posture suitable to his present fortune; and after acknowledging his offence in the most humble terms, he was committed to custody by Mountjoy, who intended to bring him over captive into England, to be disposed of at the queen's pleasure.

But Elizabeth was now incapable of receiving any satisfaction from this fortunate event: she had fallen into a profound melancholy; which all the advantages of her high fortune, all the glories of her prosperous reign, were unable in any degree to alleviate or assuage. Some ascribed this depression of mind to her repentance of granting a pardon to Tyrone, whom she had always resolved to bring to condign punishment for his treasons, but who had made such interest with the ministers, as to extort remission from her. Others, with more likelihood, accounted for her dejection by a discovery which she had made of the correspondence maintained in her court with her successor the king of Scots, and by the neglect to which, on account of her old age and infirmities, she imagined herself to be exposed. But there is another cause assigned for her melancholy, which has long been rejected by historians as romantic, but which late discoveries have fully confirmed (a): some incidents happened which revived her tenderness for Essex, and filled her with the deepest sorrow for the consent which she had, in a transport of rage, vexation, and disappointment, unwarily given to his execution.

The earl of Essex, after his return from the fortunate expedition against Cadiz, observing the increase of the queen's fond attachment towards him, took occasion to regret, that the necessity of her service required him often to be absent from her person, and exposed him to all those ill offices, which his enemies, more assiduous in their attendance, could employ against him. She was moved with this tender jealousy; and making him the present of a ring, desired him to keep that pledge of her affection, and assured him, that into whatever disgrace he should fall, whatever prejudices she might be induced to entertain against him, yet, if he sent her that ring, she would immediately upon the sight of it recal her former tenderness, would afford him a patient hearing, and would lend a favourable ear to his apology. Essex, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, reserved this precious gift to the last extremity; but after his trial and condemnation, he resolved to try the experiment, and he committed the ring to the countess of Nottingham, whom he desired to deliver it to the queen. The countess was prevailed on by her husband, the mortal enemy of Essex, not to execute the commission; and Elizabeth, who still expected that her favourite would make this last appeal to her tenderness, and who ascribed the neglect of it to his invincible obstinacy, was, after much delay and many internal combats, pushed by resentment and policy to sign the warrant for his execution. The countess of Nottingham falling into sickness, and affected with the near approach of death, was seized with remorse for her conduct; and having obtained a visit from the queen, she craved her pardon, and revealed to her the fatal secret. The queen, astonished with this incident, burst into a furious passion: she shook the dying countess in her bed; and crying to her, That God might pardon her, but she never could, she broke from her, and thenceforth resigned herself over to the deepest and most incurable melancholy. She rejected all consolation: she even refused food and sustenance: and throwing herself on the floor, she remained sullen and immoveable, feeding her thoughts on her afflictions, and declaring life and existence an insufferable burthen to her. Few words she uttered; and they were all expressive of some inward grief, which she cared not to reveal: but sighs and groans were the chief vent which she gave to her despondency, and which, though they discovered her sorrows, were never able to ease or assuage them. Ten days and nights she lay upon the carpet, leaning on cushions which her maids brought her; and her physicians could not persuade her to allow herself to be put to bed, much less to make trial of any remedies which they prescribed to her. Her anxious mind at last had so long preyed on her frail body, that her end was visibly approaching; and the council, being assembled, sent the keeper, admiral, and secretary, to know her will with regard to her successor. She answered with a faint voice, that, as she had held a regal sceptre, she desired no other than a royal successor. Cecil requesting her to explain herself more particularly, she subjoined, that she would have a king to succeed her; and who should that be but her nearest kinsman, the king of Scots? Being then advised by the archbishop of Canterbury to fix her thoughts upon God, she replied, that she did so, nor did her mind in the least wander from him. Her voice soon after left her; her senses failed; she fell into a lethargic slumber, which continued some hours; and she expired gently, without farther struggle or convulsion, on the 24th of March, 1603, in the seventieth year of her age, and forty-fifth of her reign (b).

"So dark a cloud," says Hume, "overcast the evening of that day, which had shone out with a mighty lustre in the eyes of all Europe. There are few great personages in history who have been more exposed to the calumny of enemies, and the adulation of friends, than queen Elizabeth; and yet there scarcely is any whose reputation has been more certainly determined by the unanimous consent of posterity. The unusual length of her administration, and the strong features of her character, were able to overcome all prejudices; and obliging her detractors to abate much of their invectives, and her admirers somewhat of their panegyrics, have at last, in spite of political factions, and, what is more, of religious animosities, produced a uniform judgement with regard to her conduct. Her vigour, her constancy, her magnanimity, her penetration, vigilance, address, are allowed to merit the highest praises, and appear not to have been surpassed by any person that ever filled a throne: a conduct less rigorous, less imperious, more sincere, more indulgent to her people, would have been requisite to form a perfect character. By the force of her mind, she controlled all her more active and stronger qualities, and prevented them from running into excesses: her heroism was exempt from temerity, her frugality from avarice, her friendship from partiality, her active temper from turbulency and vain ambition: she guarded not herself with equal care or equal success from lesser infirmities; the rivalship of beauty, the desire of admiration, the jealousy of love, and the sallies of anger.

"Her singular talents for government were founded equally on her temper and on her capacity. Endowed with a great command over herself, she soon obtained an uncontrolled ascendant over her people; and while she merited all their esteem by her real virtues, she also engaged their affections by her pretended ones. Few sovereigns of England succeeded to the throne in more difficult circumstances; and none ever conducted the government with such uniform success and felicity. Though unacquainted with the practice of toleration, the true secret for managing religious factions, she preserved her people, by her superior prudence, from those confusions in which theological controversy had involved all the neighbouring nations:

(a) See the proofs of this remarkable fact collected in Birch's Negociations, p. 206. And Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 481, 505, 506, &c.

(b) Her dying moments are thus described by Robert Cary, earl of Monmouth, in his Memoirs of his own Life:

"When I came to court," says that nobleman, who had just arrived from Scotland, "I found the queen ill-disposed, and shee kept her inner lodging: yet shee, hearing of my arrivall, sent for mee. I found her in one of her withdrawing chambers, sitting low upon her cushions. Shee called mee to her. I kist her hand; and told her it was my chiefest happinesse to see her in safety and in health, which I wished might long continue. Shee took mee by the hand and wrung it hard, and said, "No, Robin, I am not well." And then discoursed with me of her indisposition, and that her heart had been sad and heavy for ten or twelve days; and in her discourse she fetched not so few as forty or fifty great sighes. I was grieved at the first to see her in this plight; for, in all my life-time before, I never knew her fetch a sigh, but when the queen of Scottes was beheaded. Then, upon my knowledge, she shed many teares and sighes. I used the best words I could, to persuade her from this melancholy humour; but I found by her, it was too deep rooted in her heart, and hardly to be removed. This was upon a Saturday night. From the next day, forwards, shee grew worse and worse. Shee remained upon her cushions four dayes and nights, at the least. All about her could not persuade her to take any sustenance, or go to bed. The queene grew worse and worse, because she would be so, none about her being able to persuade her to go to bed. My lord admirall was sent for: what by faire meanes, what by force, he got her to bed. There was no hope of recovery, because she refused all remedies. On Wednesday, the 23rd of March, she grew speechless."

nations: and though her enemies were the most powerful princes of Europe, the most active, the most enterprising, the least scrupulous, she was able, by her vigour, to make deep impressions on their states: her own greatness meanwhile remained untouched and unimpaired.

"The wise ministers and brave warriors who flourished under her reign, share the praise of her success; but instead of lessening the applause due to her, they make a great addition to it. They owed all of them their advancement to her choice; they were supported by her constancy; and with all their abilities they were never able to acquire any undue ascendant over her. In her family, in her court, in her kingdom, she remained equally mistress: the force of the tender passions was great over her, but the force of her mind was still superior; and the combat which her victory visibly cost her, serves only to display the firmness of her resolution, and the loftiness of her ambitious sentiments.

"The fame of this princess, though it has surmounted the prejudices both of faction and bigotry, yet lies still exposed to another prejudice, which is more durable because more natural, and which, according to the different views in which we survey her, is capable either of exalting beyond measure, or diminishing the lustre of her character. This prejudice is founded on the consideration of her sex. When we contemplate her as a woman, we are apt to be struck with the highest admiration of her great qualities and extensive capacity; but we are also apt to require some more softness of disposition, some greater lenity of temper, some of those amiable weaknesses by which her sex is distinguished. But the true method of estimating her merit, is to lay aside all these considerations, and consider her merely as a rational being placed in authority, and entrusted with the government of mankind. We may find it difficult to reconcile our fancy to her as a wife or a mistress; but her qualities as a sovereign, though with some considerable exceptions, are the object of undisputed applause and approbation."

Such is the character of queen Elizabeth given by Mr. Hume, an author whose shining talents and historical knowledge were certainly of the first class; but he has only presented us with a part of the true character of this princess. However to stem the torrent of popular opinion—of opinion confirmed and consecrated by the long prescription of upwards of two centuries—to contradict the sentiments and confute the assertions of writers of different parties, high in literary fame and moral celebrity; to counteract the misguided efforts of the virtuous, and the dark machinations of the designing; to crush with indignant force, the vile spirit of adulation, and hold up to public contempt the grovelling arts of servility; is a task neither pleasant to undertake, nor easy to accomplish. But it is peculiarly the province of the historian to secure the triumph of truth over prejudice: it is his duty to stand forth the intrepid champion of virtue; to display his resolution in rescuing from unmerited obloquy calumniated innocence, and in exposing to just indignation illustrious vice. Taught, from our infancy, to respect the memory of Elizabeth, and to consider her reign as an epoch of freedom and of glory, we found it painful to dispel the flattering errors of youth, the grateful illusions of inexperience; and it was with considerable difficulty we could divest ourselves of the idea of yet when writers of knowledge profound, of integrity incorruptible, of reputation unpolluted and unimpeached, undertook, from the best of motives, to expose the fallacy of those opinions we had long been accustomed, in common with the generality of the nation, to cherish, conviction flashed on our mind, and extorted a compleat, though reluctant, acquiescence in the validity of their proofs, and the justice of their remarks.

"the golden days of good queen Bess:"

For a masculine vigour of mind, indeed, Elizabeth was eminently distinguished. Bold, enterprizing, inquisitive, and resolute, her penetration was active and acute, her judgement solid, her comprehension vast. Firm and undaunted in the hour of danger, her projects were conceived with spirit, and executed with energy. Had her extensive endowments been under the influence and regulation of virtue, they might have been productive of infinite glory to herself, and of vast felicity to her people; but, unhappily, they were too often rendered subservient to the dark purposes of vice. In her professions, she evinced an anxiety to promote the welfare of her subjects, but in her actions she frequently betrayed a disposition to oppress them: while she consulted their tranquillity, she invaded their liberties. She was careful to enforce a due administration of justice, except when ambition, malice, or revenge, induced her to violate its dictates, and pervert its course. Her policy was successfully exerted for the preservation of peace in her own dominions; though generally dark, insidious, and illiberal, it sought to promote its object at the expence of her neighbours. From the dissensions which she contributed to excite among the continental powers, did Elizabeth principally seek to derive the safety of her kingdom. She was a strenuous defender of the Protestant faith it is true; but there is every reason to believe, that it proceeded rather from interested motives than from a principle of piety; for she frequently betrayed a marked predilection for the forms and tenets of the Roman Catholic church.

To the representatives of the people in parliament Elizabeth conducted herself with a degree of pride, insolence, and tyranny, that has seldom been equalled, and never exceeded. Even in controversies where the respective rights of the sovereign and the subject had been less accurately defined, where the prerogatives of the former had scarcely been questioned, and where no Charter of Liberties had been granted to the latter, a nation's rights had never been invaded by more violent exertions of power, by a more daring display of imperious despotism.

Where the gratification of her passions was concerned she was extremely prodigal; but, in other respects, even where interest called for liberality, she was remarkably parsimonious. In her conduct to Mary, (though we do not entertain the opinion that the Scottish queen was the immaculate creature some would represent her to be,) she certainly betrayed the malignity of a mind cankered by jealousy, and corrupted by a criminal indulgence to its own vicious propensities. Her deep hypocrisy, her habits of swearing, her gusts of anger, her pride, petulance, and cruelty; all excite our detestation. She was egregiously vain; and such was the ardour of her lust, that she became a prostitute in spite of nature. The long list of her paramours proclaims her "as great a latitudinarian in her practices of lewdness, as she was in her principles of dishonour:" and, to use the language of an author, at once nervous, elegant, profound, "Even when palsied with age, she was yet burning with unquenchable desires; and, vain of her haggard and cadaverous form, sought to allure her many lovers." Such was Elizabeth, who wished to have it engraven on her tomb, "Here lieth Elizabeth, who reigned a virgin, and died a virgin."

Government of England.

IN all countries different people have entertained different notions with respect to government, and among the English there are some authors who have distinguished themselves by their adhering to principles of liberty and a popular government, and who have long indulged their prejudices against the succeeding race of princes, by bestowing unbounded panegyrics on the virtue and wisdom of Elizabeth; but some of them have been so extremely ignorant of the transactions of this reign, as to extol her for a quality which, of all others, she was least possessed of; viz. a tender regard for the constitution, and a concern for the liberties and privileges of her people. But as it is scarcely possible for the prepossessions of party to throw a veil much longer over facts so palpable and undeniable, there is danger lest the public should run into the opposite extreme, and should entertain an aversion to the memory of a princess who exercised the royal authority in a manner so contrary to all the ideas which we at present entertain of a legal constitution. Elizabeth supported the prerogatives transmitted to her by her predecessors: she might indeed have been somewhat more tenacious of the royal prerogative than some of her predecessors had been: she believed that her subjects were entitled to no more liberty than their ancestors had enjoyed: she found that they entirely acquiesced in her arbitrary mode of administration: and it was not natural for her to find fault with a form of government by which she herself was invested with such unlimited authority. In the particular exertions of power the question ought never to be forgotten, What is best? But in the general distribution of power among the several members of a constitution, there can seldom be admitted any other question than What is established? Few examples occur of princes who have willingly resigned their power: none of those who have, without struggle and reluctance, allowed it to be extorted from them. If any other rule than established practice be followed, factions and dissensions must multiply without end; and though many constitutions, and none more than the British, have been improved even by violent innovations, the praise bestowed on those patriots to whom the nation has been indebted for its privileges, ought to be given with some reserve, and surely without the least rancour against those who adhered to the ancient constitution (c).

In order to be well acquainted with the ancient constitution of England, there is not a period of our history which deserves more to be studied than the reign of Elizabeth. The prerogatives of this princess were scarcely ever disputed, and she therefore employed them without scruple: her imperious temper, a circumstance in which she went far beyond any of her successors, rendered her exertions of power violent and frequent, and discovered the full extent of her authority: the great popularity which she enjoyed, proves that she did not infringe any established liberties of the people, though she exacted every privilege of the crown with a very high hand: there remains evidence sufficient to ascertain the most noted acts of her administration: and though that evidence must be drawn from a source very different from that of the ordinary historians, it becomes only the more authentic on that account, and serves as a stronger proof that her particular exertions of power were conceived to be nothing but the ordinary course of administration, since they were not thought remarkable enough to be recorded even by contemporary writers. If there was any difference in this particular, the people in former reigns seem rather to have been more submissive than even during the age of Elizabeth (d). It may here be proper to recount some of the ancient prerogatives of the crown, and lay open the sources of that great power which the English monarchs formerly enjoyed.

One of the most ancient and most established instruments of arbitrary power in this country was the court of Star-chamber, which possessed an unlimited discretionary authority of fining, imprisoning, and inflicting corporal punishment, and whose jurisdiction extended to all sorts of offences, contempts, and disorders, that lay not within reach of the common law. The members of this court consisted of the privy council and the judges; men who, all of them, enjoyed their offices during the pleasure of the sovereign: and when the prince himself was present, he was the sole judge, and all the others could only interpose with their advice and counsel. There needed but this one court in any government to put an end to all regular, legal, and exact plans of liberty: for who would have the boldness to set himself in opposition to the crown and ministry, or who would come forward and aspire to the character of being a patron of freedom, while exposed to so arbitrary a jurisdiction? We much question whether any of the monarchies in Europe, however absolute the authority of their rulers, or tyrannical their edicts, contain at present so illegal and despotic a tribunal.

The court of High Commission was another jurisdiction still more terrible; both because the crime of heresy, of which it took cognizance, was more undefinable than any civil offence, and because its methods of inquisition, and of administering oaths, were more contrary to all the most simple ideas of justice and equity. The fines and imprisonments imposed by this court were frequent: the deprivations and suspensions of the clergy for non-conformity were also numerous, and comprehended at one time the third of all the ecclesiastics of England (e). The queen, in a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, said expressly, that she was resolved, "That no man should be suffered to decline, either on the left or on the right hand, from the drawn line limited by authority, and by her laws and injunctions (f)."

But Martial Law went beyond even these two courts in a prompt, arbitrary, and violent method of decision.—Whenever there was any insurrection or public disorder, the crown employed martial law; and it was during that time, exercised not only over the soldiers, but over the whole people: any one might be punished as a rebel, or an aider and abettor of rebellion, whom the provost-martial, or lieutenant of a county, or their deputies, pleased to suspect. Lord Bacon says, that the trial at common law, granted to the earl of Essex and his fellow conspirators, was a favour; for that the case would have borne and required the severity of martial law (g). There have been instances of its being employed by queen Mary in defence of what she termed orthodoxy. There remains a letter of queen Elizabeth's to the earl of Sussex, after the suppression of the northern rebellion, in which she sharply reproves him because she had not heard of his having executed any criminals by martial law (h); though it is probable that nearly eight hundred persons suffered, one way or other, on account of that slight insurrection. But the kings of England did not always limit the exercise of this law to times of civil war and disorder. In 1552, when there was no rebellion or insurrection, king Edward granted a commission of martial law; and empowered the commissioners to execute it, as should be thought by their discretions most necessary (i). Queen Elizabeth too was not sparing in the use of this law. In 1573, one Peter Burchet, a Puritan, being persuaded that it was meritorious to kill such as opposed the truth of the gospel, ran into the street, and wounded Hawkins, the famous sea-captain, whom he took for Hatton, the queen's favourite. The queen was so incensed, that she ordered him to be punished instantly by martial law; but, upon the remonstrance of some prudent counsellors, who told her that this law was usually confined to turbulent times, she recalled her order, and delivered over Burchet to the common law (k). But she continued not always so reserved in exerting this authority. There remains a proclamation of her's in which she orders martial law to be used against all such as import bulls, or even forbidden books and pamphlets, from abroad (l); and prohibits the questioning of the lieutenants, or their deputies, for their arbitrary punishment of such offenders, any law or statute to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding. We have another act of her's still more extraordinary. The streets of London were much infested with idle vagabonds and riotous persons: the lord mayor had endeavoured to repress this disorder: the Star-chamber had exerted its authority, and inflicted punishment on these rioters: but the queen, finding those remedies ineffectual, revived martial law, and gave sir Thomas Wilford a commission of provost-martial: "Granting him authority, and commanding him, upon signification given by the justices of peace in London, or the neighbouring counties, of such offenders worthy to be speedily executed by martial law, to attach and take the same persons, and in the presence of the said justices, according to justice of martial law, to execute them upon the gallows or gibbet openly, or near to such place where the said rebellious and incorrigible offenders shall be found to have committed the said great offences (m)." The patent of high constable, granted to earl Rivers by Edward IV. proves the nature of the office. The powers are unlimited, perpetual, and remain in force during peace as well as during war and rebellion. The parliament in Edward VIth's reign acknowledged the jurisdiction of the constable and martial's court to be part of the law of the land (n).

The Star-chamber and High Commission, and Court-martial,

(c) By the ancient constitution, is here meant that which prevailed before the settlement of our present plan of liberty. There was a more ancient constitution, where, though the people had perhaps less liberty than under the Tudors, yet the king had also less authority: the power of the barons was a great check upon him, and exercised with great tyranny over them. But there was still a more ancient constitution, viz. that before the signing of the charters, when neither the people nor the barons had any regular privileges; and the power of the government, during the reign of an able prince, was almost wholly in the king.—The English constitution, like all others, has been in a state of continual fluctuation.

(d) In a memorial of the state of the realm, drawn by secretary Cecil, in 1569, there is this passage: "Then followeth the decay of obedience in civil polity, which being compared with the fearfulness and reverence of all inferior estates to their superiors in times past, will astonish any wise and considerate person, to behold the desperation of reformation." Haynes, p. 586. 588.

martial, though arbitrary jurisdictions, had still some pretence of a trial, at least of a sentence; but there was a grievous punishment very generally inflicted in that age, without any other authority than the warrant of a secretary of state, or of the privy-council (o); and that was, imprisonment in any jail, and during any time that the ministers should think proper. In suspicious times, all the jails were full of prisoners of state; and these unhappy victims of public jealousy were sometimes thrown into dungeons, and loaded with irons, and treated in the most cruel manner, without their being able to obtain any remedy from law.

This practice was an indirect way of employing torture; but the rack itself, though not admitted in the ordinary execution of justice (p), was frequently used, upon any suspicion, by authority of a warrant, from a secretary of state or the privy-council. Even the council in the marches of Wales was empowered, by their very commission, to make use of torture whenever they thought proper (q). There cannot be a stronger proof how lightly the rack was employed, than the following story told by lord Bacon. We shall give it in his own words: "The queen was mightily incensed against Haywarde, on account of a book he dedicated to lord Essex, being a story of the first year of Henry IV. thinking it a seditious prelude to put into the people's heads boldness and faction (r): she said, she had an opinion that there was treason in it, and asked me, If I could not find any places in it, that might be drawn within the case of treason? Whereto I answered, For treason, sure I found none; but for felony very many: and when her majesty hastily asked me, Wherein? I told her, the author had committed very apparent theft: for he had taken most of the sentences of Cornelius Tacitus, and translated them into English, and put them into his text. And another time when the queen could not be persuaded that it was his writing whose name was to it, but that it had some more mischievous author, and said, with great indignation, that she would have him racked to produce his author; I replied, Nay, madam, he is a doctor, never rack his person, but rack his style: let him have pen, ink, and paper, and help of books, and be enjoined to continue the story where it breaketh off, and I will undertake, by collating the styles, to judge whether he were the author or no (s)." Thus, had it not been for Bacon's humanity, or rather his wit, this author, a man of letters, had been put to the rack for a most innocent performance. His real offence was, his dedicating a book to that munificent patron of the learned, the earl of Essex, at a time when this nobleman lay under her majesty's displeasure.

The queen's menace, of trying and punishing Haywarde for treason, could easily have been executed, let his book have been ever so innocent. While so many terrors hung over the people, no jury would have dared to have acquitted a man, when the court was resolved to have him condemned. The practice also of not confronting witnesses with the prisoner, gave the crown lawyers all imaginable advantage against him. And, indeed, there scarcely occurs an instance during all these reigns, that the sovereign or the ministers were ever disappointed in the issue of a prosecution. Timid juries, and judges who held their offices during pleasure, never failed to second all the views of the crown, however arbitrary or unjust. And as the practice was anciently common, of fining, imprisoning, or otherwise punishing the jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding a verdict contrary to the direction of these dependent judges; it is obvious, that juries were then no manner of security to the liberty of the subject, but were only the servants of the court.

The power of pressing, both for sea and land service, and obliging any person to accept of any office, however mean or unfit for him, was another prerogative totally incompatible with freedom. Osborne gives the following account of Elizabeth's method of employing this prerogative. "In case she found any likely to interrupt her occasions," says he, "she did seasonably prevent him by a chargeable employment abroad, or putting him upon some service at home, which she knew least grateful to the people: contrary to a false maxim, since practised with far worse success, by such princes as thought it better husbandry to buy off enemies than reward friends (t)." Osborne reproaches the two immediate successors of Elizabeth with this practice; but it proceeded partly from the difficulty of their situation. The power of pressing, as may naturally be imagined, was often abused, in other respects, by men of inferior rank; and officers often exacted money for freeing persons from the service (u).

The government of England, during the age of Elizabeth, however different in other particulars, bore, in this respect, some resemblance of that of Turkey at present: the sovereign possessed every power except that of imposing taxes: and in both countries this limitation, unsupported by other privileges, was prejudicial to the people. In Turkey, it obliges the sultan to permit the extortion of the bashas and governors of provinces, from whom he afterwards takes presents or forfeitures: in England, it engaged the queen to erect monopolies, and grant patents for exclusive trade: an invention so pernicious, that, had she gone on during a track of years at her own rate, England, the seat of riches, and arts, and commerce, would have contained at present as little industry as Morocco, or the coast of Barbary.

We may farther observe, that this valuable privilege, valuable only because it proved afterwards the means by which the parliament extorted all their other privileges, was very much encroached on in an indirect manner during the reign of Elizabeth, as well as of her predecessors. She often exacted loans from her people; an arbitrary and unequal kind of imposition, which individuals felt severely: for though the money had been regularly repaid, which was seldom the case (v), it lay in the prince's hands without interest, which was a sensible loss to the persons from whom the money was borrowed (w).

There remains a proposal made by lord Burleigh for levying a general loan on the people, equivalent to a subsidy (x); a scheme which would have laid the burthen more equally, but which was, in different words, a taxation imposed without consent of parliament. It is remarkable, that the scheme thus proposed without any visible necessity by that wise minister, is the very same which Henry VIII. executed, and which Charles I., enraged by ill usage from his parliament, and reduced to the greatest difficulties, put afterwards in practice, to the great discontent of the nation.

The demand of benevolence was another invention of that age for taxing the people. This practice was so little conceived to be irregular, that the commons in 1585 offered the queen a benevolence; which she very generously refused, as having no occasion at that time for money (y). Queen Mary also, by an order of council, increased the customs in some branches; and her sister Elizabeth imitated the example (z). There was a species of ship money imposed at the time of the Spanish invasion: the several ports were required to equip a certain number of vessels at their own charge; and such was the alacrity of the people for the public defence, that some of the ports, particularly London, sent double the number demanded of them (a). When any levies were made for Ireland, France, or the Low Countries, the queen obliged the counties to levy the soldiers, to arm and clothe them, and carry them to the sea-ports at their own charge. New-year's gifts were at that time expected from the nobility, and from the more considerable gentry (b); and they generally amounted to a considerable sum.

Purveyance and pre-emption were also methods of taxation, unequal, arbitrary, and oppressive. The whole kingdom sensibly felt the burthen of those impositions; and it was regarded as a great privilege conferred on Oxford and Cambridge, to prohibit the purveyors from taking any commodities within five miles of these universities. The queen victualled her navy by means of this prerogative, during the first years of her reign (c).

Wardship was the most regular and legal of all these impositions by prerogative: yet was it a great badge of (o) In 1588, the lord mayor committed several citizens to prison, because they refused to pay the loan demanded of them. Murden, p. 632.

For he has there preserved the famous speech of the bishop of Carlisle, which contains, in the most express terms, the doctrine of passive obedience. But queen Elizabeth was very difficult to please on this head.

slavery, and oppressive to all the considerable families. When an estate devolved to a female, the sovereign obliged her to marry any one he pleased: whether the heir were male or female, the crown seized and enjoyed the whole profit of the estate during the minority. The giving of a rich wardship was a very common method of rewarding a courtier or favourite.

The inventions were endless which arbitrary power might employ for the extorting of money, while the people imagined that their property was secured by the crown's being debarred from imposing taxes. Strype has preserved a speech of lord Burleigh to the queen and council, in which are contained some particulars not a little extraordinary (d). Burleigh proposed that she should erect a court for the correction of all abuses, and should confer on the commissioners a general inquisitorial power over the whole kingdom. He set before her the example of her wise grandfather, Henry VII. who, by such methods, extremely augmented his revenue; and he recommended that this new court should proceed, "as well by the direction and ordinary course of the laws, as by virtue of her majesty's supreme regiment and absolute power, from whence law proceeded." In a word, he expected from this institution greater accession to the royal treasure than Henry VIII. derived from the abolition of the abbies, and all the forfeitures of ecclesiastical revenues. This project of lord Burleigh does not appear to need any comment. A form of government must be very arbitrary indeed, where a wise and good minister could make such a proposal to the sovereign.

Embargoes on merchandise was another engine of arbitrary power, by which the English princes were enabled to extort money from the people. Instances are to be found in the reign of Mary. Elizabeth, before her coronation, issued an order to the custom-house, prohibiting the sale of all crimson silks which should be imported, till the court were first supplied (e). She expected, no doubt, that the merchants would let her have a good penny-worth while they lay under this restraint.

The parliament pretended to the right of enacting laws, as well as of granting subsidies; but this privilege was, during that age, still more insignificant than the other. Queen Elizabeth expressly prohibited them from meddling either with state matters or ecclesiastical causes; and she openly sent the members to prison who dared to transgress her imperial edicts in these particulars. There passed few sessions of parliament during her reign where there occur not instances of this arbitrary conduct; several of which have been noticed in our account of that princess's reign.

But the legislative power of the parliament was a mere fallacy; while the sovereign was universally acknowledged to possess a dispensing power, by which all the laws could be invalidated, and rendered of no effect. The exercise of this power was also an indirect method practised for erecting monopolies. Where the statutes laid any branch of manufacture under restrictions, the sovereign, by exempting one person from the laws, gave him in effect the monopoly of that commodity (f). Indeed there was no grievance at that time more universally complained of than the frequent dispensing with the penal laws (g).

The crown, however, possessed in reality the full legislative power by means of proclamations, which might affect any matter even of the greatest importance, and which the Star-chamber took care to see more rigorously executed than the laws themselves. The motives for these proclamations were sometimes frivolous and even ridiculous. Queen Elizabeth had taken offence at the smell of woad; and she issued an edict prohibiting any one from cultivating that useful plant (h). She was also pleased to take offence at the long swords and high ruffs then in fashion: she sent about her officers to break every man's sword, and clip every man's ruff, which was beyond a certain dimension (i). This practice resembles the method employed by the Czar Peter the Great, to make his subjects change their garb.

The queen's prohibition of the prophesyings, or the assemblies instituted for what was called fanatical prayers and conferences, was founded on a different principle; but shews still the unlimited extent of her prerogative. Any number of persons could not meet together in order to read the Scriptures, and confer about religion, though in ever so orthodox a manner, without her permission.

There were many other branches of prerogative incompatible with an exact or regular enjoyment of liberty. None of the nobility could marry without permission from the sovereign. The queen detained the earl of Southampton long in prison, because he privately married the earl of Essex's cousin (k). No man could travel without the consent of the prince. Sir William Evers underwent a severe persecution because he had presumed to pay a private visit to the king of Scots (l). The sovereign even assumed a supreme and uncontrolled authority over all foreign trade; and neither allowed any person to enter or depart the kingdom, nor any commodity to be imported or exported without his consent (m).

The parliament, in the thirteenth of the queen, praised her for not imitating the practice usual among her predecessors, of stopping the course of justice by particular warrants (n). There could not possibly be a greater abuse, nor a stronger mark of arbitrary power; and the queen in refraining from it was very laudable. But she was by no means constant in this reserve. There remain in the public records some warrants of her's for exempting particular persons from all lawsuits and prosecutions (o); and these warrants, she says, she grants from her royal prerogative, which she will not allow to be disputed.

It was usual in queen Elizabeth's reign, and probably in all the preceding reigns, for noblemen or privy-counsellors to commit to prison any one who had happened to displease them, by suing for his just debts; and the unhappy person, though he gained his cause in the courts of justice, was commonly obliged to relinquish his property in order to obtain his liberty. Some, likewise, who had been delivered from prison by the judges, were again committed to custody in secret places, without any possibility of obtaining relief; and even the officers and serjeants of the courts of law were punished for executing the writs in favour of these persons. Nay, it was usual to send for people by pursuivants, a kind of harpies, who then attended the orders of the council and high commission; and they were brought up to London, and constrained by imprisonment, not only to withdraw their lawful suits, but also to pay the pursuivants great sums of money. The judges, in the 34th of the queen, complained to her majesty of the frequency of this practice. It is probable that so egregious a tyranny was carried no farther down than the reign of Elizabeth; since the parliament, who presented the petition of right, found no later instances of it (p). And even these very judges of Elizabeth who thus protect the people against the tyranny of the great, expressly allow, that a person committed by special command of the queen is not bailable.

It is easy to imagine that in such a government, no justice could by course of law be obtained of the sovereign, unless he were willing to allow it. In the naval expedition undertaken by Raleigh and Frobisher against the Spaniards in the year 1592, a very rich carrack was taken, worth two hundred thousand pounds. The queen's share in the adventure was only a tenth; but as the prize was so great, and exceeded so much the expectation of all the adventurers, she was determined not to rest contented with her share. Raleigh humbly and earnestly begged her to accept of a hundred thousand pounds in lieu of all demands, or rather extortions; and says, that the present which the proprietors were willing to make her, of eighty thousand pounds, was the greatest that ever prince received from a subject (q).

But it is no wonder the queen in her administration should pay so little regard to liberty; while the parliament itself in enacting laws was entirely negligent of it. The persecuting statutes which they passed against Papists and Puritans are extremely contrary to the genius of freedom; and by exposing such multitudes to the tyranny of priests and bigots, accustomed the people to the most disgraceful subjection. Their conferring an unlimited supremacy on the queen, or, what is worse, acknowledging her inherent right to it, was another proof of their voluntary servitude and submissive disposition.

The law of the 23d of her reign, making seditious words against the queen capital, is also a very arbitrary statute; and a use no less tyrannical was sometimes made of it. The case of Udal, a puritanical clergyman of great abilities, seems singular even in those arbitrary times. This gentleman had published a book called a "Demonstration of Discipline," in which he inveighed against the government of bishops; and though he had carefully endeavoured to conceal his name, he was thrown into prison upon suspicion, and brought to a trial for this offence. It was pretended, that the bishops were part of the queen's political body; and to speak against them was really to attack her majesty, and was therefore felony by the statute. This was not the only iniquity to which Udal was exposed. The judges would not allow the jury to determine any thing but the fact, whether Udal had written the book or not, without examining his intention or the import of the words. In order to prove the fact, the crown lawyers did not produce a single witness to the court: they only read the testimony of two persons absent, one of whom said, that Udal had told him he was the author; another, that a friend of Udal's had said so. They would not allow Udal to produce any exculpatory evidence; which they said was never to be permitted against the crown (r). And they tendered him an oath, by which he was required to depose, that he was not the author of the book; and his refusal to make that deposition was employed as the strongest proof of his guilt. It is almost needless to add, that notwithstanding these multiplied iniquities, a verdict of death was given by the jury against Udal: for, as the queen was extremely bent upon his prosecution, it was impossible he could escape (s). He died in prison before the execution of the sentence.

The case of Penry was, if possible, still harder. This man was a zealous Puritan, or rather a Brownist, a small sect which afterwards increased, and received the name of Independents. He had written against the hierarchy several tracts, such as "Martin Marprelate," "Theses Martinianæ," and other compositions, full of low scurrility and petulant satire. After concealing himself for some years, he was seized; and, as the statute against seditious words required that the criminal should be tried within a year after committing the offence, he could not be indicted for his printed books. He was therefore tried for some papers found in his pocket, as if he had thereby scattered sedition (t). It was also imputed to him, by the lord keeper, Puckering, that in some of these papers "he had not only acknowledged her majesty's royal power to establish laws, ecclesiastical and civil; but had avoided the usual terms of making, enacting, decreeing, and ordaining laws: which imply," says the lord keeper, "a most absolute authority (u)." Penry, for these offences, was condemned and executed.

Thus we have seen, that the most absolute authority of the sovereign, to make use of the lord keeper's expression, was established on above twenty branches of prerogative; which are now abolished, and which were, every one of them, totally incompatible with the liberty of the subject. But what ensured more effectually the slavery of the people, than even these branches of prerogative, was the established principles of the times, which attributed to the prince such an unlimited and indefeazable power as was supposed to be the origin of all law, and could be circumscribed by none. The homilies published for the use of the clergy, and which they were enjoined to read every Sunday in all the churches, inculcate every where a blind and unlimited passive obedience to the prince, which, on no account, and under no pretence, it is ever lawful for subjects in the smallest article to depart from or infringe. Much noise has been made because some court chaplains during the succeeding reigns were permitted to preach such doctrines; but there is a great difference between these sermons and discourses published by authority, avowed by the prince and council, and promulgated to the whole nation (v). So thoroughly were these principles imbibed by the people, during the reigns of Elizabeth and her predecessors, that opposition to them was regarded as the most flagrant sedition, and was not even rewarded by that public praise and approbation which can alone support men under such dangers and difficulties as attend the resistance of tyrannical authority (w). It was only during the next generation that the noble principles of liberty took root, and spreading themselves under the shelter of puritanical doctrines, became fashionable among the people.

It is worth remarking, that the advantage usually ascribed to absolute monarchy, a greater regularity of police, and a more strict execution of the laws, did not attend the former English government, though in many respects it fell under that denomination. A demonstration of this truth is contained in a judicious paper which is preserved by Strype (x), and which was written by an eminent justice of peace of Somersetshire, in the year 1596, near the end of the queen's reign; when the authority of that princess may be supposed to be fully corroborated by time, and her maxims of government improved by long practice. This paper contains an account of the disorders which then prevailed in the county of Somerset. The author says, that forty persons had there been executed in a year for robberies, thefts, and other felonies; thirty-five burnt in the hand, thirty-seven whipped; one hundred and eighty-three discharged: that those who were discharged were the most wicked and desperate persons, who never could come to any good, because they would not work, and none would take them into service: that, notwithstanding this great number of indictments, the fifth part of the felonies committed in the county were not brought to a trial; the greater number escaped censure, either from the superior cunning of the felons, the remissness of the magistrates, or the foolish lenity of the people: that the rapines committed by the infinite number of wicked, wandering, idle people, were intolerable to the poor countrymen, and obliged them to keep a perpetual watch over the sheep-folds, their pastures, their woods, and their corn-fields: that the other counties of England were in no better condition than Somersetshire; and many of them were even in a worse: that there were at least three or four hundred able-bodied vagabonds in every county, who lived by theft and rapine; and who sometimes met in troops to the number of sixty, and committed spoil on the inhabitants: that if all the felons of this kind were assembled, they would be able, if reduced to good subjection, to give the greatest enemy her majesty has a strong battle: and that the magistrates themselves were intimidated from executing the laws upon them; and there were instances of justices of peace who, after giving sentence against rogues, had interposed to stop the execution of their own sentence, on account of the danger which hung over them from the confederates of these felons.

In the year 1575, the queen complained in parliament of the bad execution of the laws; and threatened, that if the magistrates were not for the future more vigilant, she would entrust authority to indigent and needy persons, who would find an interest in a more exact administration of justice (y). It appears that she was as good as her word; for in the year 1601, there were great complaints made in parliament of the rapine of justices of peace; and a member said, that this magistrate was an animal who for half a dozen of chickens would dispense with a dozen of penal statutes (z.) But bad as these times confessedly were, it would seem from a comparison with the reign of Henry the Eighth, that they were visibly improved; unless indeed we suppose, that during the latter period, fewer criminals were suffered to escape, than during the reign of Elizabeth. In Henry's reign, about two thousand malefactors were executed yearly; whereas the number of executions in the reign of Elizabeth was reduced to less than four hundred. It is not easy to account for this relaxation of government and neglect of police during a reign of so much vigour as that of Elizabeth. The small revenue of the crown is the most likely cause that can be assigned. The queen had it not in her power to interest a great number in assisting her to execute the laws.

In the elaborate panegyric of England, contained in the tragedy of Richard II. and the detail of its advantages, not a word of its civil constitution, as anywise different from, or superior to, that of other European kingdoms: an omission which cannot be supposed in any English author that wrote since the Restoration, at least since the Revolution.

On

On the whole, the English have no reason, from the example of their ancestors, to be in love with the picture of absolute monarchy; or to prefer the unlimited authority of the prince and his unbounded prerogatives to that noble liberty, that sweet equality, and that happy security by which they are at present distinguished above all nations in the universe. The utmost that can be said in favour of the government of that age (and perhaps it may be said with truth) is, that the power of the prince, though really unlimited, was exercised after the European manner, and entered not into every part of the administration; that the instances of a high exerted prerogative were not so frequent as to render property sensibly insecure, or reduce the people to a total servitude; that the freedom from faction, and quickness of execution, and the promptitude of those measures, which could be taken for offence or defence, made some compensation for the want of a legal and determinate liberty; that as the prince commanded no mercenary army, there was a tacit check on him, which maintained the government in that medium to which the people had been accustomed; and that this situation of England, though seemingly it approached nearer, was in reality more remote from a despotic and eastern monarchy than the present government of that kingdom, where the people, though guarded by multiplied laws, are totally naked, defenceless, and disarmed; and besides, are not secured by any middle power, or independent powerful nobility, interposed between them and the monarch.

Revenues.

The ordinary revenue of the crown, during the period we have been delineating, has never been ascertained with precision. Queen Elizabeth's œconomy was remarkable; and in some instances seemed to border on avarice. The smallest expence, if it could possibly be spared, appeared considerable in her eyes; and even the charge of an express during the most delicate transactions was not below her notice (a). She was also attentive to every profit, and embraced opportunities of gain which may appear somewhat extraordinary. She kept, for instance, the see of Ely vacant nineteen years, in order to retain the revenue (b); and it was usual with her, when she promoted a bishop, to take the opportunity of pillaging the see of some of its manors (c). But that in reality there was little or no avarice in the queen's temper, appears from this circumstance, that she never amassed any treasure; and even refused subsidies from the parliament when she had no present occasion for them. Yet we must not conclude, from this circumstance, that her œconomy proceeded from a tender concern for her people: she loaded them with monopolies and exclusive patents, which are much more oppressive than the most heavy taxes levied in an equal and regular manner. The real source of her frugal conduct was derived from her desire of independency, and her care to preserve her dignity, which would have been endangered had she reduced herself to the necessity of having frequent recourse to parliamentary supplies. In consequence of this motive, the queen, though engaged in successful and perhaps necessary wars, thought it more prudent to make a continual dilapidation of the royal demesnes (d), than demand the most moderate supplies from the commons. As she lived unmarried, and had no posterity, she was content to serve her present turn, though at the expence of her successors; who, by reason of this policy, joined to other circumstances, found themselves on a sudden reduced to the most extreme indigence.

The splendor of a court was, during this age, a great part of the public charge; and as Elizabeth was a single woman, and expensive in no kind of magnificence, except clothes, this circumstance enabled her to perform great things by her narrow revenue. She is said to have paid four millions of debt, left on the crown by her father, brother and sister; an incredible sum for that age (e). The States, at the time of her death, owed her about eight hundred thousand pounds: and the king of France four hundred and fifty thousand (f). Though that prince was extremely frugal, and after the peace of Vervins was continually amassing treasure, the queen never could, by the most pressing importunities, prevail on him to make payment of those sums which she had so generously advanced him during his greatest distresses. One payment of twenty thousand crowns, and another of fifty thousand, were all she could obtain by the strongest representations she could make of the difficulties to which the rebellion in Ireland had reduced her (g). The queen expended on the wars with Spain, between the years 1589 and 1593, the sum of one million three hundred thousand pounds, besides the pittance of a double subsidy, amounting to two hundred and eighty thousand pounds, granted her by parliament (h). In the year 1599 she spent six hundred thousand pounds in six months on the service of Ireland (i). Sir Robert Cecil affirmed, that in ten years Ireland cost her three millions four hundred thousand pounds (k). She gave the earl of Essex a present of thirty thousand pounds upon his departure for the government of that kingdom (l). Lord Burleigh computed, that the value of the gifts conferred on that favourite, amounted to three hundred thousand pounds; a sum which, though probably exaggerated, is a proof of her strong affection towards him! It was a common saying during this reign; The queen pays bountifully, though she rewards sparingly (m).

It is difficult to compute exactly the queen's ordinary revenue, but it certainly fell much sort of five hundred thousand pounds a year (n). In the year 1590 she raised the customs from fourteen thousand pounds a-year to fifty thousand, and obliged sir Thomas Smith, who had farmed them, to refund some of his former profit (o). This improvement of the revenue was owing to the suggestions of one Caermarthen; and was opposed by Burleigh, Leicester, and Walsingham: but the queen's perseverance overcame all their opposition. The great undertakings which she executed with so narrow a revenue, and with such small supplies from her people, prove the mighty effects of wisdom and œconomy. She received from the parliament, during the course of her whole reign, only twenty subsidies and thirty-nine fifteenths. We cannot pretend to determine exactly the amount of these supplies; because the value of a subsidy was continually falling; and in the end of her reign it amounted only to eighty thousand pounds (p). If we suppose that the supplies granted to Elizabeth during a reign of forty-five years amounted to three millions, we shall not probably be much wide of the truth (q). This sum makes only sixty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six pounds a-year; and it is surprising, that while the queen's demands were so moderate, and her expences so well regulated, she should ever have found any difficulty in obtaining a supply from parliament, or be reduced to make sale of the crown-lands. But such was the extreme parsimony of the parliaments during that period. They valued nothing in comparison of their money. The members had no connexion with the court; and the very idea which they conceived of the trust committed to them was, to reduce the demands of the crown, and to grant as few supplies as possible. The crown, on the other hand, conceived the parliament in no other light than as a means of supply. Queen Elizabeth made a merit to her people of seldom summoning parliaments (r). No redress of grievances was expected from these assemblies: they were supposed to meet for no other purpose than to impose taxes.

Yours, as you demean yourself,* Elizabeth." This last sum appears a great deal more likely; for the whole revenue of queen Elizabeth would not in ten years have paid four millions.

Before the reign of Elizabeth, the English princes had usually recourse to the city of Antwerp for voluntary loans; and their credit was so low, that besides paying the high interest of ten or twelve per cent. they were obliged to make the city of London join in the security. Sir Thomas Gresham, that great and enterprizing merchant, one of the chief ornaments of this reign, engaged the company of merchant-adventurers to grant a loan to the queen; and as the money was regularly repaid, her credit by degrees established itself in the city, and she shook off this dependence on foreigners (s).

In the year 1559, however, the queen employed Gresham to borrow for her two hundred thousand pounds at Antwerp, in order to enable her to reform the coin, which was at that time extremely debased (t). She was so impolitic as to make, herself, an innovation in the coin; by dividing a pound of silver into sixty-two shillings, instead of sixty, the former standard. This is the last time that the coin has been tampered with in England.

On the Commerce.

Queen Elizabeth, sensible how much the defence of her kingdom depended on its naval power, was desirous to encourage commerce and navigation; but as her monopolies tended to extinguish all domestic industry, which is much more valuable than foreign trade, and is the foundation of it, the general train of her conduct was ill calculated to serve the purpose at which she aimed, much less to promote the riches of her people. The exclusive companies also were an immediate check on foreign trade. Yet, notwithstanding these discouragements, the spirit of the age was strongly bent on naval enterprizes; and besides the military expeditions against the Spaniards, many attempts were made for new discoveries, and many new branches of foreign commerce were opened by the English. Sir Martin Frobisher undertook three fruitless voyages to discover the north-west passage: Davis, not discouraged by this ill success, made a new attempt, when he discovered the straits which pass by his name. In the year 1600, the queen granted the first patent to the East-India company: the stock of that company was seventy-two thousand pounds; and they fitted out four ships under the command of James Lancaster, for this new branch of trade. The adventure was successful; and the ships returning with a rich cargo, encouraged the company to continue the commerce.

The communication with Muscovy had been opened in queen Mary's time by the discovery of the passage to Archangel: but the commerce to that country did not begin to be carried on to a great extent till about the year 1569. The queen obtained from the czar (u) an exclusive patent to the English for the whole trade of Muscovy (v); and she entered into a personal as well as national alliance with him.

The English, encouraged by the privileges which they had obtained from the czar of Muscovy, ventured farther into those countries than any Europeans had formerly done. They transported their goods along the river Dwina in boats made of one entire tree, which they towed and rowed up the stream as far as Wologda. Thence they carried their commodities seven days journey by land to Yeraslau, and then down the Volga to Astracan. At Astracan they built ships, crossed the Caspian Sea, and distributed their manufactures into Persia. But this bold attempt met with such discouragements, that it was never renewed (w).

After the death of John Basilides, his son Theodore revoked the patent which the English enjoyed for a monopoly of the Russian trade: when the queen remonstrated against this innovation, he told her ministers, that princes must carry an indifferent hand, as well between their subjects as between foreigners; and not convert trade, which by the laws of nations ought to be common to all, into a monopoly for the private gain of a few (x). So much juster notions of commerce were entertained by this barbarian than appear in the conduct of the renowned queen Elizabeth! Theodore, however, continued some privileges to the English, on account of their being the discoverers of the communication between Europe and his country.

The trade to Turkey commenced about the year 1583; and that commerce was immediately confined to a company by queen Elizabeth. Before that time, the grand signior had always conceived England to be a dependent province of France (y); but having heard of the queen's power and reputation, he gave a good reception to the English, and even granted them larger privileges than he had given to the French.

The merchants of the Hanse-towns complained, in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, of the treatment which they had received in the reigns of Edward and Mary. She prudently replied, that as she would not innovate any thing, she would still protect them in the immunities and privileges of which she found them possessed. This answer not contenting them, their commerce was soon after suspended for a time, to the great advantage of the English merchants, who tried what they could themselves effect for promoting their commerce. They took the whole trade into their own hands; and their returns proving successful, they divided themselves into staplers and merchant adventurers; the former residing constantly at one place, the latter trying their fortunes in other towns and states abroad with cloth and other manufactures. This success so enraged the Hanse-towns, that they tried all the methods which a discontented people could devise, to draw upon the English merchants the ill opinion of other nations and states. They prevailed so far as to obtain an imperial edict, by which the English were prohibited all commerce in the empire: the queen, by way of retaliation, retained sixty of their ships, which had been seized in the river Tagus with contraband goods of the Spaniards. These ships the queen intended to have restored, as desiring to have compromised all differences with those trading cities; but when she was informed that a general assembly was held at Lubec, in order to concert measures for distressing the English trade, she caused the ships and cargoes to be confiscated: only two of them were released to carry home the news, and to inform these states that she had the greatest contempt imaginable for all their proceedings (z).

Naval Force of England.

Henry VIII. in order to fit out a navy, was obliged to hire ships from Hamburgh, Lubec, Dantzic, Genoa, and Venice: but Elizabeth, very early in her reign, put affairs upon a better footing; both by building some ships of her own, and by encouraging the merchants to build large trading vessels, which on occasion were converted into ships of war (a). In the year 1582, the seamen in England were found to be fourteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five men (b); the number of vessels twelve hundred and thirty-two; of which there were only two hundred and seventeen above eighty tons. Monson pretends, that though navigation decayed in the first years of James I. by the practice of the merchants, who carried on their trade in foreign bottoms (c), yet before the year 1640, this number of seamen was tripled in England (d).

The navy which the queen left at her decease appears considerable, when we reflect only on the number of vessels, which were forty-two: but when we consider that none of these ships carried above forty guns; that four only came up to that number; that there were but two ships of a thousand tons; and twenty-three below five hundred, some of fifty, and some even of twenty tons; and that the whole number of guns belonging to the fleet was seven hundred and seventy-four (e); we must entertain a contemptible idea of the English navy, compared to the force which it has now attained. In the year 1588, there were not above five vessels fitted out by the noblemen and sea-ports which exceeded two hundred tons (f).

Military Force of England.

In the year 1599, an alarm was given of an invasion by the Spaniards; and the queen equipped a fleet and levied an army in a fortnight to oppose them. Nothing gave foreigners a higher idea of the power of England than this sudden armament. In the year 1575, all the militia in the kingdom were computed at a hundred and eighty-two thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine (g). A distribution was made in the year 1595 of a hundred and forty thousand men, besides those which Wales could supply (h). These armies were formidable by their numbers; but their discipline and experience were not proportionate. Small bodies from Dunkirk and Nieuport frequently ran over and plundered the east coast: so unfit was the militia, as it was then constituted, for the defence of the kingdom. The lord lieutenants were first appointed to the counties in this reign.

Mr. Murden (i) has published from the Salisbury Collections a paper which contains the military force of the nation at the time of the Spanish Armada, and which is somewhat different from the account given by our ordinary historians. It makes all the able-bodied men of the kingdom amount to a hundred and eleven thousand five hundred and thirteen; those armed, to eighty thousand eight hundred and seventy-five; of whom forty-four thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven were trained. It must be supposed that these able-bodied men consisted of such only as were registered, otherwise the small number is not to be accounted for. Yet sir Edward Coke (k) said in the house of commons, that he was employed about the same time, together with Popham, chief justice, to take a survey of all the people of England, and that they found them to be nine hundred thousand of all sorts. This number, by the ordinary rules of computation, supposes that there were above two hundred thousand men able to bear arms. Yet even this number is surprisingly small. Can we suppose that the kingdom is six or seven times more populous at present? And that Murden's was the real number of men, excluding Catholics and children and infirm persons?

Harrison says, that in the musters taken in the years 1574 and 1575, the men fit for service amounted to one million one hundred and seventy-two thousand six hundred and seventy-four; yet was it believed that a full third was omitted. Such uncertainty and contradiction are there in all these accounts. Notwithstanding the greatness of this number, the same author complains much of the decay of populousness: a vulgar complaint in all places and all ages. Guicciardini makes the inhabitants of England in this reign amount to two millions.

Whatever opinion we may form of the comparative populousness of England in different periods, it must be allowed that, abstracting from the national debt, there is a prodigious increase of power in that, more perhaps than in any other European state since the beginning of the last century. It would be no paradox to affirm, that Ireland alone could at present exert a greater force than all the three kingdoms were capable of at the death of queen Elizabeth. And we might go farther, and assert, that one good county in England is able to make, at least to support, a greater effort that the whole kingdom was capable of in the reign of Harry V.; when the maintenance of a garrison in a small town like Calais formed more than a third of the ordinary national expence. Such are the effects of liberty, industry, and good government!

State of the English Manufactures.

The state of the English manufactures was in the time of Elizabeth very low; and foreign wares of almost all kinds had the preference (l). About the year 1590, there were in London four persons only rated in the subsidy-books so high as four hundred pounds (m). This computation is not indeed to be deemed an exact estimate of their wealth. In 1567 there were found to be four thousand eight hundred and fifty-one strangers of all nations in London: of whom three thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight were Flemings, and only fifty-eight Scots (n). The persecutions in France and the Low Countries drove afterwards a great number of foreigners into England; and the commerce as well as manufactures of that kingdom was very much improved by them (o). At this period sir Thomas Gresham built, at his own charge, the magnificent fabric of the Exchange for the reception of the merchants: the queen visited it, and gave it the appellation of the Royal Exchange.

By a lucky accident in language, which has a great effect on men's ideas, the invidious word usury, which formerly meant the taking of any interest for money, came now to express only the taking of exorbitant and illegal interest. An act passed in 1571 violently condemns all usury; but permits ten per cent. interest to be paid. Henry IV. of France reduced interest to six and a half per cent.: an indication of the great advance of France above England in commerce.

Dr. Howel says (p), that queen Elizabeth in the third of her reign was presented with a pair of black silk knit stockings by her silkwoman, and never wore cloth hose any more. The author of The present State of England says, that about 1577, pocket watches were first brought into England from Germany. They are thought to have been invented at Nuremberg. About 1580, the use of coaches was introduced by the earl of Arundel (q). Before that time, the queen, on public occasions, rode behind her chamberlain.

Camden says, that in 1581 Randolph, so much employed by the queen in foreign embassies, possessed the office of post-master-general of England. It appears, therefore, that posts were then established; though, from Charles I's regulations in 1635, it would seem that few post-houses were erected before that time.

In a remonstrance of the Hanse Towns to the diet of the empire in 1582, it is affirmed that England exported annually about two hundred thousand pieces of cloth (r). This number seems to be much exaggerated.

In the fifth of this reign was enacted the first law for the relief of the poor.

A judicious author of that age confirms the vulgar observation, that the kingdom was depopulating from the increase of inclosures and decay of tillage; and he ascribes the reason very justly to the restraints put upon the exportation of corn; while full liberty was allowed to export all the produce of pasturage, such as wool, hides, leather, tallow, &c. These prohibitions of exportation were derived from the prerogative, and were very injudicious. The queen, once, on the commencement of her reign, had tried a contrary practice, and with good success. From the same author we learn, that the complaints renewed in our time, were then very common, concerning the high prices of every thing (s). There seems indeed, to have been two periods in which prices rose remarkably in England, namely, that in queen Elizabeth's reign, when they are computed to have doubled, and that in the present age. Between the two, there seems to have been a stagnation. It would appear that industry, during that intermediate period, increased as fast as gold and silver, and kept commodities nearly at a par with money.

There were two attempts made in this reign to settle colonies in America; one by sir Humphrey Gilbert in Newfoundland, another by sir Walter Raleigh in Virginia: but neither of these projects proved successful. All those noble settlements were made in the following reigns. The current specie of the kingdom in the end of this reign is computed at four millions (t).

The earl of Leicester desired sir Francis Walsingham, then ambassador in France, to provide him with a riding master in that country, to whom he promises a hundred pounds a-year, besides maintaining himself and servant and a couple of horses. "I know," adds the earl, "that such a man as I want may receive higher wages in France: but let him consider, that a shilling in England goes as far as two shillings in France (u)." It is known that every thing is much changed since that time.

Manners and Hospitality.

The nobility in this age still supported, in some degree, the ancient magnificence in their hospitality, and in the numbers of their retainers; and the queen found it prudent to retrench, by proclamation, their expences in this last particular (v). The expence of hospitality she somewhat encouraged by the frequent visits she paid her nobility, and the sumptuous feasts which she received from them (w). The earl of Leicester gave her an entertainment in Kenilworth castle, which was extraordinary for expence and magnificence. Among other particulars we are told, that three hundred and sixty-five hogsheads of beer were drank at it (x). The earl had fortified this castle at great expence; and it contained arms for ten thousand men (y). The earl of Derby had a family consisting of two hundred and forty servants (z). Stowe remarks it as a singular proof of beneficence in this nobleman, that he was contented with his rent from his tenants, and exacted not any extraordinary services from them: a proof that the great power of the sovereign (what was almost unavoidable) had very generally countenanced the nobility in tyrannising over the people. Burleigh, though he was frugal, and had no paternal estate, kept a family consisting of a hundred servants (a). He had a standing table for gentlemen, and two other tables for persons of meaner condition, which were always served alike, whether he were in town or in the country. About his person he had people of great distinction, insomuch that he could reckon up twenty gentlemen retainers, who had each a thousand pounds a-year; and as many among his ordinary servants, who were worth from a thousand pounds to three, five, ten, and twenty thousand pounds (b). It is to be remarked, that though the revenues of the crown were at that time very small, the ministers and courtiers sometimes found means, by employing the boundless prerogative, to acquire greater fortunes than it is possible for them at present to amass, from their larger salaries, and more limited authority.

Burleigh entertained the queen twelve several times in his country house; where she remained three, four, or five weeks at a time. Each visit cost him two or three thousand pounds (c). The quantity of silver plate possessed by this nobleman is surprising: no less than fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds weight (d); which besides the fashion would be above forty-two thousand pounds sterling in value. Yet Burleigh left only four thousand pounds a-year in land, and eleven thousand pounds in money; and as land was then commonly sold at ten years purchase, his plate was nearly equal to all the rest of his fortune. It appears that little value was then put upon the fashion of the plate, which probably was but rude; the weight was chiefly considered (e).

But, though there were preserved great remains of the ancient customs, the nobility were by degrees acquiring a taste for elegant luxury; and many edifices in particular were built by them, neat, large, and sumptuous, to the great ornament of the kingdom, says Camden (f); but to the no less decay of the glorious hospitality of the nation. It is, however, more reasonable to think, that this new turn of expence promoted arts and industry; while the ancient hospitality was the source of vice, disorder, sedition, and idleness (g).

Among the other species of luxury, that of apparel began much to increase during this age; and the queen thought proper to restrain it by proclamation (h). Her example was very little conformable to her edicts. As no woman was ever more conceited of her beauty, or more desirous of making impression on the hearts of beholders, no one ever went to a greater extravagance in apparel, or studied more the variety and richness of her dresses. She appeared almost every day in a different habit; and tried all the several modes by which she hoped to render herself agreeable. She was also so fond of her clothes, that she never could part with any of them; and at her death she had in her wardrobe all the different habits, to the number of three thousand, which she had ever worn in her lifetime (i).

The retrenchment of the ancient hospitality, and the diminution of retainers, were favourable to the prerogative of the sovereign; and by disabling the great noblemen from resistance, promoted the execution of the laws, and extended the authority of the courts of justice. There were many peculiar causes in the situation and character of Henry VII. which augmented the authority of the crown: most of these causes concurred in succeeding princes; together with the factions in religion, and the acquisition of the supremacy, a most important article of prerogative: but the manners of the age were a general cause which operated during this whole period, and which continually tended to diminish the riches, and still more more the influence of the aristocracy, anciently so formidable to the crown. The habits of luxury dissipated the immense fortunes of the aucient barons; and as the new methods of expence gave subsistence to mechanics and merchants, who lived in an independent manner on the fruits of their own industry, a nobleman, instead of that unlimited ascendant which he was wont to assume over those who were maintained at his board, or subsisted by salaries conferred on them, retained only that moderate influence which customers have over tradesmen, and which can never be dangerous to civil government. The landed proprietors also, having a greater demand for money than for men, endeavoured to turn their lands to the best account with regard to profit; and either inclosing their fields, or joining many small farms into a few large ones, dismissed those useless hands which formerly were always at their call in every attempt to subvert the government, or oppose a neighbouring baron. By all these means the cities increased; the middle rank of men began to be rich and powerful; the prince, who in effect was the same with the law, was implicitly obeyed; and though the farther progress of the same causes begat a new plan of liberty, founded on the privileges of the commons, yet in the interval between the fall of the nobles and the rise of this order, the sovereign took advantage of the present situation, and assumed an authority almost absolute.

Whatever may be commonly imagined, from the authority of lord Bacon, and from that of Harrington, and later authors, the laws of Henry VII. contributed very little towards the great revolution which happened about this period in the English constitution. The practice of breaking entails by a fine and recovery had been introduced in the preceding reigns; and this prince only gave indirectly a legal sanction to the practice, by reforming some abuses which attended it. But the settled authority which he acquired to the crown, enabled the sovereign to encroach on the separate jurisdictions of the barons, and produced a more general and regular execution of the laws. The counties palatine underwent the same fate as (w) Harrison, after enumerating the queen's palaces, adds: "but what shall I need to take upon me to repeat all, and tell what houses the queen's majesty hath? Sith all is hers; and when it pleaseth her in the summer season to recreate herself abroad, and view the estate of the country, and hear the complaints of her poor commons injured by her unjust officers or their substitutes, every nobleman's house is her palace, where she continueth during pleasure, and till she return again to some of her own, in which she remaineth so long as she pleaseth." Book ii. chap. xv. Surely one may say of such a guest what Cicero says to Atticus on occasion of a visit paid him by Cæsar: Hospes tamen non is cui diceres, amabo te, eòdem ad me cum revertère, Lib. xiii. Ep. 52. If she relieved the people from oppressions (to whom it seems the law could give no relief,) her visits were a great oppression on the nobility.

(d) Ibid. p. 44. The author hints, that this quantity of plate was considered only as small in a man of Burleigh's rank. His words are, his plate was not above fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds: that he means pounds weight is evident. For, by Burleigh's will, which is annexed to his life, that nobleman gives away in legacies, to friends and relations, near four thousand pounds weight, which would have been above twelve thousand pounds sterling in value. The remainder he orders to be divided into two equal portions; the half to his eldest son and heir; the other half to be divided equally among his second son and three daughters. Were we therefore to understand the whole value of his plate to be only fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds sterling, he left not a tenth of it to the heir of his family.

(e) This appears from Burleigh's will: he specifies only the number of ounces to be given to each legatee, and appoints a goldsmith to see it weighed out to them, without making any distinction of the pieces.

(g) Harrison says, "the greatest part of our building in the cities and good towns of England consisteth only of timber, cast over with thick clay to keep out the wind. Certes, this rude kind of building made the Spaniards in queen Mary's days to wonder; but chiefly when they saw that large diet was used in many of these so homely cottages, insomuch that one of no small reputation amongst them said, after this manner; these English, quoth he, have their houses made of sticks and dirt, but they fare commonly so well as the king. Whereby it appeareth that he liked better of our good fare in such coarse cabins, than of their own thin diet in their princely habitations and palaces. The clay with which our houses are commonly impanelled is either white, red, or blue." Book ii. chap. xii. The author adds, that the new houses of the nobility are commonly of brick or stone, and that glass windows were beginning to be used in England.

the feudal powers; and by a statute of Henry VIII. (k), the jurisdiction of these counties was annexed to the crown, and all writs were ordained to run in the king's name. But the change of manners was the chief cause of the secret revolution of government, and subverted the power of the barons. There appear still in this reign some remains of the ancient slavery of the boors and peasants (l), but none afterwards.

State of Learning and the Polite Arts.

Learning, on its revival, was held in high estimation by the English princes and nobles; and as it was not yet prostituted by being too common, even the great deemed it an object of ambition to attain a character for literature. The four successive sovereigns, Henry, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, may on one account or other be admitted into the class of authors. Queen Catherine Parr translated a book: lady Jane Gray, considering her age, and her sex, and her station, may be regarded as a prodigy of literature. Sir Thomas Smith was raised from being professor in Cambridge, first to be ambassador to France, then secretary of state. The dispatches of those times, and among others those of Burleigh himself, are frequently interlarded with quotations from the Greek and Latin classics. Even the ladies of the court valued themselves on knowledge: lady Burleigh, lady Bacon, and their two sisters, were mistresses of the ancient as well as modern languages; and placed more pride in their erudition than in their rank and quality.

Queen Elizabeth herself wrote and translated several books; and she was familiarly acquainted with the Greek as well as Latin tongue (m). It is pretended that she made an extemporary reply in Greek to the university of Cambridge, who had addressed her in that language. It is certain, that she answered in Latin without premeditation, and in a very spirited manner, to the Polish ambassador, who had been wanting in respect to her. When she had finished, she turned about to her courtiers, and said, "God's death, my lords," (for she was much addicted to swearing) "I have been forced this day to scour up my old Latin that hath long lain rusting (n)." Elizabeth, even after she was queen, did not entirely drop the ambition of appearing as an author; and, next to her desire of ambition for beauty, this seems to have been the chief object of her vanity. She translated Boethius of the Consolation of Philosophy; in order, as she pretended, to allay her grief for Henry IV.'s change of religion. She translated a part of the works of Isocrates; one of the tragedies of Euripides; a dialogue of Xenophon, between Hiero and the poet Simonides; the Bellum Jugurthinum of Salust; Plutarch's treatise on Curiosity; and a considerable part of Horace's Art of Poetry. There is also, among Hatton's manuscripts in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, a long translation from the Hercules Œtæus of Seneca, by the same royal author; which, however, as we are told by the learned and ingenious Mr. Warton, has no other recommendation but its having had the queen for its author.

Natural history was not cultivated at this period, with the assiduity to which it was entitled. That discerning spirit, which is awake to every the minutest productions in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, was but in its infancy. The precious metals, indeed, were sought after with eagerness; but this was the result of avarice, not of philosophy. From the reign of Elizabeth, however, we must date the true æra of botanical science in England. The earliest writer among us that displayed learning and judgement in the knowledge of plants, was Dr. William Turner, a Protestant physician and divine, who was raised to the deanry of Wells by Edward the Sixth, fled beyond sea in the time of queen Mary's persecution, and was restored to his former dignity by Elizabeth. His researches were not confined only to plants, but extended to other branches of natural history; for he was the author of treatises on birds, fishes and mineral waters; but it is as a botanist that he was chiefly distinguished. His banishment, on account of his religious principles, proved favourable to his medical and botanical studies; for, at Bologna, he had the opportunity of attending the lectures of Lucas Ghinas, who was the first person that erected a separate professional chair for the science of botany. The work which has secured Dr. Turner's reputation to posterity, and entitles him to the character of an original writer, is his History of Plants, which has gone through several editions. His observations on the virtues of the plants are chiefly taken from the ancients; though he has, in various instances, differed in opinion from those writers on their peculiar qualities. He has the merit of taking no doubtful plant upon trust, but appears to have examined them with all the precision which it was then possible to exercise. His acquaintance with English plants, to many of which he first gave names, was much beyond what could have been expected in the age in which he lived; to which, as well as to the little assistance which he could derive from his contemporaries, a proper regard must be paid in forming a judgement of his merit as a botanist. Upon the whole Dr. Turner appears to have exerted uncommon diligence and great erudition.

Contemporary with Turner was Dr. William Bulleyn, who published a book, entitled, "The Bulwark of Defence; or, a Book of Simples," being a herbal in the form of a dialogue. Dr. Bulleyn's specific knowledge of botany, however, seems to have been but slender. His chief praise arises from his zeal for the promotion of the useful art of gardening, the general culture of the land, and the commercial interests of the kingdom.

Dr. Thomas Penny, whose name has almost sunk into total obscurity, deserves to be mentioned, as a man of great attainments in the natural history; more particularly in the botany, of his time. Knowledge of this kind was eagerly sought for by him in foreign parts; and he collected many plants in Switzerland, and from the confines of France. Nor were his acquirements in natural history confined merely to plants; for he was one of the first Englishmen who paid any attention to the study of insects. It appears from his letters to Camerarius, that his acquaintance with entomology was extensive, due allowance being made for the period in which he flourished.

Henry Lyte, a gentleman of family and fortune, was the next after Turner who published an English herbal; and, though he does not rank among original writers in botany, his work, which was professedly a translation from a French version of the Dutch Herbal of Dodoens, seems to have been well received; but Lyte's chief merit consisted in transplanting foreign stores into his own country.

Matthias de Lobel, a foreigner who settled in England, contributed largely to the improvement of English botany. The earliest of his publications was the "Stirpium Adversaria;" in the execution of which work he is thought to have exhibited the first sketch, rude as it is, of a natural method of arrangement. This, however, extends no farther than in arranging the plants in large tribes, families, or orders, according to the external appearances or habit of the whole plant or flower, without establishing any definitions or characters. This botanist, in his excursions over various parts of England, discovered many vegetables before unnoticed, and added a number of species to the grasses. There were several other botanists who distinguished themselves during this period, particularly John Gerard, of whom a full account may be seen in Dr. Pulteney's Historical Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England.

Medicine likewise, which is so nearly allied to natural history, assumed, about this period, a more scientific form, and produced a number of medical men whose names are worthy of being transmitted to posterity. Richard Caldewall, who settled in London, became president of the College of Physicians, and is justly entitled to the grateful remembrance of his brethren, for having endowed, in conjunction with lord Lumley, a chirurgical and anatomical lecture in the college. It was in the course of the lectures derived from this institution, that the true doctrine of the circulation of the blood was first made public by Dr. Harvey.

Thomas Mowfet, a medical man, was a writer of great celebrity, and appears to have been one of the earliest introducers

"It is your shame (I speak to you all, you young gentlemen of England,) that one maid should go beyond ye all in excellency of learning, and knowledge of divers tongues. Point out six of the best given gentlemen of this court, and all they together show not so much good will, spend not so much time, bestow not so many hours daily, orderly, and constantly, for the increase of learning and knowledge as doth the queen's majesty herself. Yea, I believe that, besides her perfect readiness in Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish, she readeth here now at Windsor more Greek every day, than some prebendary of this church doth Latin in a whole week.—Amongst all the benefits which God hath blessed me withal, next the knowledge of Christ's true religion, I count this the greatest, that it pleased God to call me to be one poor minister in setting forward these excellent gifts of learning," &c. p. 242.

introducers of chemical medicines in England. His tract, "De Jure et Præstantia Chemicorum Medicamentorum," is an acute apology for the chemical sect in medicine, which then began to prevail in Germany and other countries, though not without violent opposition from the friends of the old school. The work is in the form of a dialogue between a Chemist and a Galenist; the latter of whom suffers himself to be fully convinced of the validity of his opponent's arguments. Five epistles, on the subject of medicine, were likewise published by Mowfet; one of which contains many just and pertinent remarks on the impropriety of unconditional submission to the authority of great names or leaders of a sect. In the first epistle, travelling into foreign parts for the acquisition of medical knowledge is strongly recommended, and its good effects are exhibited in a striking point of view. Another of Mowfet's works, which treats of the Prognostics of Hippocrates, affords an additional proof of that author's profound erudition; at the same time that it shews, that his admiration of Paracelsus did not lead him into that folly and extravagance which were evinced by too many of the chemical sect. His last medical performance, on the Improvement of Health, is curious and entertaining; both on account of the numerous anecdotes and observations quoted from the ancients, and the information it conveys respecting the country at the time in which he wrote.

William Butler was in his time the most popular and celebrated practitioner of physic in the kingdom, though he did not acquire his popularity and celebrity by seeking (like Linacre and Caius) to render himself conspicuous by a display of his critical, polite, or philosophical knowledge; but rather, like our modern empirics, by a bold singularity of practice; though he likewise seems to have possessed a kind of natural sagacity in forming a judgement of diseases. He is said to have been the first who used chemical preparations in England.

John Kaye, or Caius, was highly distinguished for his medical knowledge during this period. He studied physic at Padua, under Johannes Baptista Montanus, the most eminent medical professor of his time; and, while he resided in this city, he had apartments in the same house with the celebrated anatomist Andreas Vesalius, whose ardour in anatomical pursuits he was studious to emulate. On his return to England he was incorporated Doctor of Physic at Cambridge, and practised at Shrewsbury and Norwich, where he acquired such reputation that he was soon called to London, where he was successively physician to Edward the Sixth, and the queens Mary and Elizabeth. He was president of the College of Physicians for seven years, during which time he displayed great zeal in promoting the dignity and interests of that respectable society. To the university of Cambridge, where he had received the first principles of his education, he was a signal benefactor. Gonville Hall, of which he had been a member, was by him erected into a college, which still bears the name of Caius College. Dr. Kaye always expressed the most profound veneration for Galen, whose voluminous writings he appears to have read with great care and attention: with this predilection, many new experiments or discoveries are not to be expected in his publications. His first work, "De Medendi Methodo," has but little to recommend it; but the next of his medical performances is indisputably original, and the subject of it forms a curious article in the annals of medicine. This was his account of the "Sweating Sickness;" or, as he himself named it, the "Ephemerica Britannica." But though this treatise be highly valuable, as well from the ample narrative it gives of a distemper so singular in its nature, as from the many judicious practical remarks which it contains; yet it is far from being a perfect piece of medical writing. Its principal defect, indeed, and a defect which constitutes a serious object of regret, is the neglect of the author to throw a sufficient light on the first rise of the disease. Dr. Kaye's knowledge was not merely confined to his profession; for he was distinguished, though not in an equal degree, as a critic, a linguist, an antiquary, and a naturalist. In the latter character, indeed, he was highly respectable: he was the correspondent and intimate friend of the celebrated Gesner; and drew up for his use "Short Histories of certain rare Animals and Plants," which were inserted in Gesner's works, and afterwards published separately, with corrections and enlargements. At the request also of the same great naturalist, Kaye wrote a "Treatise on British Dogs," in a method so judicious, as to ensure the commendations of Mr. Pennant, who has copied it, entire, in his "British Zoology."

The knowledge of surgery, as well as of medicine, received considerable improvement during the reign of Elizabeth. George Baker, surgeon in ordinary to that princess, published several works in the line of his profession. John Banister, though a physician, distinguished himself chiefly by chirurgical compositions. He enjoyed considerable reputation, and some of his formulæ are remarkable for their elegance and simplicity: they are all indeed less compound than those of foreign practitioners. John Halse is called "a famous man," by William Clowes; who was, however, himself more truly famous. Indeed Clowes appears to have been one of the most eminent surgeons of the period in which he lived; and he was not only a very skilful practitioner, but an improver of the art, especially in his principal work, which treats of burns from gunpowder, and gun-shot wounds, and those made with other military weapons. His learning and judgement was evinced in the number and aptness of his quotations. His style his clear, and tolerably correct: he speaks with great respect of his brethren, and candidly acknowledges any instructions he received from them. On the other hand, he exerts a just degree of severity on empirical pretenders; many of whom, he laments, were permitted to practise on board her majesty's ships, to the great detriment of the service.

This æra produced several lawyers of eminence, whose writings proved a considerable addition to the stock of legal knowledge. The chief of these were Edmund Plowden, sir James Dyer, sir Edmund Anderson, and sir John Popham. The reports of Plowden and Dyer still maintain a certain degree of reputation, and are not without their use in the present course of legal studies. Dyer presided over the court of Common Pleas, with distinguished abilities and integrity, for the long space of four and twenty years. Sir Edward Coke speaks highly of the works of these lawyers: to the commentaries of Plowden he assigns the commendatory epithets, "exquisite and elaborate;" while the observations of Dyer he represents as "summary and fruitful." Judge Jenkins, too, in the preface to his "Centuries," mentions them both as great men, whose learned publications have tended to illustrate our law. The other law-writers worthy of notice, are William Fleetwood, Recorder of London; Thomas Owen, a Judge of the Common Pleas, who wrote a book of reports; and William Fulbeck, who published a direction or preparation to the study of the law, a parallel or conference of the civil, the canon, and the common law.

The science of mathematics also appears to have been studied with considerable ardour during this period. One of the most distinguished mathematicians of the age was John Dee, who might have attained to an uncommon degree of celebrity, had he confined himself simply to mathematical attainments; but unfortunately, the strength of his talents rather led him to encourage than repress the credulity of the times. Thinking nothing beyond his comprehension, he wandered in the labyrinths of judicial astrology, became a bold alchymist, and even suffered his judgement to be led astray by the ridiculous delusions of necromancy.

Thomas Digges, though not endowed with such splendid abilities as Dee, was nevertheless a more useful mathematician, as the object of his studies was the instruction of soldiers, and the improvement of military discipline. To these points his attention was naturally directed by his situation, for he was muster-master general of the forces which the queen sent to the Netherlands. He was the author of an arithmetical military treatise, and a geometrical work entitled "Stratiotocos," compendiously teaching the science of numbers, and so much of the rules and equations algebraical as are requisite for the profession of a soldier. He also published some works that were purely mathematical; among others, a "Perfect Description of the Celestial Orbs, according to the most ancient doctrine of the Pythagoreans."

Thomas Harriott was also a most skilful mathematician. He was the inventor of so many useful and excellent improvements in algebraical calculations, that his name is still holden in high esteem by the professors of that abstruse science. Descartes borrowed his inventions, but had not the candour to acknowledge the obligation; Dr. Wallis, however, has detected the fraud, and done justice to Harriot's discoveries.

John Blagrave was an able geometrician of this period.

The science of mathematics was by him applied to practical purposes; and the end he proposed to himself was to promote the extension of this kind of knowledge, which had hitherto been confined to a few of his countrymen. With this view he laboured to show the general utility of such pursuits; and, to convince his readers that, far from being considered as mere objects of amusement or speculation, they were indispensably necessary for providing the conveniences of common life. His views were certainly commendable; though his success, as might have naturally been expected, was far from great.

It cannot be supposed that poetry could be neglected in an age which could boast of a Shakespeare and a Spenser; yet did the votaries of the Muses labour under many inconveniences, not only from the want of proper patronage and encouragement, but from the puritanical spirit of the times, which tended to check the efforts of genius and the progress of taste. Of our English Sophocles, so much has already been said by his numerous biographers and commentators, that nothing remains to awaken or gratify curiosity; so that it is sufficient for the historian merely to notice the period at which he flourished. Of Spenser, too, it is well known, that after the death of his gallant patron, sir Philip Sidney, who was himself a poet, he was suffered to linger out the greater part of his life in penury and want.

In the reign of Mary, a small poem, in the spirit and stanza of Sternhold, had been printed under the following title: "The Vngodlinesse of The Hethnicke Goddes; or, The Downfall of Diana of the Ephesians, by J. D. an Exile for the Word, late a Minister in London, M D L I V." Mr. Warton supposes it was printed at Geneva, and imported into England with other books of the same tendency, and which were afterwards suppressed by a proclamation. The writer, whose arguments are as weak as his poetry, attempts to prove, that the customary mode of training youths in the Roman poets, encouraged idolatry and Pagan superstition. This was a topic much laboured by the Puritans. Prynne, in that chapter of his "Histriomastix," where he exposes "the obscenity, ribaldry, amorousnesse, Heathenishnesse, and prophanesse of most play-bookes, Arcadias, and fained histories, that are now so much in admiration;" acquaints us, that the infallible leaders of the Puritan persuasion in the reign of queen Elizabeth, among which are two bishops, have solemnly prohibited all Christians "to pen, to print, to sell, to read, or schoolmasters and others to teach, any amorous wanton play-bookes, histories, or heathen authors; especially Ovid's wanton Epistles and bookes of Love, Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, Martial, the Comedies of Plautus, Terence, and such amorous bookes, savouring either of Pagan gods, of Ethnicke rites and ceremonies, of scurrility, amorousnesse, and prophanesse." But the classics were at length condemned by a much higher authority. In the year 1582, one Christopher Ocland, a schoolmaster of Cheltenham, published two poems, in Latin hexameters; one entitled "Anglorum Prælia," the other "Elizabetha." To these poems, which are written in a low style of Latin versification, is prefixed an edict from the lords of the privy-council, signed, among others, by Cowper, bishop of Lincoln; lord Warwick; lord Leicester; sir Francis Knolles; sir Christopher Hatton; and sir Francis Walsingham; and directed to the queen's ecclesiastical commissioners, containing the following passage. "Forasmuche as the subject or matter of this booke is such as is worthie to be read of all men; and especially in common schooles, where diuers Heathen poets are ordinarily read and taught, from which the youth of the realm doth rather receive infection in manners than aduancement in uertue in place of some of which poets, we thinke this booke fit to be read and taught in the grammar-schooles. We have therefore thought, as well for the encouraging the said Ocklande, and others that are learned, to bestowe their trauell and studies to so good purposes, as also for the benefit of the youth, and the removing of such luscious poets as are commonly read and taught in the saide grammar-schools—the matter of this booke being heroicall and of good instruction—to praye and require you, upon the sight hereof, as by our special order, to write your letters vnto al the bishops throughout this realme, requiring them to give commaundement, that in all the grammar and free-schooles within their seuerall diocesses, the said booke de "Anglorum Prælia," and peaceable government of her majestie, (the "Elizabetha") may be, in place of some of the heathen poets, receyued, and publiquely read and taught by the scholemasters." With such abundant circumspection and solemnity did these profound and pious politicians (not suspecting that they were acting in opposition to their own principles and intentions) exert their endeavours to bring back barbarism, and to obstruct the progress of truth and good sense (o).

The first poem which appeared in the reign of Elizabeth, was the play of Gordobuc, written by Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurst; with the assistance, it is said, of Thomas Norton, who was also an associate with Sternhold and Hopkins in the metrical version of David's Psalms. This piece is chiefly curious, from its being, perhaps, the first specimen in our language of an heroic tale, written in blank verse, divided into acts and scenes, and cloathed in all the formalities of a regular tragedy. It was first exhibited in the great hall of the Inner Temple by the students of that society, a part of the entertainment of a grand Christmas; and afterward before queen Elizabeth at Whitehall, on the eighteenth day of January, 1561.

Soon after the appearance of this tragedy, the Jocasto of Euripides was translated by George Gascoigne and Francis Kinwelmersh, both students of Gray's Inn; and acted in the refectory of that society in 1566. Seneca's ten tragedies were also translated during this period, at different times, and by different poets. These were all printed together, in 1581, under the title, "Seneca His Tenne Tragedies, Translated into English. Mercurii nutrices horæ Imprinted at London, in Fleet Streete, neare unto Saincte Dunston's Church, by Thomas Marche, 1581.

As scholars began to direct their attention to our vernacular poetry, many more of the ancient poets now appeared in English verse. Before the conclusion of the sixteenth century, Homer, Virgil, Horace, Ovid's Metamorphosis, by Arthur Golding, kept its ground till Sandye's English Ovid appeared in 1632. This author finished an English translation of Philip Mornay's Treatise in French on the Truth of Christianity, which had been begun by sir Philip Sydney, and was published in 1587. He enlarged our knowledge of the treatises of antiquity, by publishing English translations of Justin's History in 1564; of Cæsar's Commentaries in 1565; of Seneca's Benefits in 1577; and of the Geography of Pomponius Mela, and the Poly-history of Solinus, in 1587 and 1590. He has left versions of many modern Latin writers, which then had their use, and suited the condition, and opinions of the times; and which are now forgotten by the introduction of better books, and the general change of the system of learning.

The Art of Poetry, Epistles, and Satires of Horace, were translated by Thomas Drant in 1567. The following passage in the translator's address to the reader is too curious not to be transcribed, as it is a picture of the popular learning, and a ridicule of the idle narratives, of the reign of queen Elizabeth. "But I feare me a number do so thincke of thys booke, as I was aunswered by a prynter not long agone. Though, sayth he, Sir, your booke be wyse and ful of learnyng yet peradventure it wyl not be saleable: signifying indeede, that flim-flames, and gue-gaws, be they never so sleight and slender, are sooner rapte-vp thenne are those which be lettered and clarkly makings. And no doubt the cavse that bookes of learnynge seeme so hard is, because such and so greate a scull of amarouse pamphlets have so preoccupyed the eyes and cares of men, that a multytude beleve ther is none other style or phrase ells worthe gramercy. No bookes so ryse or so frindly red, as be these bookes.—But if the settying out of the wanton tricks of a payre of lovers, as for example, let theym be cauled sir Chaunticleare and dame Partilote, to tell howe their firste combination of love begun, howe their eyes floted, and howe they anchered, their beames mingled one with the others bewtye. Then, of their perplexed thoughts, their throwes, their fancyes, their dryrie driftes, now interrupted, now vnperfyted, their love days, their sugred words, and their sugred ioyes. Afterwards howe enuyous fortune, through this chop or that chaunce, turned their bless to bale, seuerynge two such bewtiful faces and dewtiful hearts. Last, at the partynge, to ad to an oration or twane, interchangeably had betwixt the two wobegone persons, the one thicke powdered with manly passionat pangs, the other watered with womanish teares. Then to shryne them up to god Cupid, and make martirres of them both, and therewyth an ende of the matter."

It would greatly exceed the purposes of general history to

to notice all the poets and translators of this period, which is commonly called the Golden Age of English Poetry: we shall therefore only add a few remarks on the genius of the poetry of that age, chiefly taken from the very ingenious author, to whose labours, in this department of our history, we have already been greatly indebted.

Among the great features which strike us in the poetry of this period, are the predominancy of fable, of fiction, and of fancy; and a predilection for interesting adventures and pathetic events. The cause of this characteristical distinction may be chiefly referred to the following principles, sometimes blended, and sometimes operating singly. The revival and vernacular versions of the classics, the importation and translation of Italian novels; the visionary reveries or refinements of false philosophy; a degree of superstition sufficient for the purposes of poetry; the adoption of the machineries of romance; and the frequency and improvements of allegoric exhibition in the popular spectacles.

The perusal of the Italian tales gave rise to innumerable plays and poems, which would not otherwise have existed, and turned the thoughts of our writers to new inventions of the same kind. Before these books became common, affecting situations, the combination of incident, and the pathos of catastrophe, were almost unknown. Distress, especially that arising from the conflicts of the tender passion, had not yet been shown in its most interesting forms. It was hence our poets, particularly the dramatic, borrowed ideas of a legitimate plot, and the complication of facts necessary to constitute a story either of the comic or tragic species. In proportion as knowledge encreased, genius had wanted subject and materials. These pieces usurped the place of legends and chronicles; and although the old historical songs of the minstrels contained much bold adventure, heroic enterprize, and strong touches of rude delineation; yet they failed in that multiplication and disposition of circumstances, and in that description of characters and events approaching nearer to truth and reality, which were demanded by a more discerning and curious age. Even the rugged features of the original Gothic romance were softened by this sort of reading; and the Italian pastoral, yet with some mixture of the kind of incidents described in the Ethiopic History of Heliodorus, now newly translated, was engrafted on the feudal manners in Sydney's Arcadia.

But the Reformation had not yet destroyed every delusion, nor disinchanted all the strong holds of superstition. A few dim characters were yet legible in the mouldering creed of tradition. Every goblin of ignorance did not vanish at the first glimmerings of the morning of science. Reason suffered a few demons still to linger, which she chose to retain in her service under the guidance of poetry. Men believed, or were willing to believe, that spirits were yet hovering around, who brought with them airs from heaven, or blasts from hell, that the ghost was duely released from his prison of torment at the sound of the curfue; and that fairies imprinted mysterious circles on the turf by moonlight. Much of this credulity was even consecrated by the name of science and profound speculation. Prospero had not yet broken and buried his staff, nor drowned his book deeper than did ever plummet sound. It was now that the alchymist, and the judicial astrologer, conducted his occult operations by the potent intercourse of some preternatural being, who came obsequious to his call, and was bound to accomplish his severest service under certain conditions, and for a limited duration of time. It was actually one of the pretended feats of these fantastic philosophers, to evoke the queen of the fairies in the solitude of a gloomy grove, who, preceded by a sudden rustling of the leaves, appeared in robes of transcendent lustre (p). The Shakespeare of a more instructed and polished age—says Warton—would not have given us a magician darkening the sun at noon, the sabbath of the witches, and the cauldron of incantation.

Undoubtedly most of these notions were credited and entertained in a much higher degree in the preceding periods: but the arts of composition had not then made a sufficient progress, nor would the poets of these periods have managed them with so much address and judgement. We were now arrived at that point, when the national credulity, chastened by reason, had produced a sort of civil superstition, and left a set of traditions, fanciful enough for poetic decoration, and yet not too violent and chimerical for common sense.

In the mean time, the Gothic romance, although somewhat shaken by the classical fictions and by the Tales of Boccaccio and Bandello, still maintained its ground; and the daring machineries of giants, dragons, and enchanted castles, borrowed from the magic storehouse of Boiardo, Ariosto, and Tasso, began to be employed by the epic muse. Indeed, the Gothic and Pagan fictions were now frequently blended and incorporated. The Lady of the Lake floated in the suite of Neptune, before queen Elizabeth at Kenilworth; Ariel assumes the resemblance of a sea-nymph; and Hecate, by an easy association, conducted the rites of the wierd sisters in Macbeth.

Allegory had been derived from the religious dramas into our civil spectacles. The masques and pageantries of the age of Elizabeth were not only furnished by the heathen divinities, but often by the virtues and vices impersonated, significantly decorated, accurately distinguished by their proper types, and represented by living actors. The ancient symbolical shews of this sort began now to lose their old barbarism and a mixture of religion, and to assume a degree of political elegance and precision.

It must be observed, that only a few critical treatises, and but one Art of Poetry, were now written. Sentiments and images were not absolutely determined by the canons of composition: nor was genius awed by the consciousness of a future and final arrangement at the tribunal of taste. A certain dignity of inattention to niceties was now visible in our writers. Without consulting too closely a criterion of correctness, every man indulged his own capriciousness and invention. The poet's appeal was chiefly to his own voluntary feelings, his own immediate and peculiar mode of conception: and this freedom of thought was often expressed in an undisguised frankness of diction; a circumstance that greatly contributed to give the flowing modulation which marked the measures of the poets of this period, and which soon degenerated into the opposite extreme of dissonance and asperity. Selection and discrimination were often overlooked. Shakespeare wandered in pursuit of universal nature. The glancings of his eye are from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven. We behold him breaking the barriers of imaginary method. In the same scene he descends from his meridian of the noblest tragic sublimity, to puns and quibbles, to the meanest merriments of a plebeian farce.

No satires, properly so called, were written till towards the conclusion of this period, and then but a few pictures drawn at large of the vice of the times, did not suit readers who loved to wander in the regions of artificial manners. The Muse, like the people, was too solemn and reserved, too ceremonious and pedantic, to stoop to common life. Satire is the poetry of a nation highly polished.

The importance of the female character was not yet acknowledged, nor were women admitted into the general commerce of society. The effect of that intercourse had not imparted a comic air to poetry, nor softened the severer tone of our versification with the levities of gallantry, and the familiarities of compliment; sometimes perhaps operating on serious subjects, and imperceptibly spreading themselves in the general habits of style and thought.

All or most of these circumstances contributed to give a descriptive, a picturesque, and a figurative cast to the poetical language. This effect appears even in the prose compositions of the present period. In the subsequent age, prose became the language of poetry.

In the mean time, general knowledge was encreasing with a wide diffusion and a hasty rapidity. Books began to be multiplied, and a variety of the most useful and rational topics had been discussed in our own language; yet the advances of science had not been very great. On the whole, we were now arrived at that period which was propitious to the operations of original and true poetry, when the coyness of fancy was not always proof against the approaches of reason; when genius was rather directed than governed by judgement; and when taste and learning had so far only disciplined imagination, as to suffer its excesses to pass without censure or controul, for the sake of the beauties to which they were allied.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.

AS on the accession of Mary to the throne, all the ecclesiastical measures which had been adopted in the preceding reign, were reversed; so were all her own proceedings ceedings, with regard to religion, annulled by her sister Elizabeth, who assumed the supremacy, abolished the mass, and re-established the liturgy of king Edward the Sixth. Those English divines, who had fled from the persecutions of queen Mary, now returned. These divines, having adopted, in some measure, the doctrines promulgated by Calvin and other Reformers, approximated nearer to primitive Christianity than any other sect: it is therefore no wonder that they held in utter abhorrence all the ceremonies of the church of Rome, especially as they considered that the pageantry and shew generally attendant upon them were in nowise authorized by the Scriptures, but were solely the inventions of men.

But to be more particular: the church of Scotland acknowledges as its founder, John Knox, the disciple of Calvin; and, accordingly, from its first reformation, it adopted the doctrine, rite, and form of ecclesiastical government, established at Geneva. These it has always adhered to with the utmost uniformity, and maintained with the greatest jealousy and zeal; so that even in the seventeenth century the designs of those, who attempted to introduce certain changes into its discipline and worship, were publicly opposed by the force of arms (q).

A quite different constitution of things is observable in the church of England, which could never be brought to an entire compliance with the ecclesiastical laws of Geneva, and which retained, but for a short time, even those which it adopted. It is well known, that the greatest part of those English, who first threw off the yoke of Rome, seemed much more inclined to the sentiments of Luther concerning the eucharist, the form of public worship, and ecclesiastical government, than to those of the Swiss churches. But the scene changed after the death of Henry VIII. when by the industrious zeal of Calvin, and his disciples, more especially Peter Martyr, the cause of Lutheranism lost ground considerably; and the universities, schools, and churches, became the oracles of Calvanism, which also acquired new votaries among the people from day to day. Hence it happened, that when it was proposed under the reign of Edward VI. to give a fixed and stable form to the doctrine and discipline of the church, Geneva was acknowledged as a sister-church; and the theological system, there established by Calvin, was adopted, and rendered the public rule of faith in England. This, however, was done without any change of the form of episcopal government, which had already taken place, and was entirely different from that of Geneva; nor was this step attended with any alteration of several religious rites and ceremonies, which were looked upon as superstitious by the greatest part of the Reformed. This difference however, between the two churches, though it appeared at first of little consequence, and, in the judgement even of Calvin, was esteemed an object of toleration and indulgence, was nevertheless, in after ages, a source of many calamities and dissensions, that were highly detrimental both to the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of Great Britain.

The reign of these unhappy dissensions, which it has not as yet been possible entirely to heal, must be sought for in the conduct of those persecuted fugitives, who to save their lives, their families, and their fortunes, from the bloody rage and inhuman tyranny of queen Mary, left the places of their nativity in the year 1554, and took refuge in Germany (r). Of these fugitive congregations some performed divine worship with the rites that had been authorised by Edward VI.; while others preferred the Swiss method of worship as more commendable on account of its purity and simplicity. The former were called Conformists, on account of their compliance with the ecclesiastical laws enacted by the prince just mentioned; and the denominations of Non-conformists and Puritans were given to the latter, from their insisting upon a form of worship more exempt from superstition, and of a more pure kind, than the liturgy of Edward seemed to them to be. These denominations became permanent marks of distinction, which still continue to denote those different religious communities which divide the British nation. The controversy, concerning the ceremonial part of divine worship, that had divided the exiles abroad, changed scenes, and was removed with them to England, when the auspicious succession of queen Elizabeth to the throne permitted them to return to their native country. The hopes of enjoying liberty, and of promoting each their respective systems, increased their contests instead of diminishing them; and the breach widened to such a degree, that the most sagacious and provident observers of things seemed to despair of seeing it healed. The wise queen in her design to accomplish the reformation of the church, was fully resolved not to confine herself to the model, exhibited by the Protestants of Geneva, and their adherents, the Puritans; and therefore, she recommended to the attention and imitation of the doctors, that were employed in this weighty and important matter, the practice and institutions of the primitive ages (s). When her plan was put in execution, and the face of the church was changed and reformed by new rules of discipline, and purer forms of public worship, the famous Act of Uniformity was issued forth, by which all her subjects were commanded to observe these rules, and to submit to the reformation of the church on the footing on which it was now placed by the queen, as its supreme, visible head upon earth. The Puritans refused their assent to these proceedings; pleaded the dictates of their consciences in behalf of this refusal; and complained heavily, that the gross superstitions of popery, which they had looked upon as abrogated and abolished, were now revived, and even imposed by authority. They were not, indeed, all equally exasperated against the new constitution of the church; nor did they in effect carry their opposition to equal degrees of excess. The more violent demanded the total abrogation of all that had been done towards the establishment of a national religion, and required nothing less than that the church of England should be exactly moddled after that of Geneva. The milder and more moderate Puritans were much more equitable in their demands, and only designed liberty of conscience, with the privilege of celebrating divine worship in their own way. The queen did not judge it proper to grant to either the objects of their requests, but rather intent upon the suppression of this troublesome sect (as she was pleased to call it) permitted its enemies to employ for that purpose all the resources of artifice, and all the severity of the laws. Thus was that form of religion established in Britain, which separated the English equally from the church of Rome on the one hand, and from the other churches which had renounced popery, on the other; but which, at the same time laid a perpetual foundation for dissension and feuds in that otherwise happy and prosperous nation (t).

The incidents that gave rise to these unhappy divisions, which were productive of so many and such dreadful cala-

(q) This alludes to the attempts under the reign of Charles the Second, to introduce episcopacy into Scotland.

(r) We cannot help mentioning the uncharitableness of the Lutherans, upon this occasion, who hated these unhappy exiles, because they were Sacramentarians, (for so the Lutherans called those who denied Christ's bodily presence in the Eucharist,) and expelled from their cities such of the English Protestants, as repaired to them, as a refuge from Popish superstition and persecution. Such as sought for shelter in France, Geneva, and those parts of Switzerland and Germany, where the Reformation had taken place, and where Lutheranism was not professed, were received with great humanity, and allowed places of public worship. But it was at Frankfort that the exiles were most numerous; and there began the contest and division which gave rise to that separation from the church of England which continues to this day. It is, however, a piece of justice due to the memory of the excellent Melancthon, to observe, that he warmly condemned this uncharitable treatment, and more especially the indecent reproaches which the Lutherans cast upon the English Martyrs who had sealed the reformation with their blood, calling them the Devil's Martyrs. Melancthon indeed was so humane and liberal in his sentiments, that his name was rendered precious to the lovers of piety, probity, and moderation; while the zealots of his own church have treated his memory with obloquy, and composed dissertations "de Indifferentismo Melancthonis," i. e. concerning the indifference of Melancthon.

(s) This ambiguous expression of the primitive ages seems to insinuate that queen Elizabeth had formed a pure, rational, and evangelical plan of religious discipline and worship. It is, however, certain, that, instead of being willing to strip religion of the ridiculous ceremonies which remained in it, she was rather inclined to bring the public worship still nearer the Romish ritual, and had a great propensity to several usages in the Church of Rome, which were justly looked upon as superstitious. She thanked publicly one of her chaplains, who had preached in defence of the real presence; she was fond of images, and retained some in her private chapel; and would undoubtedly have forbidden the marriage of the clergy, if Cecil, her secretary, had not interposed. Having appointed a committee of divines to review Edward the Sixth's Liturgy, she gave them an order to strike out all offensive passages against the pope, and to make people easy about the corporeal presence of Christ in the sacrament.

(t) No writer has treated this part of the Ecclesiastical History of Britain in a more ample and elegant manner than Daniel Neale, in his History of the Puritans, or Protestant Non-conformists, in four volumes octavo. See also, for an account of the religious history of these times, Strype's Lives of the archbishops of Canterbury under queen Elizabeth, viz. Parker, Grindal, and Whitgift.

mities, was a matter of very small moment, and which did not seem to affect, in any way, the interests of true religion and virtue. The chief leaders among the Puritans entertained a strong aversion to the vestments worn by the English clergy in the celebration of divine worship. As these habits had been made use of in the times of popery, and seemed to renew the impressions that had been made upon the people by the Romish priests, they appeared to the Puritans in no other light, than as the ensigns of Antichrist. The spirit of opposition, being once set on foot, proceeded, in its remonstrances, to matters of superior moment. The form of ecclesiastical government, established in England, was one of the first and main grievances of which the Puritans complained. They looked upon this form as quite different from that which had been instituted by Christ, the great law-giver of the church; and, in conformity with the sentiments of Calvin, mentioned, that, by the divine law, all the ministers of the gospel were absolutely equal in point of rank and authority. They did not indeed think it unlawful that a person, distinguished by the title of a bishop, or superintendent, should preside in the assembly of the clergy, for the sake of maintaining order and decency in their method of proceeding, but they thought it incongruous and absurd, that the persons invested with this character should be ranked, as the bishops had hitherto been, among the nobility of the kingdom, employed in civil and political affairs, and distinguished so eminently by their worldly opulence and power. This controversy was not carried on, however, with excessive animosity and zeal, as long as the English bishops pretended to derive their dignity and authority from no other source than the laws of their country, and pleaded a right, purely human, to the rank they held in church and state. But the flame broke out with redoubled fury in the year 1588, when Bancroft, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, ventured to assert that the order of bishops was superior to the body of presbyters, not in consequence of any human institution, but by the express appointment of God himself (u). This doctrine was readily adopted by many, and the consequences that seemed naturally to flow from it in favour of episcopal ordination, happened in effect, and gave new fuel to the flame of controversy. For they who embraced the sentiments of Bancroft, considered all ministers of the gospel, who had not received ordination from a bishop, as irregularly invested with the sacred character; and also maintained, that the clergy, in those countries where there were no bishops, were destitute of the gifts and qualifications that were necessary to the exercise of the pastoral office, and were to be looked upon as inferior to the Roman Catholic priests.

All these things exasperated the Puritans, whose complaints, however, were not confined to the objects already mentioned. There were many circumstances that entered into their plan of reformation. They had a singular antipathy against cathedral churches, and demanded the abolition of the archdeacons, deans, canons, and other officials, that are supported by their lands and revenues. They disapproved of the pompous manner of worship that is generally observed in these churches, and looked, particularly, upon instrumental music, as improperly employed in the service of God. The severity of their zeal was also very great; for they were of opinion, that, not open profligates, but even persons whose piety was dubious, deserved to be excluded from the communion of the church (v); and they endeavoured to justify the rigour of this decision, by observing that the church, being the congregation of the faithful, nothing was more incumbent on its ministers and rulers, than to watch against its being defiled by the presence of persons destitute of true faith and piety. They found, moreover, much subject of affliction and complaint in the rites and ceremonies that were imposed by the order of the queen, and the authority of the council; among these were the festivals or holidays that were celebrated in honour of the saints, the use of the sign of the cross more especially in the sacrament of baptism, the nominating godfathers and godmothers as sureties for the education of children whose parents were still living (w), and the doctrine relating to the validity of lay-baptism (x). They disliked the reading of the apocryphal books in the church; and, with respect to set forms of prayer, although they did not go so far as to insist upon their being entirely abolished, yet they pleaded for a right to every minister, of modifying, correcting, and using them in such a manner, as might tend most to the advancement of true piety, and of addressing the Deity in such terms as were suggested by their inward feelings, instead of those that were dictated by others. In a word, they were of opinion, that the government and discipline of the church of England ought to have been modeled after the ecclesiastical laws and institutions of Geneva, and that no indulgence was to be shewn to those ceremonies or practices, which bore the smallest resemblance of the discipline or worship of the church of Rome.

These sentiments, considered in themselves, seemed neither susceptible of a satisfactory defence, nor of a compleat refutation. Their solidity or falsehood depended upon the principles from whence they were derived; and no regular controversy could be carried on upon these matters, until the contending parties adopted some common and evident principles, by which they might corroborate their respective systems. It is only by an examination of these, that it can be known on what side truth lies, and what degree of utility and importance can be attributed to a contest of this nature. The principles laid down by the queen's commissioners on the one hand, and the Puritans on the other, were indeed very different.

For in the first place, The former maintained, that the right of reformation, that is, the privilege of removing the corruptions and of correcting the errors, that may have been introduced into the doctrine, discipline, or worship of the church is lodged in the sovereign, or civil magistrate alone; while the latter denied, that the power of the magistrate extended so far, and maintained, that it was rather the business of the clergy to restore religion to its native dignity and lustre. This was the opinion of Calvin.

Secondly, The queen's commissioners maintained, that the rule of proceeding, in reforming the doctrine or discipline of the church, was not to be derived from the sacred writings alone, but also from the writings and decisions of the fathers in the primitive ages. The Puritans, on the contrary, affirmed, that the inspired word of God being the pure and only fountain of wisdom and truth, it was from thence alone that the rules and directions were to be drawn, which were to guide the measures of those, who undertook to purify the faith, or to rectify the discipline and worship of the church; and that the ecclesiastical institutions of the early ages, as also the writings of the ancient doctors, were absolutely destitute of all sort of authority.

Thirdly, the queen's commissioners ventured to assert, that the church of Rome was a true church, though corrupt and erroneous in many points of doctrine and government; that the Roman pontiff, though chargeable with temerity and arrogance in assuming to himself the title and jurisdiction of head of the whole church, was, nevertheless, (u) See Strype's Life and Acts of John Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, p. 121. The first English Reformers admitted but two orders of church officers to be of divine appointment, viz. bishops and deacons, a presbyter and a bishop, according to them, being but two names for the same office; but Dr. Bancroft, in a sermon preached at Paul's Cross, in Cheapside, January 12, 1588, maintained, that the bishops of England were a distinct order from priests, and had a superiority over them jure divino.

(v) The Puritans justified themselves in relation to this point, in a letter addressed, from their prison, to queen Elizabeth, in 1592, by observing, that their sentiments concerning the persons subject to excommunication, and also concerning the effects and extent of that act of church discipline, were conformable to those of all the Reformed churches, and to the doctrine and practice of the church of England in particular. They declared more especially, that, according to their sense of things, the censure of excommunication deprived only of spiritual privileges and comforts, without taking away either liberty, goods, lands, government private or public, or any other civil or earthly commodity of this life; and thus they distinguished themselves from those furious and fanatical anabaptists, who had committed such disorders in Germany, and some of whom were now making a noise in England.

(w) Other rites and customs displeasing to the Puritans were kneeling at the sacrament of the Lord's supper, bowing at the name of Jesus, giving the ring in marriage, the prohibition of marriage during certain times of the year, and the licensing it for money, as also the confirmation of children by the episcopal imposition of hands.

(x) The Roman Catholics, who look upon the external rite of baptism as absolutely necessary to salvation, allow, consequently, of its being performed by a layman, or a midwife, where a clergyman is not at hand, nay (if such a ridiculous thing may be mentioned) by a surgeon, where a still birth is apprehended. The church of England, though it teacheth in general, that none ought to baptize, but men dedicated to the service of God, yet doth not esteem null, baptism performed by laics or women, because it makes a difference between what is essential to a sacrament, and what is requisite in the regular way of using it. The Puritans, that they might neither prescribe nor even connive at a practice that seemed to be founded on the absolute necessity of infant baptism, would allow that sacred rite to be performed by the clergy alone.

to be esteemed a true and lawful bishop; and, consequently, that the ministers ordained by him, were qualified for performing the pastoral duties. This was a point, which the English bishops thought it absolutely necessary to maintain, since they could not otherwise claim the honour of deriving their dignities, in an uninterrupted line of succession, from the apostles. But the Puritans entertained very different notions of this matter; they considered the Romish hierarchy as a system of political and spiritual tyranny; that had justly forfeited the title and privileges of a true church; they looked upon its pontiff as Antichrist, and its discipline as vain, superstitious, idolatrous, and diametrically opposite to the injunctions of the Gospel; and in consequence of this they renounced its communion, and regarded all approaches to its discipline and worship as highly dangerous to the cause of true religion.

Fourthly, The court commissioners considered as the best and most perfect form of ecclesiastical government, that which took place during the first four or five centuries; they even preferred it to that which had been instituted by the apostles, because, as they alledged, our Saviour and his apostles had accommodated the form, mentioned in Scripture, to the feeble and infant state of the church, and left it to the wisdom and discretion of future ages to modify it in such a manner as might be suitable to the triumphant progress of Christianity, the grandeur of a national establishment, and also to the ends of civil policy. The Puritans asserted, in opposition to this, that the rules of church government were clearly laid down in the Holy Scriptures, the only standard of spiritual discipline (y); and that the Apostles, in establishing the first Christian church on the Aristocratical plan that was then observed in the Jewish Sanhedrim, designed it as an unchangeable model, to be followed in all times and in all places.

Lastly, The court of reformers were of opinion, that things indifferent, which are neither commanded nor forbidden by the authority of Scripture, such as the external rites of public worship, the kind of vestments that are to be used by the clergy, religious festivals, and the like, might be ordered, determined, and rendered a matter of obligation by the authority of the civil magistrate; and that, in such a case, the violation of his commands would be no less criminal, than an act of rebellion against the laws of the state. The Puritans alledged, in answer to this assertion, that it was an indecent prostitution of power to impose as necessary and indispensable, those things which Christ had left in the class of matters indifferent; since this was a manifest incroachment upon that liberty, with which the Divine Saviour had made us free. To this they added, that such rites and ceremonies, as had been abused to idolatrous purposes, and had a manifest tendency to revive the impressions of superstition and popery in the minds of men could by no means be considered as indifferent, but deserved to be rejected without hesitation, as impious and profane. Such, in their estimation, were the religious ceremonies of ancient times, whose abrogation was refused by the queen and her council (z).

This contest between the commissioners of the court, and their opponents, who desired a more compleat reformation than had yet taken place, would have been much more dangerous in its consequences, had that party, that was distinguished by the general denomination of Puritan, been united in their sentiments, views, and measures. But the case was quite otherwise. For this large body, composed of persons of different ranks, characters, opinions, and intentions, and, unanimous in nothing but their antipathy against the forms of doctrine and discipline that were established by law, was, all of a sudden, divided into a variety of sects; of which some spread abroad the delusions of enthusiasm, which had turned their own brains; while others displayed their folly in inventing new and whimsical plans of church-government. The most famous of all these sects was that which was formed, about the year 1581, by Robert Brown, an insinuating man, but very unsettled and inconsistent in his views and notions of things. This innovator did not differ, in point of doctrine, either from the church of England or from the rest of the Puritans; but he had formed new and singular notions concerning the nature of the church, and the rules of ecclesiastical government. He was for dividing the whole body of the faithful into separate societies or congregations, not larger than those which were formed by the Apostles in the infancy of Christianity; and maintained, that such a number of persons, as could be contained in an ordinary place of worship, ought to be considered as a church, and enjoy all the rights and privileges that are competent to an ecclesiastical community. These small societies he pronounced independent, jure divino, and entirely exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishops, in whose hands the court placed the reins of spiritual government; and also from that of synods, which the Puritans regarded as the supreme visible sources of ecclesiastical authority. He also maintained, that the power of governing each congregation, and providing for its welfare, resided in the people; and that each member had an equal share in this direction, and an equal right to order matters for the good of the whole society (a). Hence all points both of doctrine and discipline were submitted to the discussion of the whole congregation, and whatever was supported by a majority of votes passed into a law. It was the congregation also that elected certain of the brethren to the office of pastors, to perform the duties of public instruction, and the several branches of divine worship reserving, however, to themselves the power of dismissing these ministers, and reducing them to the condition of private members, whenever they should think such a change conducive to the spiritual advantage of the community. For these pastors were not esteemed superior, either in sanctity or rank, to the rest of their brethren, nor distinguished from them by any other circumstance than the liberty of preaching and praying, which they derived from the free will and consent of the congregation. It is, besides to be observed, that their right of preaching was, by no means, of an exclusive nature, or peculiar to them alone; since any member that thought proper to exhort or instruct the brethren, was indulged in the liberty of prophesying to the whole assembly. Accordingly, when the ordinary teacher or pastor has finished his discourse, all the other brethren were permitted to communicate in public their sentiments and illustrations upon any useful or edifying subjects on which they supposed they could throw new light. In a word, Brown aimed at nothing less than modelling the form of the church after that infant community, that was founded by the apostles, without once considering the important change both in the religious and civil state of the world since that time, the influence that these changes must necessarily have upon all ecclesiastical establishments, and the particular circumstances of the Christian church in consequence of its former corruptions and its late reformation. And, if his notions were crude and in some measure chimerical, the zeal with which he and his associates maintained and propagated them was intemperate and extravagant in the highest degree. For he affirmed, that all communion was to be broken off with those religious societies, that were founded upon a different plan from his, and treated, more especially, the church of England, as a spurious church, whose ministers were unlawfully ordained, whose discipline was popish and antichristian, and whose sacraments and institutions were destitute of all efficacy and virtue. The sect of this innovator, not being able to endure the severe treatment which their opposition to the established forms of religious government and worship had drawn (y) By this they meant at least, that nothing should be imposed as necessary, but what was exactly contained in the Holy Scriptures, or deduced from them by necessary consequence. They maintained still farther, that supposing it proved, that all things neeessary to the good government of the church could not be deduced from Holy Scripture, yet, that the discretionary power of supplying this defect was not vested in the civil magistrate, but in the spiritual officers of the church.

(z) Mr. Neal, in his History of the Puritans, adds a sixth article, not of debate, but of union, "Both parties (says he) agreed too well in asserting the necessity of an uniformity of public worship, and of calling in the sword of the magistrate for the support and defence of their several principles, which they made an ill use of in their turns, as they could grasp the power into their hands. The standard of uniformity, according to the bishops, was the queen's supremacy, and the laws of the land; according to the Puritans, the decrees of provincial and national synods, allowed and enforced by the civil magistrate: but neither party were for admitting that liberty of conscience, and freedom of profession, which is every man's right as far as is consistent with the peace of the government under which he lives.

(a) It is farther to be observed, that, according to this system, one church was not entitled to exercise jurisdiction over another; but each might give the other counsel or admonition, if they walked in a disorderly manner, or abandoned the capital truths of religion; and if the offending church did not receive the admonition, the others were to withdraw, and publicly disown them as a church of Christ. On the other hand, the powers of their church officers were confined within the narrow limits of their own society. The pastors of a church might not administer the sacrament of baptism or the Lord's supper to any but those of his own communion.

upon them from an administration that was not distinguished by its mildness and indulgence, retired into the Netherlands, and founded churches at Middleburg in Zealand, and at Amsterdam and Leyden, in the province of Holland; but their establishments were neither solid nor durable (b). Their founder returned into England, and, having renounced his principles of separation, took orders in the established church and obtained a benefice (c). The Puritan exiles, whom he thus abandoned, disagreed among themselves, divided into parties, and their affairs declined from day to day (d). This engaged the wiser part of them to mitigate the severity of their founder's plan, and to soften the rigour of his uncharitable decisions: and hence arose the community of the Independents, or Congregational Brethren, which still subsists, and are exceedingly numerous.

It has always been a question, much debated among Protestants, and more especially in England and Holland, where it excited great commotions and the power of deciding in religious matters properly belong? This controversy has been determined in favour of those, who maintain, that the power of deciding, in matters of religious doctrine, discipline, and government, is by the appointment of Christ himself, vested in the church, and therefore ought by no means to be entrusted with, or exercised by, the civil magistrate; while, at the same time, they grant, that it is the business of the latter to assist the church with his protection and advice, to convoke and preside in its synods and councils, to take care that the clergy do not attempt to carry on any thing that may be prejudicial to the interests of the state, and, by his authority, to confirm the validity and secure the execution of the ecclesiastical laws enacted by the church under his inspection. It is true, that from the time of Henry VIII. the kings of England consider themselves as supreme heads of the church, and that in relation to its spiritual, as well as its temporal concerns; and it is plain enough, that, on the strength of this important title, both Henry VIII. and his son Edward assumed an extensive authority and jurisdiction in the church, and looked upon their spiritual power, as equal to that which had been unworthily enjoyed by the Roman pontiff. But queen Elizabeth receded considerably from these high pretensions, and diminished the spiritual power of her successors, by declaring that the jurisdiction of the kings of England extended only to the ministers of religion, and not to religion itself; to the rulers of the church, and not to the church itself; or, in other words, that the persons of the clergy were alone subject to their civil authority. Accordingly, we see that the constitution of the church of England resembles perfectly that of the state, and that there is a striking analogy between the civil and ecclesiastical government established in that country. The clergy, consisting of the upper and lower houses of convocation, are immediately assembled by the archbishop of Canterbury, in consequence of an order from the sovereign, and propose in these meetings, by common consent, such measures as seem necessary to the well-being of the church; these measures are laid before the king and parliament, and derive from their approbation and authority the force of laws. But it must be acknowledged, that this matter has given occasion to much altercation and debate; nor has it been found easy to fix the extent of the jurisdiction and prerogative of these great bodies in a manner conformable to their respective pretensions, since the king and his council explain them in one way, and the clergy, more especially those who are zealous for the spiritual supremacy and independency of the church, understand them in another. The truth of the matter is plainly this, that the ecclesiastical polity in England has never acquired a stable and consistent form, nor been reduced to clear and certain principles. It has rather been carried on and administered by ancient custom and precedent, than defined and fixed by any regular system of laws and institutions.

If it was not an easy matter to determine in what hands the power of deciding affairs of a religious nature was to be lodged, it was no less difficult to fix the form of ecclesiastical government in which this power was to be administered. Many vehement disputes were kindled on this subject, which neither the lapse of time, nor the efforts of human wisdom, have been able to bring to an amicable issue. The dissensions, occasioned by these different schemes of ecclesiastical polity, were every way adapted to produce a violent schism in the church; and that so much the more, as each of the contending parties pretended to derive their respective plan from the injunctions of Christ and the practices of his disciples. And, in effect, it divided the English nation into two parties, who, during a long time, treated each other with great animosity and bitterness, and whose feuds, on many occasions, proved detrimental to the civil interests and prosperity of the nation. This schism, however, which did such mischief in England, was, by the prudence and piety of a few great and excellent divines, confined to that country, and prevented from either becoming universal, or interrupting the fraternal union that prevailed between the church of England and the Reformed churches abroad. The worthy men, that thus set bounds to the influence of these unhappy divisions, found great opposition made, by the suggestions of bigotry, to their charitable purpose. To maintain, however, the bonds of union between the episcopal church of England and the Presbyterian churches in foreign countries, they laid down the following maxim, which, though it be not universally adopted, tends nevertheless to the preservation of external concord among the Reformed, viz. "That Jesus Christ has left upon record no express injunctions with respect to the external form of government that is to be observed in his church; and, consequently, that every nation hath a right to establish such a form, as seemeth conducive to the interests, and suitable to the peculiar state, circumstances, and exigencies of the community, provided, that such an establishment be in no respect prejudicial to truth, or favourable to the revival of superstition (e)."

The Reformed church, from its very infancy, produced a great number of expositors of scripture, whose learned and excellent commentaries deserve a memorable place in the history of theological science. The exposition that Zuingle has given of the greatest part of the book of the New Testament is far from being destitute of merit (f). He was succeeded by Bullinger, Oecolampadius, and Musculus, and also by others, who, though inferior to these great men in erudition and genius, deserve nevertheless a certain degree of approbation and esteem. But the two divines who shone with a superior and unrivalled lustre in this learned list of sacred expositors, were John Calvin and Theodore Beza. The former composed an excellent commentary on almost all the books of Holy Writ; and the latter published a Latin Version of the New Testament, enriched with theological and critical observations, which has passed through many editions, and enjoys, at this day, a considerable part of the reputation and applause, with which it was crowned at its first appearance. It must be acknowledged to the honour of the greatest part of these commentators, that, wisely neglecting those allegorical significations and mystical meanings that the irregular fancies of former expositors had attributed to the terms of Holy Writ, they employed their whole diligence and industry in investigating the literal sense, the full energy of the words of scripture, in order to find out the true intention of the sacred writer. It must, however, be observed on the other hand, that some of these interpreters, and more especially Calvin, have been sharply censured for applying to the temporal state and circumstances of the Jews, several prophecies, that point to the Messiah and to the Christian dispensation in the most evident and palpable manner, and thus removing some of the most striking arguments in favour of the divinity of the Gospel.

(b) The British churches at Amsterdam and Middleburg were afterwards incorporated with the national Dutch church, and their pastors were members of the Dutch synod; by which means Brownism or Independency in those churches was done away. The church at Leyden, where Robinson had established a congregation of Independents, about the year 1595, was dispersed; and it is remarkable, that a part of this church went to North America, and laid the foundation of the colony of New England, where at present the Independents are by far the greater part of the inhabitants.

(c) Brown, in his new preferment, forgot not only the rigour of his principles, but also the gravity of his former morals; for he led a very idle and dissolute life. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 376.

(d) Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. chap. vi.—Hoornbeckii Sumana Controvers. lib. x. p. 738.—Fuller's Ecclesiastical History of Britain, book x. p. 168.

(e) This was the general opinion of the British divines that lived in the earliest period of the Reformation, and was first abandoned by archbishop Whitgift. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iii. p. 140.

(f) It was not only on the books of the New Testament that Zuingle employed his very learned and excellent labours. He expounded the book of Genesis, together with the twenty-four first chapters of Exodus, and gave new versions of the Book of Psalms, and of the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah.

The

The Reformed doctors of this century generally concluded their treatises of didactic theology with a delineation of the moral duties that are prescribed in the Gospel. This method was observed by Calvin, and was followed, out of respect for his example, by almost all the divines of his communion, who looked upon him as their model and their guide. This eminent man, towards the conclusion of his Institutes, speaks of the power of the magistrate, and ends of civil government; and in the last chapter gives the portraiture of the life and manners of a true Christian, but in a much more concise manner than the copiousness, dignity, and importance of the subject seemed to require. The progress of morality among the Reformed, was obstructed by the very same means that retarded its improvement among the Lutherans. It was neglected amidst the tumult of controversy; and while every pen was drawn to maintain certain systems of doctrine, few were employed in cultivating or promoting that noblest of all sciences, which has virtue, life, and manners for its objects.

This master-science, which Calvin and his associates had left in a crude and imperfect state, was first reduced into some kind of form, and explained with a certain degree of accuracy and precision, by William Perkins (g), an English divine, as the Reformed doctors universally allow. He was seconded in this laudable undertaking by Telingius, a native of Holland, whose writings were composed in the Dutch language. It was by a worthy and pious spirit of emulation, excited by the example of these two doctors, that William Ames, a native of Scotland and professor of divinity at Franeker (h), was engaged to compose a compleat Body of Christian Morality. These writers were succeeded by others, who still threw farther light on this important science.

It is very remarkable that those very doctors who animadverted with the greatest severity upon all those who dared to differ or dissent from any part of their theological system, thought proper, nevertheless, to behave with the greatest circumspection, and the most pacific spirit of mildness, in the amazingly long controversy that was carried on with such animosity between the Puritans on the one hand, and the abettors of episcopacy in England on the other. For if, on the one side, they could not but stand well affected to the Puritans, who were stedfast defenders of the discipline and sentiments of the Helvetic church; so, on the contrary, they were intimately connected with the episcopal doctors by the bonds of Christian communion and fraternal love. In this critical situation, their whole thoughts appear to have been turned towards reconciliation and peace; and they exhorted their brethren, the Puritans, to put on a spirit of meekness and forbearance towards the episcopal church, and not to break the bonds of charity and communion with its rulers or its members. Such indeed was the gentle spirit of the doctors in Switzerland towards the members of the church of England, notwithstanding the severe treatment the greatest part of the Reformed had received from that church, which constantly insisted on the divine origin of its government and discipline, though it must be allowed by every thinking person in the least acquainted with ecclesiastical history, that many of the ceremonies and forms made use of in the national church received their origin from the church of Rome, so that they scarcely allowed the other Reformed communities the privileges, or even the denomination, of a true church. This moderation of the Helvetic doctors was certainly the dictate of prudence. They did not think it expedient to contend with a generous and flourishing people, nor to incur the displeasure of a mighty queen, whose authority seemed to extend not only to her own dominions, but even to the United Provinces, which were situated in her neighbourhood, and were, in some measure, under her protection. Nor did the apprehensions of a general schism in the Reformed church contribute a little to render them meek, moderate, and pacific. It is one thing to punish and excommunicate a handful of weak and unsupported individuals, who attempt to disturb the tranquillity of the state by the introduction of opinions which, though neither highly absurd nor of dangerous consequence, have yet what may be termed the demerit of novelty; and another to irritate, or promote divisions in a flourishing church, which, though weakened more or less by intestine feuds, is yet both powerful and respectable in a high degree. Besides, the dispute between the church of England and the other Reformed churches did not, as yet, turn upon points of doctrine, but only on the rites of external worship and the form of ecclesiastical government. It is, however, to be observed, that, in process of time, nay, soon after the period now under consideration, certain religious doctrines were introduced into the debate between the two churches, that contributed much to widen the breach, and to cast the prospect of reconciliation at a distance.

All the Protestant divines of the Reformed church, whether Puritans or others, seemed indeed, hitherto, of one mind about the doctrines of faith. But, towards the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, there arose a party, which were first for softening, and then for overthrowing, the received opinions concerning Predestination, Perseverance, Free-will, Effectual Grace, and the extent of Christ's Redemption. The clergy of the episcopal church began to lean towards the notions concerning these intricate points, which Arminius propagated some time after this; while, on the other hand, the Puritans adhered rigorously to the system of Calvin. Several episcopal doctors remained attached to the same system, and all these abettors of Calvinism, whether episcopal or presbyterian, were called Doctrinal Puritans.

(g) Mr. William Perkins was born at Marston in Warwickshire, in the first year of queen Elizabeth, and educated in Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he was fellow. He was one of the famous practical writers and preachers of his age. His puritanical and non-conforming principles exposed him to the cognizance of the High Commission Court; but his peaceable behaviour and eminent reputation in the learned world, procured him an exemption from the persecutions that fell upon his brethren. His works, which were printed in three volumes folio, afford abundant proofs of his piety and industry, especially when it is considered that he died in the forty-fourth year of his age.

(h) Dr. William Ames was educated at Cambridge, under Mr. William Perkins; he fled from the persecution of archbishop Bancroft, and was invited by the states of Friesland to the divinity chair in the university of Franeker, which he filled with great reputation during the space of twelve years, after which he removed to Rotterdam, at the invitation of an English church there, and became their pastor. He was at the synod of Dort, and informed king James's ambassador at the Hague, from time to time, of the debates of that assembly. Besides his controversial writings against the Arminians, he published the following: "Medulla Theologiæ;" "Manuductio Logica;" "Cases of Conscience;" "Analysis on the Book of Psalms;" "Notes on the first and second Epistles of Peter," &c. These productions have great merit, considering the times in which they were written.

THE UNION OF THE TWO CROWNS OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND, CONTAINING

THE REIGNS OF JAMES I. CHARLES I. (THE COMMONWEALTH,) CHARLES II. JAMES II. AND WILLIAM III.

CHAPTER I.

JAMES I.

IT is remarkable that no country ever enjoyed greater tranquillity in her transmitting of a crown from father to son than England did when it passed from the family of Tudor to that of Stuart. During the whole reign of Elizabeth, men had been anxiously employed in persuading her to declare her successor; and when old age made the prospect of her death more immediate, there appeared none but James Stuart, king of Scots, who could advance any just claim or pretension to the throne. He was great-grandson of Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII.; and, on the failure of the male line, his hereditary right remained unquestionable. If the religion of Mary queen of Scots, and the other prejudices contracted against her, had formed any considerable obstacle to her succession; these objections, being entirely personal, had no place with regard to her son. Men also considered, that though the title, derived from blood, had been frequently violated since the Norman conquest, such licences had proceeded more from force or intrigue, than from any deliberate maxims of government. The lineal heir had still in the end prevailed; and both his exclusion and restoration had been commonly attended with such convulsions as were sufficient to warn all prudent men not lightly to give way to such irregularities. If the will of Henry VIII. authorized by act of parliament, had tacitly excluded the Scottish line; the tyranny and caprices of that monarch had been so signal, that a settlement of this nature, unsupported by any just reason, had no authority with the generality of the people. Queen Elizabeth too, with her dying breath, had recognized the title of her kinsman James; and the whole nation seemed to dispose themselves with joy and pleasure for his reception. It is, however, certain, that it was to the nomination of Elizabeth that he owed his peaceable ascent to the throne. This princess, by a long reign of forty-four years, and many favourable concurring circumstances, had gained an entire ascendency over the hearts and opinions of her subjects, notwithstanding that, during the course of her government, she had exerted very arbitrary principles of sovereignty; to which she was enabled, by the yet cherished notion of royal prerogative, and the continuation of the same religious factions which had supported a like exertion in the reign of her father Henry VIII. and her sister Mary. Though born and educated amidst a foreign and hostile people, it was hoped that he would embrace the maxims of an English monarch; and some people thought they foresaw greater advantages resulting from an union with Scotland, than disadvantages from submitting to a prince of that nation. The alacrity with which the English looked toward the successor, had appeared so evident to Elizabeth, that, concurring with other causes, it affected her with the deepest melancholy; and that princess, whose penetration and experience had given her the greatest insight into human affairs, had not yet sufficiently weighed the ingratitude of courtiers and levity of the people.

As victory abroad, and tranquillity at home, had generally attended this princess, she left the nation in such flourishing circumstances, that her successor possessed every advantage, except that of comparison with her illustrious name, when he mounted the throne of England. Six hours after Elizabeth's decease, James was proclaimed as king. The people were impatient to behold their new sovereign, and their sovereign was no less eager to take possession of his new dignity. The king's journey from Edinburgh to London immediately followed the joyful news of his accession (a). This circumstance afforded to the inquisitive some circumstances of comparison, which even the natural partiality in favour of their new sovereign could not interpret to his advantage. As he passed along, all ranks of men flocked about him, from every quarter, allured by idleness, interest, or curiosity. Great were the rejoicings, and loud the acclamations which resounded from all sides; and every one could remember how the affability and popular manners of their queen displayed themselves amidst such concourse and exultation of her subjects. But James, though sociable and familiar with his friends and courtiers, hated the bustle of a mixed multitude; and though extremely fond of flattery, yet was he still fonder of tranquillity and ease. He issued therefore a proclamation, forbidding this resort of people, on pretence of the scarcity of provisions, and other inconveniences, which, he said, would necessarily attend it. This ignorance, however, of the laws of England, and the high idea he had conceived of his present power by the arbitrary proceedings of his predecessors, made him, upon his arrival at Newark, guilty of the absurd violence of hanging a thief without form or trial. His severity was soon after exercised on Valentine Thomas, of whom he had complained to Elizabeth that he had calumniated his conduct. This unfortunate man was in prison on this account, at the time of James's accession; who immediately brought him to a trial, and obtained a verdict against him, on pretence of a conspiracy against Elizabeth and some of her council.

(a) The following is a curious passage in a letter which James wrote from Edinburgh to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, on hearing that he had been proclaimed king. "Do all whatsoever things you shall find necessary or expedient for the good government of the said city in execution of justice, as you have been used to do in our dearest sister's time, till our pleasure be known unto you to the contrary." MSS. in Br. Museum, fol. 7021. no. 23.

He

He was not, however, insensible to the great flow of affection which appeared in his new subjects; and he seems to have been in haste to make them some return of kindness and good offices. To this motive, probably, we are to ascribe that profusion of titles, which was observed in the beginning of his reign; when, in six weeks time (from April 6 to May 20) after his entrance into the kingdom, he is computed to have bestowed knighthood on no less than two hundred and thirty-seven persons. If Elizabeth's frugality of honours, as well as of money, had formerly been repined at, it began now to be valued and esteemed; and every one was sensible that the king, by his lavish and premature conferring of favours, had failed of obliging the persons on whom he bestowed them. Titles of all kinds became so common, that they were scarcely marks of distinction; and being distributed, without choice or deliberation, to persons unknown to the prince, were regarded more as the proofs of an easy disposition, than of any fixed friendship or esteem (b).

We may presume, that the English would have thrown less blame on the king's facility in bestowing favours, had these been confined entirely to their own nation, and had not been shared out, in too unequal proportions, to his Scottish subjects. James, who, through his whole reign, was more guided by temper and inclination than by the rules of political prudence, had brought with him great numbers of his Scottish courtiers; whose impatience and importunity were apt, in many particulars, to impose on the easy nature of their master, and to extort favours, of which, it is natural to imagine, his English subjects would loudly complain. The duke of Lenox, the earl of Marre, lord Hume, lord Kinloss, sir George Hume, secretary Elphinstone, were immediately added to the English privy council. Sir George Hume, whom he created earl of Dunbar, was his declared favourite as long as that nobleman lived. Hay, some time after, was created viscount Doncaster, then earl of Carlisle, and got an immense fortune from the crown; all of which he spent in a splendid and courtly manner. Ramsey obtained the title of earl of Holderness; and many others, being raised on a sudden to the highest elevation, increased, by their insolence, that envy, which naturally attended them, as strangers and ancient enemies.

Yet it must be owned, that James left almost all the chief offices in the hands of Elizabeth's ministers, and trusted the conduct of political concerns, both foreign and domestic, to his English subjects. Among these, secretary Cecil, whom he created successively lord Effingdon, viscount Cranborne, and earl of Salisbury, was always regarded as his prime minister and chief counsellor. Though the capacity and penetration of this minister were sufficiently known, his favour with the king created surprize on the accession of that monarch. Cecil was naturally odious to James on account of his father's hatred to Mary, and his own opposition to James's partizan, the earl of Essex, who had recently been executed: but the secret correspondence into which he had entered with James during the latter years of Elizabeth's life, and which had sensibly contributed to the easy reception of that prince in England, laid the foundation of Cecil's credit; and while all his former associates, sir Walter Raleigh (c), lord Grey, lord Cobham, were discountenanced on account of their animosity against Essex, as well as for other reasons, this minister was continued in employment, and treated with the greatest confidence and regard.

The capacity of James and his ministers in negociation was immediately put to trial, on the appearance of ambassadors from almost all the princes and states of Europe, in order to congratulate him on his accession, and to form with him new treaties and alliances. Beside ministers from Venice, Denmark, the Palatinate; Henry Frederic of Nassau, assisted by Barnevelt the pensionary of Holland, was ambassador from the States of the United Provinces. Aremberg was sent by Archduke Albert; and Taxis was expected in a little time from Spain. But he who most excited the attention of the public, both on account of his own merit and that of his master, was the marquis of Rosni, afterwards duke of Sully (d), prime minister and favourite of Henry IV. of France.

When the dominions of the house of Austria devolved on Philip II. all Europe was struck with terror, lest the power of a family, which had been raised by fortune, should now be carried to an immeasurable height, by the wisdom and conduct of this monarch. But never were apprehensions found in the event to be more groundless. Slow without prudence, ambitious without enterprize, false without deceiving any body, and refined without any true judgement; such was the character of Philip, and such the character which, during his life-time, and after his death, he impressed on the Spanish councils. Revolted or depopulated provinces, discontented or indolent inhabitants, were the spectacles which those dominions, lying in every climate of the globe, presented to Philip III. a weak prince, and to the duke of Lerma, a minister weak and odious. But though military discipline, which still remained, was what alone gave some appearance of life and vigour to that languishing body; yet so great was the terror produced by former power and ambition, that the reduction of the house of Austria was the object of men's vows throughout all the states of Christendom. It was not perceived, that the French empire, now united in domestic peace, and governed by the most heroic and most amiable prince that adorns modern history, was become, of itself, a sufficient counterpoise to the Spanish greatness. Perhaps, that prince himself did not perceive it, when he proposed, by his minister Rosni, a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crowns; in order to attack the Austrian dominions on every side, and depress the exorbitant power of that ambitious family. But the genius of the English monarch was not equal to such vast enterprizes. The love of peace was one of his ruling passions; and it was his peculiar felicity, that the conjunctures of the times rendered the same object which was agreeable to him, in the highest degree advantageous to his people.

The French ambassador, therefore, departed from these extensive views, and concerted with James the means of providing for the safety of the United Provinces: nor was this object altogether without its difficulties. The king, before his accession, had entertained scruples with regard to the revolt of the Low Countries; and he had, on many occasions, gone so far as to give to the Dutch the appellation of rebels: but having conversed more fully with English ministers and courtiers, he found their attachment to that republic so strong, and their opinion of common interest so established, that he was obliged to sacrifice to politics his idea of justice; a quality which, even when erroneous, is respectable as well as rare in a monarch. He therefore agreed with Rosni to support secretly the states-general, in concert with the king of France; lest their weakness and despair should oblige them to submit to their old master, the king of Spain. The articles of the treaty were few and simple. It was stipulated, that the two kings should allow the Dutch to levy forces in their respective dominions; and should underhand remit to that republic the sum of one million four hundred thousand livres a year for the pay of these forces: that the whole sum should be advanced by the king of France; but that the third of it should be deducted from the debt due by him to queen Elizabeth. And if the Spaniard attacked either of the princes, they agreed to assist each other; Henry with a force of ten thousand men, James with that of six.

During this great tranquillity, both foreign and domestic, with which the nation was blessed, nothing could be more surprising than the discovery of a conspiracy to subvert the government, and to fix on the throne Arabella Stuart, the king's consin-german by the family of Lenox, and descended equally from Henry VII. Every thing remains still mysterious in this conspiracy; and history can give us no clue to unravel it. Watson and Clarke, two Catholic priests, were accused of the plot; lord Grey, a Puritan; lord Cobham, a thoughtless man, of no fixed principle; and sir Walter Raleigh, suspected to be of that philosophical sect, who were then extremely rare in England, and who have since received the appellation of Free-thinkers: together with these, Mr. George Broke, brother to lord Cobham, sir Griffin Markham, Mr. Copeley, sir Edward Parham. What cement could unite men of such discordant principles in so dangerous a combination; what end they proposed, or what means proportioned to an undertaking of this nature, has never yet been explained, and cannot easily be imagined. As Raleigh, Grey, and Cobham were commonly believed, after the queen's death, to have opposed proclaiming the king, till conditions should be made with him; they were upon that account extremely hateful to the court and ministry; and people were apt, at first, to suspect, that the plot was merely a contrivance of secretary Cecil, to get rid of his old confederates, now become his inveterate enemies. And though no one could find any marks of a concerted enterprize, it appeared that men of furious and ambitious spirits, meeting frequently together, and believing all the world discontented like themselves, had entertained very criminal projects, and had even entered, some of them at least, into a correspondence with Aremberg, the Flemish ambassador, in order to give disturbance to the new settlement.

The two priests and Broke were executed, the former on the 29th of November, the latter on the 5th of December: Cobham, Grey, and Markham, were pardoned on the 9th of December, after they had laid their heads upon the block. Raleigh too was reprieved, not pardoned; and he remained in confinement many years afterwards.

It appears from Sully's Memoirs, that Raleigh secretly offered his services to the French ambassador; and it had been presumed, that meeting with a repulse from that quarter, he had recourse, for the same unwarrantable purposes, to the Flemish minister: but it must be confessed, that, on his trial, there appeared no proof of this transaction, nor indeed any circumstance which could justify his condemnation. It has been asserted that he was accused by Cobham alone, in a sudden fit of passion, upon hearing that Raleigh, when examined, had pointed out some circumstances, by which Cobham's guilt might be known and ascertained (e). Upon such evidence was sir Walter Raleigh, contrary to all law and equity, found guilty by the jury. His name was at this time extremely odious in England; and every man was pleased to give sentence against the capital enemy of Essex, the favourite of the people.

Sir Edward Coke, the famous lawyer, then attorney-general, managed the cause for the crown, and threw out on Raleigh such gross abuse, as may be deemed a great reflection, not only on his own memory, but even, in some degree, on the manners of the age. Traitor, monster, viper, and spider of hell, are the terms which he employs against one of the most illustrious men of the kingdom, who was under trial for life and fortune, and who defended himself with great temper, eloquence, and courage.

The next occupation of the king, in the beginning of 1604, was entirely according to his heart's desire. But of all the qualities which marked the character of James, there was none more contemptible than a pedantic disposition, which he had attained from a narrow, though laborious, education. Some school-learning he had, the fruits of that unwearied application which is often united to mean parts; of that learning he was ridiculously vain: his vanity too was greatly heightened by the flattery which he had met with from the minions of the English court; and he was eager for an opportunity of displaying his fancied erudition to the whole nation.

Though the severities of Elizabeth towards the Catholics had much weakened that party, whose genius was opposite to the prevailing spirit of the nation; like severities had not operated so powerfully on the Puritans, who were encouraged by that spirit, that no less than seven hundred and fifty clergymen of that party signed a petition to the king on his accession to the throne for a reformation of sundry articles of religion; and many more seemed willing to adhere to it. They all hoped that James, having received his education in Scotland, and having sometimes professed an attachment to the church established there, would at least abate the rigour of the laws enacted in support of the ceremonies, and against Puritans; if he did not shew more particular grace and encouragement to that sect; but the king's disposition had taken strongly a contrary bias. He greatly disliked the puritanical clergy; for he had remarked in their Scottish brethren a violent turn towards republicanism and a zealous attachment to civil liberty; principles nearly allied to that religious system which they professed. He found, that they were so far from being fearful in disputation, or in discourse, that they boldly maintained their tenets against all opponents, and even supposed that they used greater freedoms with him than they ought to have done. Though he had often met with resistance and faction and obstinacy in the Scottish nobility, he retained no ill will to that order; or rather shewed them favour and kindness in England, beyond what reason and sound policy could well justify: but the ascendant which the presbyterian clergy had assumed over him, was what his monarchical pride could never thoroughly digest (f).

He dreaded likewise the popularity which attended this order of men in both kingdoms; for they were esteemed by all their followers as men of sanctity and virtue. Strongly inclined himself to mirth and wine and sports of all kinds, he apprehended their censure for his manner of life. And, being thus averse, from temper, as well as policy, to the sect of Puritans, he was resolved, if possible, to prevent its farther growth in England.

Though justly sensible, that no part of civil administration required greater care or nicer judgement than the conduct of religious parties; James had not perceived, that, in the same proportion as this practical knowledge of theology is requisite, the speculative refinements in it are mean and even dangerous in a monarch. By entering zealously into frivolous disputes, James gave them an air of importance and dignity which they could not otherwise have acquired; and being himself enlisted in the quarrel, he could no longer have recourse to contempt and ridicule, which by some are esteemed the only proper method of appeasing it. The church of England had not yet abandoned the doctrines of grace and predestination: the Puritans had not yet separated themselves from the church, nor openly renounced episcopacy. Though the spirit of the parties was considerably different, the only appearing subjects of dispute were concerning the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage, the use of the surplice, and bowing at the name of Jesus. These were the mighty questions which were solemnly agitated in the conference at Hampton-court, on the 4th of January, 1604, between some bishops and dignified clergymen on the one hand, and some leaders of the puritanical party on the other.

James, however, gave the Puritans hopes of an impartial debate, though he mortally hated all the reformers for the restraints they had laid upon him in his Scotch government; restraints which were altogether incompatible with that fond idea he had entertained of monarchical power. In this debate James was to preside as judge; but from judge he turned principal disputant, silencing all opposition by his authority and loquacity. The Puritans therefore, with great justice, complained of a partial and unfair management of the dispute; the king, from the beginning of the conference, shewed the strongest propensity to the established church, and frequently inculcated a maxim, which should be received with great limitations: "No Bishop, No King." The bishops, in their turn, were very liberal of their praises towards the royal disputant; the lord chancellor Egerton cried out, "He had often heard that the royalty and priesthood were united, but never saw it verified till now." And Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, said, that, "undoubtedly his majesty spake by the special assistance of God's Spirit." A few alterations in the liturgy, however, were agreed to, and both parties separated with mutual dissatisfaction.

It had frequently been the practice of the Puritans to form certain assemblies, which they called prophesyings;

(e) Lord Cobham had been betrayed into an accusation of Raleigh; but, on a fit of sickness, he wrote the following letter to him: "Seeing myself so near my end, for the discharge of my conscience, and freeing myself from your blood, which else will cry vengeance against me, I protest upon my salvation I never practised with Spain by your procurement. God so comfort me in this my affliction, as you are a true subject for any thing I know. I will say as Pilate, Purus sum à sanguine hujus. So God have mercy on my soul as I know no treason by you."—This letter was produced in court by Raleigh: but his enemies brought a written evidence, contradictory to the sense of this letter, signed by lord Cobham. Raleigh desired his accuser might be brought face to face; this was denied, his defence over-ruled, and the jury, after a quarter of an hour's consultation, brought him in guilty. Cobham afterwards declared, that his name to that letter on which Raleigh was condemned, was fraudulently obtained. State Trials, vol. i. p. 183. Sir Anthony Welden's Court of King James, 1651, p. 36. Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 629.

(f) James ventured to say in his Basilicon Doron, published while he was in Scotland: "I protest before the great God, and since I am here as upon my Testament, it is no place for me to lie in, that ye shall never find with any Highland or Borderer Thieves, greater ingratitude and more lies and vile perjuries, than with these fanatic spirits: and suffer not the principal of them to brook your land." King James's Works, p. 161.

He was not, however, insensible to the great flow of affection which appeared in his new subjects; and he seems to have been in haste to make them some return of kindness and good offices. And Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, said, that, "undoubtedly his majesty spake by the special assistance of God's Spirit." A few alterations in the liturgy, however, were agreed to, and both parties separated with mutual dissatisfaction.

It had frequently been the practice of the Puritans to form certain assemblies, which they called prophesyings;

(e) Lord Cobham had been betrayed into an accusation of Raleigh; but, on a fit of sickness, he wrote the following letter to him: "Seeing myself so near my end, for the discharge of my conscience, and freeing myself from your blood, which else will cry vengeance against me, I protest upon my salvation I never practised with Spain by your procurement. God so comfort me in this my affliction, as you are a true subject for any thing I know. I will say as Pilate, Purus sum à sanguine hujus. So God have mercy on my soul as I know no treason by you."—This letter was produced in court by Raleigh: but his enemies brought a written evidence, contradictory to the sense of this letter, signed by lord Cobham. Raleigh desired his accuser might be brought face to face; this was denied, his defence over-ruled, and the jury, after a quarter of an hour's consultation, brought him in guilty. Cobham afterwards declared, that his name to that letter on which Raleigh was condemned, was fraudulently obtained. State Trials, vol. i. p. 183. Sir Anthony Welden's Court of King James, 1651, p. 30. Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 629.

(f) James ventured to say in his Basilicon Doron, published while he was in Scotland: "I protest before the great God, and since I am here as upon my Testament, it is no place for me to lie in, that ye shall never find with any Highland or Borderer Thieves, greater ingratitude and more lies and vile perjuries, than with these fanatic spirits: and suffer not the principal of them to brook your land." King James's Works, p. 161.

where they displayed their zeal in prayers and exhortations, by which means they acquired great boldness and method in speaking, as might be expected from the mutual emulation which arose in those trials of religious eloquence. Such societies had been suppressed by Elizabeth; and the ministers in this conference moved the king for their revival. But James closed his many arguments with these powerful ones: "If you aim at a Scottish presbytery, it agrees as well with monarchy as God and the devil. There Jack and Tom and Will and Dick shall meet and censure me and my council. Therefore I reiterate my former speech: Le Roi s'avisera. Stay, I pray, for one seven years before you demand; and then, if you find me grow pursie and fat, I may perchance hearken unto you. For that government will keep me in breath, and give me work enough." Such were the political considerations which determined the king in his choice among religious parties (g).

Two proclamations followed this important decision of the new monarch; one commanding all jesuits and priests that had orders from any foreign power to depart the kingdom; the other enjoining the Puritans to conform to the established church. In the spirit of the one, James plainly evinced that his sole objection to the popish tenets was their not allowing his supremacy: he intimated in it that he would have a regard for the tender consciences of those that could not comply with the church. That against the Puritans banished all hopes of a like indulgence (h).

James now tasted of all the enjoyments he most affected; surrounded with flatterers, he snuffed up continually the incense of his own praise (i). With the reputation of business he indulged his passion for idleness. He affected to decide, by his judgement, all affairs both civil and religious; yet devoted his whole time to amusement. His days were spent in hunting or idle composition; his evenings in all the variety of entertainments which the ingenuity of the queen his wife could procure him. Of the Scotch gentry, those that followed the court, or were attached to the hierarchy, imitated much the levity and freedom of French manners: on the contrary, those who were attached to puritanism affected severity and reserve. The present fortune and favour of James gave many of the first an opportunity of indulging their taste in a more expensive manner than the narrowness of their former circumstances would admit (k). This humour coincided exactly with that of their prince.

Among the number of proclamations that were continually issued from royal authority, there was one which ordained an annual festival in remembrance of the king's deliverance from the famous Gowry conspiracy; which we have mentioned under the reign of Elizabeth. This was a compliment which the Scotch presbytery had denied him, under the mortifying pretence of not confiding enough in his veracity to be certain of its reality.

The time for the expected meeting of the parliament now approached. A proclamation which came out with the writs was remarkable for the fairness of its aspect, and the perniciousness of its tendency: prohibitions which interfered with the subjects' right of electing, were veiled with an appearance of candour which shaded their consequences from the eyes of the ignorant (l).

On the nineteenth of March, the great council of the nation met. James was determined to shine in the double capacity of king and orator, and addressed the assembly in a copious harangue. After having thrown out many hints concerning the sufficient right he had attained from his title; he expressed his satisfaction for the cordial reception he had received from his subjects, on his first entry into his new kingdom. "Shall I ever, said he, nay, can I ever be able, or rather so unable, in memory, as to forget your unexpected readiness and alacrity, your ever memorable resolution, and your most wonderfull conjunction and harmony of your hearts, in declaring and embracing me as your undoubted and lawfull king and governour? or shall it ever be blotted out of my mind, how at my first entry into this kingdom, the people of all sorts rid and ran, nay rather flew to meet me: their eyes flaming nothing but sparkles of affection; their mouths and tongues uttering nothing but sounds of joy; their hands, feet, and all the rest of their members, in their gestures discovering a passionate longing and earnestness to meet and embrace their new sovereign." He then expatiated on the manifold blessings England had received in his person, which would make their measure of happiness full, if the two nations were united in one kingdom. "He was the husband, he said, and the whole island his lawful wife; and he hoped no one was so unreasonable as to think that a Christian king under the Gospel should be a polygamist, and husband two wives." He opened to them his opinion and intentional conduct towards the Papists and Dissenters. "He acknowledged the Roman Catholic to be the mother church, though defiled by some impuritys. He did not wish the doun throwing of the temple, but that it might be purged and cleansed from corruption; he had not, like Rehoboam, increased their burdens, but lightened them, as much as time, occasion, or law, could permit; and was even then considering how some overtures might be proposed to the present parliament, to lighten the burden of laws against them. He would be content, for his part, to meet them half way, so that all novelties might be renounced on both sides. As to the sects of Puritans and Novellists, being impatient of superiority, they were unsufferable in any well-governed commonwealth; his course towards them he remitted to his proclamation made on that subject."

This speech, which was tediously prolix, did not gain the applause, nor produce the satisfaction which James expected; or rather it dissatisfied every body. The Roman Catholics were not content with his distinctions, though he had hinted that his only objection to their faith was the single tenet of allegiance to the pope. The Puritans, a then numerous sect in England, were exasperated at his branding them as a pestilent set of people destructive to the common-weal. The Protestants in general disliked his favourable declarations to the Papists, and the whole nation was offended at the hints he threw out towards an union with Scotland.

After a recognition of the king's title, the first motion of the commons was for the redress of grievances. The following ones, as the most notorious, were enumerated by sir Robert Wroth: the wardships of men's children a burthen and servitude to the subjects of this kingdom: the general abuse and grievance of purveyors and cart-takers: particular and private patents, commonly called monopolies (m): dispensations in penal statutes: transportations of ordnance (n): abuses of the exchequer.

In a conference (o) with the lords on a project to petition

(g) James began the conference at Hampton Court by exclaiming against the Scotch church. "Blessed be God's gracious goodness, said he, who hath brought me into the promised land; where religion is purely professed; where I sit amongst grave, reverend, and learned men; not as before elsewhere, a king without state, without honour, without order, where beardless boys would brave us to our face." There were no small reasons for James's zeal for the English hierarchy. Many of the prelates complimented him with unlimited power; while the dissenters hampered him with the doctrines of law and conscience. After he had answered the objections urged by the presbyterian ministers with the same logic as may be found in the specimens already mentioned, he added, "If this be all your party hath to say, I will make them conform themselves, or else I will harrie them out of the land, or else do worse, only hang them, that's all."

(h) The Puritans about this time suffered so severe a persecution, that they were driven to offer a petition for relief to the king whilst he was taking the diversion of hunting. James was something startled at this unexpected intrusion, and very graciously directed them to depute ten of their members to declare their grievances to the council. These deputies no sooner made their appearance before the council, than they were sent to jail; and sir Francis Hastings, sir Edward Mongue, and sir Valentine Knightly, under whose protection they had thus acted, were turned out of the lieutenancy of the county and the commission of the peace. Winwood's Memorials, 1725, vol. ii. p. 36, 48.

(i) He was extolled as the Solomon of the age, and was the first king of England flattered with the absurd title of Sacred Majesty.

(k) The first disgust which James gave his English subjects, was the profusion of favours that he bestowed on his Scotch followers.

(l) The meeting of this parliament had been long delayed on account of the plague, which had broken out in London, and raged with so much violence that upwards of thirty thousand persons are computed to have died of it in a year; though the city contained at that time little more than one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants.

(m) On the subject of monopolies, it was ordered by the lower house, "That those which find just cause of grievance should bring in their complaints in writing, to the end they might be understood and considered of by the committees; and a law framed thereupon according to the cause."

(n) This article, which brought in the crown an income of three thousand pounds a year, had been often represented by the commons, during the administration of Elizabeth, as a great grievance to the nation, by supplying their enemies the Spaniards with these tremendous arms on easy terms.

(o) In this conference was flung out an extraordinary argument for this time; "That a people may be without a king, a king cannot be without a people." Journals of the House of Commons, vol. i. p. 156.

the king for leave to take into consideration a recompence to be given in exchange for wardships (p), the lords heartily joined in the cause, and recommended to them to comprize in the petition, purveyorship, licence of alienation, respite of homage, and other burthens, which stretched prerogative had made intolerable.

In former periods of the English government, the house of commons was of so small weight in the balance of the constitution, that little attention had been given, either by the crown, the people, or the house itself, to the choice and continuance of the members. It had been usual, after parliaments were prolonged beyond one session, for the chancellor to exert a discretionary authority of issuing new writs to supply the place of any members whom he judged incapable of attending, either on account of their employment, their sickness, or other impediment. This practice gave that minister, and consequently the prince, an unlimited power of modelling at pleasure the representatives of the nation; yet so little jealousy had it created, that the commons, of themselves, without any court influence or intrigue, and contrary to some former votes of their own, confirmed it in the twenty-third of Elizabeth (q). At that time, though some members, whose places had been supplied on account of sickness, having now recovered their health, appeared in the house, and claimed their seat; such was the authority of the chancellor, that, merely out of respect to him, his sentence was adhered to, and the new members were continued in their places. Here a most dangerous prerogative was conferred on the crown: but to shew the genius of that age, or rather the channels in which power then ran, the crown put very little value on this authority; insomuch that two days afterwards, the chancellor, of himself, resigned it back to the commons, and gave them power to judge of a particular vacancy in their house. And when the question concerning the chancellor's new writs was again brought on the carpet towards the end of the session, the commons were so little alarmed at the precedent, that, though they readmitted some old members, whose seats had been vacated on account of slight indispositions, yet they confirmed the chancellor's sentence, in instances where the distemper appeared to have been dangerous and incurable (r). Nor did they proceed any farther in vindication of their privileges, than to vote, "that during the sitting of parliament, there do not, at any time, any writ go out for chusing or returning any member without the warrant of the house." In Elizabeth' reign we may remark, and the reigns preceding, sessions of parliament were not usually the twelfth part so long as the vacations; and during the latter, the chancellor's power, if he pleased to exert it, was confirmed, at least left, by this vote, as unlimited and unrestrained as ever.

In a subsequent parliament, the absolute authority of the queen was exerted in a manner still more open; and began for the first time to give alarm to the commons. New writs having been issued by the chancellor when there was no vacancy, and a controversy arising upon that incident, the queen sent a message to the house, informing them, that it were impertinent for them to deal in such matters. These questions, she said, belonged only to the chancellor; and she had appointed him to confer with the judges, in order to settle all disputes with regard to elections. The commons had the courage, a few days after, to vote, "That it was a most perilous precedent, where two knights of a county were duly elected, if any new writ should issue out for a second election, without order of the house itself; that the discussing and adjudging of this and such like differences belonged only to the house; and that there should be no message sent to the lord chancellor, not so much as to inquire what he had done in the matter, because it was conceived to be a matter derogatory to the power and privilege of the house." This is the most considerable, and almost only instance, of parliamentary liberty, which occurs during the reign of that princess.

Outlaws, whether on account of debts or crimes, had been declared by the judges (s) incapable of enjoying a seat in the house, where they must themselves be lawgivers; but this opinion of the judges had been frequently over-ruled. I find, however, in the case of Vaughan (t), who was questioned for an outlawry, that, having proved all his debts to have been contracted by suretiship, and to have been, most of them, honestly compounded, he was allowed, on account of these favourable circumstances, to keep his seat; which plainly supposes that, otherwise, it would have been vacated, on account of the outlawry (u).

When James summoned this parliament, he issued a proclamation (v); in which, among many general advices, he strictly enjoins the people not to chuse any outlaw for their representative. And he adds; "If any person take upon him the place of knight, citizen, or burgess, not being duly elected, according to the laws and statutes in that behalf provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this our proclamation, then every person so offending to be fined or imprisoned for the same." A proclamation here was plainly put on the same footing with a law, and that in so delicate a point as the right of elections: most alarming circumstances, had there not been reason to believe that this measure, being entered into so early in the king's reign, proceeded more from precipitation and mistake, than from any serious design of invading the privileges of parliament.

Sir Francis Goodwin was chosen member for the county of Bucks; and his return, as usual, was made into chancery. The chancellor, pronouncing him an outlaw, vacated his seat, and issued writs for a new election. Sir John Fortescue, an old servant of the crown and favourite with the ministry, was chosen in his place. But the first act of the house was, to reverse the chancellor's sentence, and restore sir Francis to his seat. At the king's suggestion, the lords desired a conference on the subject; but were absolutely refused by the commons, as the question entirely regarded their own privileges. This occasioned expostulations between the king and the commons. The king said, "He was loath to alter his tune, and that he should now change it into matter of grief by way of contestation. He did sample it to the murmurs of the children of Israel. He did not attribute the cause of his grief to any purpose in the house to offend him, but only to a mistaking of the law. He had no purpose to impeach their privileges; but since they derived all matters of privilege from him, and by his grant, he expected that they should not be turned against him. That there were no precedents did suit this case fully: precedents in the times of minors, of tyrants, of women, of simple kings, not to be credited, because for some private ends. That by the law, the house of commons ought not to meddle with returns, being all made into the chancery, and to be corrected or reformed by that court alone (w)."

The debates of the commons on this subject were spirited. It was said by one member, that there was just fear of some great abuse in the late election: that the king had been misinformed: that he had too many misinformers: that now the case of sir John Fortescue and sir Francis Goodwin was become the case of the whole kingdom: that old lawyers forget, and commonly interpret the law according to the time: that by such a course the free election of the country was taken away, and none would from henceforth be chosen but such as should please the king and council. "Let us therefore, adds he, with fortitude, understanding, and sincerity, seek to maintain our privilege, which cannot be taken or construed any contempt in us; but merely a maintenance of our common right; that right which our ancestors have left us, and is just and fit for us to transmit to posterity." "We should taint ourselves with three great blemishes, said another member, if we should alter our judgement; levity, cruelty, and cowardice. No court can reform their own judgement. Every act that passeth this house is an act of parliament. Shall justice float up and down? shall he be a member to-day, and shall we tear him off to-morrow? Let sir Francis Goodwin stand as he is. Duty and courage

(p) The Commons appealed to the laws of nature and reason for the equitableness of their demand in respect to wardships. "It is but a restitution, said they, of the original right of all men by the laws of God and nature; which is, that children should be brought up by their parents and next of kin, and by them to be directed in their marriage." (u) In a subsequent parliament, that of the 35th of the queen, the commons, after great debate, expressly voted, that a person outlawed might be elected. D'Ewes, p. 518. But as the matter had been much contested, the king might think the vote of the house no law, and might esteem his own decision of more weight than theirs. We may also suppose that he was not acquainted with this vote. Queen Elizabeth, in her speech to her last parliament, complained of their admitting outlaws, and represents that conduct of the house as a great abuse.

may stand together: let not the house be inveigled by suggestion; this may be called a quo warranto to seize all our liberties." "A chancellor," added another member, "by this course, may call a parliament, consisting of what persons he pleases. Any suggestion, by any person, may be the cause of sending a new writ. It is come to this plain question, Whether the chancery or parliament ought to have authority?"

Notwithstanding this watchful spirit of liberty, which now appeared in the commons, their deference for majesty was so great, that they appointed a committee to confer with the judges before the king and council. There the question of law began to appear, in James's eyes, a little more doubtful than he had hitherto imagined it; and in order to extricate himself with some appearance of honour, he proposed that both Goodwin and Fortescue should be set aside, and a fresh writ be issued, by warrant of the house, for a new election. Goodwin gave his consent, and the commons embraced the expedient (x); but in such a manner, that they secured for the future the free possession of their seats, and the right which they claimed, of judging solely in their own elections and returns.

A power like this, so essential to the exercise of all their other powers, themselves so essential to public liberty, cannot fairly be deemed an encroachment in the commons; but must be regarded as an inherent privilege, happily rescued from that ambiguity which the negligence of some former parliaments had thrown upon it.

About this period, the minds of men throughout Europe, especially in England, seem to have undergone a general, but insensible revolution. Though letters had been revived in the preceding age, they were chiefly cultivated by those of sedentary professions; nor had they, till now, begun to spread themselves, in any degree, among men of the world. Arts, both mechanical and liberal, were every day receiving great improvements. Navigation had extended itself over the whole globe. Travelling was rendered secure, and more agreeable than it had been in former times; and the general system of politics in Europe was become more enlarged and comprehensive.

In consequence of this universal fermentation, the ideas of men enlarged themselves on every side; and the several constituent parts of the Gothic governments, which seem to have lain long inactive, began, every where, to operate and encroach on each other. On the continent, where the necessity of discipline had begotten standing armies, the princes commonly established an unlimited authority, and overpowered, by force or intrigue, the liberties of the people. In England, the love of freedom, which, unless checked, flourishes extremely in all liberal nations, acquired new force, and was regulated by more enlarged views, suitably to that cultivated understanding, which became, every day, more common among men of birth and education. A familiar acquaintance with the precious remains of antiquity excited, in every generous breast, a passion for a limited constitution, and begat an emulation of those manly virtues, which the Greek and Roman authors, by such animating examples, as well as pathetic expressions, recommend to our most serious consideration. The severe though popular government of Elizabeth had confined this rising spirit within very narrow bounds; but when a new and a foreign family succeeded to the throne, and a prince less dreaded and less beloved, symptoms immediately appeared of a more free and independent genius in the nation.

Happily this prince possessed neither sufficient capacity to perceive the alteration, nor sufficient art and vigour to check it in its early advances. Jealous of regal, because conscious of little personal authority, he had established within his own mind a speculative system of absolute government, which few of his subjects, he believed, and none but traitors and rebels, would make any scruple to admit. On whichever side he cast his eye, every thing concurred to encourage his prejudices. When he compared himself with the other hereditary sovereigns of Europe, he imagined, that as he bore the same rank, he was entitled to equal prerogatives; not considering the innovations lately introduced by them, and the military force by which their authority was supported. In England, that power, almost unlimited, which had been exercised for above a century, especially during the late reign, he ascribed solely to royal birth and title; not to the prudence and spirit of the monarchs, nor to the circumstances of the times. Even the opposition which he had struggled with in Scotland encouraged him still farther in his favourite notions; while he there saw, that the same resistance which opposed regal authority, violated all law and order, and made way either for the ravages of a barbarous nobility, or for the more intolerable insolence of seditious preachers. In his own person, therefore, he thought all legal power to be centered, by an hereditary and a divine right; and this opinion might have proved dangerous, if not fatal, to liberty, had not the firmness of the persuasion, and its seeming evidence, induced him to trust solely to his right, without making the smallest provision, either of force or politics, in order to support it.

Such were the opposite dispositions of parliament and prince, at the commencement of the Scottish line; dispositions just beginning to exist and to appear in the parliament, but thoroughly established and openly avowed on the part of the prince.

The spirit and judgement of the house of commons appeared, not only in defence of their own privileges, but also in their endeavour, though, at this time, in vain, to free trade from those shackles, which the high exerted prerogative, and even, in this respect, the ill-judged tyranny of Elizabeth, had imposed upon it.

James had already, of his own accord, called in and annulled all the numerous patents for monopolies which had been granted by his predecessor, and which extremely fettered every species of domestic industry: but the exclusive companies still remained; another species of monopoly, by which almost all foreign trade, except that to France, was brought into the hands of a few rapacious engrossers, and all prospect of future improvement in commerce was for ever sacrificed to a little temporary advantage of the sovereign. These companies, though arbitrarily elected, had carried their privileges so far, that almost all the commerce of England was centered in London; and it appears, that the customs of that port amounted to one hundred and ten thousand pounds a-year, while those of all the kingdom beside yielded only seventeen thousand (y). Nay, the whole trade of London was confined to about two hundred citizens (z), who were easily enabled, by combining among themselves, to fix whatever price they pleased both to the exports and imports of the nation. The committee appointed to examine this enormous grievance, one of the greatest which we read of in English history, insist on it as a fact well known and avowed, however contrary to present received opinion, that shipping and seamen had sensibly decayed during all the preceding reign (a). And though nothing be more common than complaints of the decay of trade, even during the most flourishing periods; yet is this a consequence which might naturally result from such arbitrary establishments, at a time when the commerce of all the other nations of Europe, except that of Scotland, enjoyed full liberty and indulgence.

While the commons were thus attempting to give liberty to the trading part of the nation, they also endeavoured to free the landed property from the burthen of wardships (b), and to remove those remains of the feudal tenures, under which the nation still laboured. A just regard was shewn to the crown in the conduct of this affair; nor was the remedy sought for, considered as a matter of right, but merely of grace and favour. The profit which the king reaped, both from wards and from respite of homage, was estimated; and it was intended to compound for these prerogatives by a secure and independent revenue. But after some debates in the house, and some conferences with the lords, the affair was found to contain more difficulties than could easily, at that time, be surmounted; and it was not then brought to any conclusion.

(x) Notwithstanding the contest appeared to end favourably, many of the spirited members were offended at the concession of giving up those who had been elected by the people. The committee who managed the affair was severely reproached for exceeding their authority in giving a consent without having consulted the house; and a motion was made that it might be done by warrant, and therein inserted, "by the request of the king." Sir Francis Bacon, one of the committee, gave the report of the conference in the following strain: "The king said he would be president himself. This attendance renewed the remembrance of the last, when we departed with such admiration. It was the voice of God in man; the good Spirit of God in the mouth of man. We might say, as was said to Solomon, We are glad, O king! that we give account to you, because you discern what is spoken. How to report his majesty's speech he knew not; the eloquence of a king was inimitable." Journals of the House of Commons, vol. i. p. 168.

The same fate attended an attempt of a like nature, to free the nation from the burthen of purveyance. This prerogative had been much abused by the purveyors (c); and the commons shewed some intention to offer the king fifty thousand pounds a-year for the abolition of it.

But the most important affair that was brought before the parliament, where the commons shewed a great spirit of independence, was the union of the two kingdoms. This was zealously, and even impatiently urged by the king (d). He regarded it as the peculiar felicity of his reign, that he had terminated the bloody animosities of these hostile nations, and had reduced the whole island under one government; enjoying tranquillity within itself, and security from all foreign invasions. He hoped that, while his subjects of both kingdoms reflected on past disasters, besides regarding his person as infinitely precious, they would entertain the strongest desire of securing themselves against the return of like calamities, by a thorough union of laws, parliaments, and privileges. He considered not, that this very reflection operated, as yet, in a contrary manner on men's minds, and kept alive that mutual hatred between the nations, which had been carried to the greatest extremities, and required time to allay it. The more urgent the king appeared in promoting this measure, the more backward was the English parliament in concurring with him; while they ascribed his excessive zeal to that partiality in favour of his ancient subjects, of which they thought, that, on other occasions, they had reason to complain. James indeed was so impatiently set on the union, that he had already assumed the title of king of Great Britain; issued out a proclamation to make Scotch coin current in England; quartered St. Andrew's cross with St. George's; and, to give a general idea of its peaceable advantages, the iron doors of the frontier towns were converted into plough-shares. The parliament took this scheme into consideration, rather out of compliment, and to humour the king, than with any design to bring it into execution. James drew up many projects with his own hand: he alternately complained of and cajoled the parliament (e); but their complaisance for the king carried them no farther than to appoint forty-four English to meet with thirty-one Scottish commissioners, in order to deliberate concerning the terms of an union; but without any power of making advances towards the establishment of it (f).

The same spirit of independence appeared in the house of commons, when the question of supply was brought before them, by some members attached to the court. In vain was it urged, that, though the king received a supply which had been voted to Elizabeth, and which had not been collected before her death; yet he found it burthened with a debt contracted by the queen, equal to the full amount of it: that peace was not yet thoroughly concluded with Spain, and that Ireland was still expensive to him: that on his journey from Scotland amidst such a concourse of people, and on that of the queen and royal family, he had expended considerable sums: and that as the courtiers had looked for greater liberalities from the prince on his accession, and had imposed on his generous nature; so the prince, in his turn, would expect, at the beginning, some mark of duty and attachment from his people, and some consideration of his necessities. No impression was made on the house of commons by these topics; and the majority appeared fully determined to refuse all supply. The commons also refused a bill, sent down to them by the lords, for entailing the crown lands for ever on the king's heirs and successors (g). The dissipation, made by Elizabeth, had probably taught James the necessity of this law, and the advantage gained by the people made the commons think proper to refuse it.

In order to cover a disappointment with regard to supply, which might bear a bad construction, both at home and abroad, James sent a message to the house (h), in which he told them, that he desired no supply; and he was very forward in refusing what he perfectly knew they never intended to grant. Indeed it appears that the commons had been foiled in all their intentions for public utility, and were therefore justly determined that the people should not be robbed to feed the avarice and luxury of courtiers. Soon after, on the 7th of July, the king prorogued the parliament, but not without discovering, in his speech, visible marks of dissatisfaction. Having so early in his reign given great offence to the Puritans, he now saw reason to make public complaint of the restless and encroaching spirit of the puritanical party, and of the malevolence with which they endeavoured to inspire the commons. Nor were his complaints without foundation, or the Puritans without interest; since the commons, now finding themselves free from the arbitrary government of Elizabeth, made application for a conference with the lords, and presented a petition to the king; the purport of both which was, to procure, in favour of the Puritans, a relaxation of the ecclesiastical laws. The use of the surplice, and of the cross in baptism, is there chiefly complained of.

The commons had nobly assserted their privileges in several instances, during this session. The delivery of sir Thomas Shirley, one of their members, who had been committed to the Fleet, was demanded and obtained; and the warden punished for contempt of the house, in refusing to release his prisoner. In this case a vote had been carried by a majority of seventeen, for six of the members to be sent by the house with the serjeant and mace to require the delivery; but they were deterred from the resolution by a representation of the speaker, that the members who entered the prison in that manner would be by law subject to an action. Sir Herbert Crofts, one of the members, coming up with others to hear the king's speech, was insulted by a yeoman of the guards, who shut the door against him, saying, "Goodman burgess you come not here." The commons resented the insult as an affront upon the whole house; and their anger was with difficulty appeased by the yeoman's asking pardon for his fault, and receiving on his knees a reprimand from the speaker.

An act for the due execution of the statutes against jesuits, seminary priests, recusants, &c. met with an absurd opposition from a hot-headed member of the upper house, the lord viscount Montague. He inveighed against the whole state of the established religion, and attempted to prove the antiquity of the Roman catholic faith, and the novelty of the church of England. The lords thought fit to commit him prisoner to the Fleet; in which place he remained till he had given satisfaction by confessing his fault.

(e) The following is a letter from the king to the parliament on the occasion of the union. "Ye see with quhat cleerness and sinceritie I have behaved myself in this earande, even throuch all the progresse thairof, thoch I will not saye, too littel regairdit by you, but I maye justlie saye, not so uillinglie embraced by you, as the uorthiness of the maitter doth uell deserve. I proteste to God, the fruits thairof uill chieflie tende to youre owen uell prosperitie and increase of strenth and greatness: Nothing can staye you from harkening unto it, but jalousie and distruste, ather of me the propounder, or of the maitter by me propounditt: If of me, then doe ye both me and yourselfis an infinite uronge, my conscience bearing me recorde, that I ever deserved the contrarie at your handis; but if youre distruste be of the maitter itself, then distruste ye nothing but your owin uisdomes or honesties: For as I have gevin over urangling upon uordis with you, so crave I no conclusion to be taken at this tyme heirin, but only a comission, that it maye be disputed, considderid upon, and reported unto you; and then will ye be youre owin cookes, to dresse it as ye liste: so that (as I have alreaddie said) since the conclusion thairof can never be without youre owin asseintis; if ye be trew to youreselfis, no man can deceave you in it; lett not youreselfis thairfore be transported with the curiositie of a few giddie headis; for it is in you nou to make the choice, ather by yielding to the providence of God, and embracing that quhiche he hath castin in youre mouthis, to procure the prosperitie and increase of greatnes to me and myne, you and youres; and by the awaye-taking of that partition-uall, quhiche allreaddie, by Godde's providence, in my bloode is rent asunder, to establishe my throne and youre boddie politike, in a perpetuall and floorishing peace; or ellis contemning Godde's benefites so freelie ofred unto us, to spitte and blaspheme in his face, by praeferring uarre to peace, trouble to quyetnes, hatred to love, ueakness to greatnes, and division to union; to sowe the seidis of discorde to all our posterities; to dishonoure youre king; to make both me and you a proverbe of reproche in the mouthis of all straingeris and all ennemies to this nation, and envyers of my greatnes; and oure next laboure to be, to take up new guarisons for the bordouris, and to make new fortifications thaire. Sed meliora spero. I hoape that God, in this choice and free uill of youris, uill not suffer you, with olde Adame, to choose the worste, and so to procure the defacing of this earthlie paradise; but by the contrarie, that he shall inspyre you so, as, with the seconde Adame, ye shall produce peace; and so beutifie this oure earthlie kingdome heerwith, as it may represente, and be an arles pennie unto us, of that æternal peace in that spirituall kingdome, quhiche is prepared for the perpetuall residence of all his chosen children." Vid. Journals of the House of Commons, vol. i. p. 193, & seq.

Complaint was brought into the house of lords by the commons against John Thornborough, bishop of Bristol, (who was afterwards translated to Worcester,) for having written a book in favour of the Union. The lords agreed that the bishop should make a public acknowledgment that he had committed an offence; and the bishop submitting to the determination of the house, the affair was accommodated.

Richard Bancroft had succeeded John Whitgift in the archbishopric of Canterbury, but was so zealous a persecutor of those who had embraced the doctrines of the Puritans, that many families of those professors were under a necessity of leaving their country and seeking an asylum in foreign countries: he endeavoured to persuade the king to take upon himself the power of redressing the grievances of the clergy without consulting the parliament; but James was advised not to take so dangerous a step. Bancroft presented the king with twenty-five articles, commonly called "Articuli Cleri," and petitioned the king to grant prohibitions upon them.

The peace with Spain was finally concluded this year, and was signed by the Spanish ministers at London, on the 18th of August. In the conferences, previous to this treaty, the nations were found to have so few claims on each other, that, except on account of the support given by England to the Low Country provinces, the war might appear to have been continued more on account of personal animosity between Philip and Elizabeth, than any contrariety of political interests between their subjects. Some articles in the treaty, which seemed prejudicial to the Dutch commonwealth, were never executed by the king; and as the Spaniards made no complaints on that head, it appeared that, by secret agreement, the king had expressly reserved the power of sending assistance to the Hollanders. The constable of Castile came into England to ratify the peace; and, on the part of England, the earl of Hertford was sent into the Low Countries for the same purpose, and the earl of Nottingham, high admiral, into Spain (i).

Though England, by means of her naval force, was perfectly secure, during the latter years of the Spanish war, James shewed an impatience to put an end to hostilities; and soon after his accession, before any terms of peace were concerted, or even proposed, by Spain, he recalled all the letters of marque (k) which had been granted by queen Elizabeth. Archduke Albert had made some advances of a like nature, which invited the king to take this friendly step. But what is remarkable; in James's proclamation for that purpose, he plainly supposes, that, as he had himself, while king of Scotland, always lived in amity with Spain, peace was attached to his person, and that merely by his accession to the crown of England, without any articles of treaty or agreement, he had ended the war between the kingdoms (l). This ignorance of the law of nations may appear surprizing in a prince, who was thirty-six years of age, and who had reigned from his infancy; did we not consider, that a king of Scotland, who lives in close friendship with England, has few transactions to manage with foreign princes, and has little opportunity of acquiring experience. Unhappily for James, his timidity, his prejudices, his indolence, his love of amusement, particularly of hunting, to which he was much addicted, ever prevented him from making any progress in the knowledge or practice of foreign politics, and in a little time diminished that regard which all the neighbouring nations had paid to England during the reign of his predecessor Elizabeth (m).

James and his parliament at the close of the session had parted in mutual dissatisfaction with each other. On the one hand, the parliament by the act of recognition of James's title had in a manner disavowed his pretension of holding the crown of England solely by hereditary right. The house of commons had made many attempts towards the redress of grievances; grievances which James looked on as very necessary parts of his prerogative. They had proceeded very slowly and coldly on his favourite plan of an union. They had, though in opposition to royal authority, vigorously exerted their privileges; and finally had shewn an intention to deny a demanded subsidy. On the other hand, James had displayed a strong inclination to encroach on the most essential rights of the commons; had urged with the greatest earnestness the unpopular plan of the union; had declared an aversion to comply with their reasonable demands; had lavished his money on his favourites and dependents; and by this early disregard to œconomy, had foreboded the necessities to which he was likely to be often reduced; necessities which could not be supplied without recourse to excessive taxes, by which the subject would be greatly oppressed.

We are now to relate one of the most memorable events that history has conveyed to posterity, which contains at once a singular proof both of the strength and weakness of the human mind; its widest departure from morals, and most steady attachment to religious prejudices. This is the Gunpowder treason; a fact as certain as it appears incredible.

The partizans of the church of Rome had expected great favour and indulgence from James on his accession to the throne, both as he was descended from Mary, whose life they believed to have been sacrificed to their cause, and as he himself, in his early youth, was imagined to have shewn some partiality towards them, which nothing, they thought, but interest and necessity had since restrained. It is pretended, that he had even entered into positive engagements to tolerate their religion, as soon as he should ascend the throne of England; whether their credulity had interpreted in this sense some obliging expressions of the king, or that he had employed such an artifice, in order to render them favourable to his title (n). They soon, however, discovered their mistake; and were at once surprized and enraged to find James, on all occasions, express his intention of strictly executing the laws enacted against them, and of persevering in all the rigorous measures of Elizabeth. Some of the Spanish partizans laid great stress upon a pretended conveyance of the crown of Britain by Mary queen of Scots to the catholic king. All the discontented Papists, who had been banished England, were supported in the Netherlands by that monarch; and great sums were remitted to England, for the purpose of carrying on plots against the government. Catesby, a gentleman of good parts and of an ancient family, first thought of a most extraordinary method of revenge; and he opened his intention to Piercy, a descendent of the illustrious house of Northumberland. In one of their conversations with regard to the distressed condition of the Catholics, Piercy having broken into a sally of passion, and mentioned assassinating the king, Catesby took the opportunity of revealing to him a nobler and more extensive plan of

(i) This embassy, like all others in this reign, was gaudy and pompous. Sixty noblemen and gentlemen of the first rank accompanied the ambassador, besides the others, who with their attendants composed a train of six hundred and fifty persons. The ceremony of taking leave of the king is a strong picture of the manners of this age of parade. James being at Greenwich, the ambassador with his retinue, all richly dressed, waited on him there. In the ambassador's train were six trumpeters, clad in orange-coloured damask; six footmen in orange tawny velvet, alike suited; six pages clad also in orange tawny velvet, with cloaks of the same colour; thirty with cloaks of black velvet; fourscore yeomen apparelled with cloaths of orange cloth, guarded with silver and blue silk lace. Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 644. Stow, p. 859. Stone, the fool, was whipt at Bridewell for saying that there were sixty fools gone to Spain, besides the lord admiral and his two sons.

(m) Sir Charles Cornwallis, the king's resident in Spain, writes thus concerning the treaty of peace to secretary Cecil, 2d June, 1605.

"I find here by many arguments that this peace came opportunely for this kingdom; and is admired of all Europe, yea of this kingdom itself, how it was possible, with so advantageous conditions to them, and so little profitable to our realm, it could be effected. The duke of Anera discoursing with one of great privacy and trust with him, after that he had heard that the peace was in such form concluded, said in plain terms, That the king and counsellors of England had not their senses, when in such sort they agreed upon it; and some Spaniards have lately reported, that the king of Spain's money purchased this quiet, otherwise peace with so good conditions would never have been obtained.

"By those collections that I have made, and relations of others well practised in this state, I find that England never lost such an opportunity of winning honour and wealth unto it, as by relinquishing the war with Spain. The king and kingdom were reduced to such estate, as they could not, in all likelihood, have endured the space of two years more: his own treasury was exhausted; his rents and customs subsigned for the most part for the payment of the money borrowed; his nobility poor and much indebted; his merchants wasted; his people of the country in all extremity of necessity; his devices of gaining by the increase of the valuation of money, and other such of that nature, all played over; his credit in borrowing, by means of the uncertainty of his estate during the war with England, much decayed; the subjects of his many distracted dominions held in obedience by force and fear, not by love and duty, and therefore rather a care and burthen than a relief and strength to him; himself very young, and in that regard with his people in no great veneration, and the less for suffering himself to be wholly governed by a man generally hated by his own country; his strength at sea not able to secure his ports at home, much less his Indies, or his treasury homewards." Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 75, & seq.

treason, which not only included a sure execution of vengeance, but afforded some hopes of restoring the Catholic religion in England. "In vain," said he, "would you put an end to the king's life: he has children, who would succeed both to his crown and to his maxims of government. In vain would you extinguish the whole royal family: the nobility, the gentry, the parliament, are all infected with the same heresy, and could raise to the throne another prince and another family, who, besides their hatred to our religion, would be animated with revenge for the tragical death of their predecessors. To serve any good purpose, we must destroy, at one blow, the king, the royal family, the lords, the commons; and bury all our enemies in one common ruin. Happily, they are all assembled on the first meeting of the parliament; and afford us the opportunity of glorious and useful vengeance. Great preparations will not be requisite. A few of us, combining, may run a mine below the hall, in which they meet; and choosing the very moment when the king harangues both houses, consign over to destruction these determined foes to all piety and religion. Meanwhile, we ourselves standing aloof, safe and unsuspected, shall triumph in being the instruments of divine wrath, and shall behold with pleasure those sacrilegious walls, in which were passed the edicts for proscribing our church and butchering her children, tossed into a thousand fragments; while their impious inhabitants, meditating, perhaps, still new persecutions against us, pass from flames above to flames below, there for ever to endure the torments due to their offences (o)."

Piercy was greatly delighted with this project of Catesby; and they agreed to communicate the matter to a few more, and among the rest to Thomas Winter, whom they sent over to Flanders, in quest of Guido Fawkes, an officer in the Spanish service, with whose zeal and courage they were all thoroughly acquainted. When they inlisted any new conspirator, in order to bind him to secrecy, they always, together with an oath, employed the Communion, the most sacred rite of their religion (p). And it is remarkable, that no one of these pious devotees ever entertained the least compunction with regard to the cruel massacre, which they projected, of whatever was great and eminent in the nation. Some of them only were startled by the reflection, that of necessity many Catholics must be present; as spectators or attendants on the king, or as having seats in the house of peers: but Tesmond, a Jesuit, and Garnet, superior of that order in England, removed these scruples, and shewed them that the interests of religion required that the innocent should here be sacrificed with the guilty.

All this passed in the spring and summer of the year 1604; when the conspirators also hired a house in Piercy's name, adjoining to that in which the parliament was to assemble. Towards the end of that year they began their operations. That they might be less interrupted, and give less suspicion to the neighbourhood, they carried in store of provisions with them, and never desisted from their labour. Obstinate in their purpose, and confirmed by passion, by principle, and by mutual exhortation, they little feared death in comparison of a disappointment; and having provided arms, together with the instruments of their labour, they resolved there to perish in case of a discovery. Their perseverance advanced the work; and they soon pierced the wall, though three yards in thickness; but on approaching the other side, they were somewhat startled at hearing a noise, which they knew not how to account for. Upon enquiry, they found, that it came from the vault below the house of lords; that a magazine of coals had been kept there; and that, as the coals were selling off, the vault would be let to the highest bidder. The opportunity was immediately seized; the place hired by Piercy, in 1605, as a lodgement for fuel; thirty-six barrels of powder lodged in it; the whole covered up with faggots and billets; the doors of the cellar boldly flung open; and every body admitted, as if it contained nothing dangerous.

Confident of success, they now began to look forward, and to plan the remaining part of their project. The king, the queen, prince Henry, were all expected to be present at the opening of parliament. The duke, by reason of his tender age, would be absent; and it was resolved, that Piercy should seize him, or assassinate him. The princess Elizabeth, a child likewise, was kept at lord Harrington's house at Warwickshire; and sir Everard Digby, Ambrose Rookwood, John Grant, being let into the conspiracy, engaged to assemble their friends on pretence of a hunting match, and seizing that princess, immediately to proclaim her queen. So transported were they with rage against their adversaries, and so charmed with the prospect of revenge, that they forgot all care of their own safety; and trusting to the general confusion, which must result from so unexpected a blow, they foresaw not, that the fury of the people, now unrestrained by any authority, must have turned against them, and would probably have satiated itself, by an universal massacre of the Catholics.

The day, so long wished for, (November 5, 1605,) now approached, on which the parliament was appointed to assemble. The dreadful secret, though communicated to above twenty persons, had been religiously kept, during the space of nearly a year and a half. No remorse, no pity, no fear of punishment, no hope of reward, had, as yet, induced any one conspirator, either to abandon the enterprize, or make a discovery of it. The holy fury had extinguished in their breasts every other motive; and it was an indiscretion at last, proceeding chiefly from these very bigoted prejudices and partialities, which saved the nation.

On the 26th of October, ten days before the meeting of parliament, lord Monteagle, a Catholic, son to lord Morley, (who had been a great sufferer in the reign of Elizabeth for his affection to popery,) received the following letter, which had been delivered to his servant by an unknown hand. "My Lord, Out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this parliament. For God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And think not slightly of this advertisement; but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety. For, though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they will receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm: for the danger is past, so soon as you have burned the letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, unto whose holy protection I commend you."

Monteagle knew not what to make of this letter; and though inclined to think it a foolish attempt to frighten and ridicule him, he judged it safest to carry it to lord Salisbury, secretary of state. Though Salisbury either did or pretended to pay little attention to it, he thought proper to lay it before the king, who came to town in a few days after from Royston (q). To the king it appeared not so light a matter; and from the serious earnest style of the letter, he conjectured, that it implied something dangerous and important. A terrible blow, and yet the authors concealed; a danger so sudden, and yet so great; these circumstances seemed all to denote some contrivance by gunpowder; and it was thought advisable to inspect all the vaults below the houses of parliament. This care belonged to the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain; who purposely delayed the search, till the day before the meeting of parliament. He remarked those great piles of wood and faggots, which lay in the vault under the upper house; and he cast his eye upon Fawkes, who stood in a dark corner, and passed himself for Piercy's servant. That daring and determined courage, which so much distinguished this conspirator, even among those heroes in villany, was fully painted in his countenance, and was not passed unnoticed by the chamberlain. Such a quantity also of fuel, for the use of one who lived so little in town as Piercy, appeared a little extraordinary; and upon comparing all circumstances, it was resolved that a more thorough inspection should be made. About midnight, sir Thomas Knevet, a justice of the peace, was sent with proper attendants; and before the door of the vault finding Fawkes, who had just finished all his preparations, he immediately immediately seized him, and turning over the faggots, discovered the powder. The matches and every thing proper for setting fire to the train were taken in Fawkes's pocket; who finding his guilt now apparent, and seeing no refuge but in boldness and despair, expressed the utmost regret, that he had lost the opportunity of firing the powder at once, and of sweetening his own death by that of his enemies. Before the council, he displayed the same intrepid firmness, mixed even with scorn and disdain; refusing to discover his accomplices, and shewing no concern but for the failure of the enterprize. This obstinacy lasted two or three days: but being confined to the Tower, left to reflect on his guilt and danger, and the rack being just shown to him; his courage, fatigued with so long an effort, and unsupported by hope or society, at last failed him; and he made a full discovery of all the conspirators.

(q) While the king was at Royston, he devoted himself so intirely to hunting, that he forbade his ministers to disturb his pleasures with any business; saying, "His hunting was necessary to the state; it was good for his health, and his health was necessary to the state." These huntings were great nuisances; they are taken notice of as such in a letter from Matthew Hutton, archbishop of York, to viscount Cranbourn. "I could wish," writes this prelate, "that there was less wasting of the treasure of the realm, and more moderation of the lawful exercise of hunting; both that poor men's corn may be less spoiled, and other his majesty's subjects more spared." Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 40.

Catesby, Piercy, and the other criminals, who were in London, though they had heard of the alarm taken at a letter sent to Monteagle; though they had heard of the chamberlain's search; yet were resolved to persist to the utmost, and never abandon their hopes of success. But at last, hearing that Fawkes was arrested, they hurried down to Warwickshire; where sir Everard Digby, thinking himself assured that success had attended his confederates, was already in arms, in order to seize the princess Elizabeth. She had escaped into Coventry; and they were obliged to put themselves on their defence against the country, who were raised from all quarters, and armed, by the sheriff. The conspirators, with all their attendants, never exceeded the number of eighty persons; and being surrounded on every side, could no longer entertain hopes, either of prevailing or escaping. Having therefore confessed themselves, and received absolution, they boldly prepared for death, and resolved to sell their lives as dear as possible to the assailants. But even this they were unable to do; for some of their powder took fire, and prevented them from making their wished-for defence (r). The people rushed in upon them. Piercy and Catesby were killed by one shot, and Robert Wright was also slain. Sir Everard Digby, Guido Fawkes, Robert and Thomas Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, Robert Keys, Thomas Bates, esquires, and Garnet, the superior of the jesuits, being taken prisoners, were tried, confessed their guilt, and suffered by the hands of the executioner. Notwithstanding this horrid crime, the bigoted Catholics were so devoted to Garnet, that they fancied miracles to be wrought by his blood; and in Spain he was regarded as a martyr. Francis Tresham was likewise convicted, but died in prison of a stranguary.

Neither had the desperate fortune of the conspirators urged them to this enterprize, nor had the former profligacy of their lives prepared them for so great a crime. Before that audacious attempt, their conduct seems, in general, to be liable to no reproach. Catesby's character had entitled him to such regard, that Rookwood and Digby were seduced by their implicit trust in his judgement; and they declared, that, from the motive alone of friendship to him, they were ready, on any occasion, to have sacrificed their lives (s). Digby himself was as highly esteemed and beloved as any man in England; and he had been particularly honoured with the good opinion of queen Elizabeth (t). It was bigoted zeal alone, the most absurd of prejudices masked with reason, the most criminal of passions covered with the appearance of duty, which seduced them into measures, that were fatal to themselves, and had so nearly proved fatal to their country (u).

The lords Mordaunt and Stourton, two Catholics, were fined, the former ten thousand pounds, the latter six thousand, by the star-chamber; because their absence from parliament had begotten a suspicion of their being acquainted with the conspiracy. The earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thousand pounds, and was detained several years prisoner in the Tower; because, not to mention other grounds of suspicion, he had admitted Piercy into the number of gentlemen pensioners, without his taking the requisite oaths. Lord Monteagle was rewarded with an estate of two hundred pounds per annum, and a pension of five hundred pounds.

The parliament met on the 9th of November. James's speech on the occasion of the plot is perhaps as remarkable as the occasion itself, the whole of it being, according to the genius of the orator, uncommonly prolix. We shall only give the most striking passages. "And now I must crave a little pardon of you (that since kings are, in the word of God itself, called gods, as being his vicegerents on earth, and so adorned and furnished with some sparkles of divinity) to compare some of the works of God, the great king, towards the whole and general world, to some of his works towards me and this little world of my dominions." He then draws a comparison between the destruction of the world by water, the salvation of Noah, the destruction of the world by fire, and the salvation of the faithful, with his own dangers and escapes in the Gowrie and gun-powder conspiracies. He distinguishes the general sorts of death which mankind may suffer. "For by three different sorts in general may mankind be put to death. The first, by other men and reasonable creatures, which is least cruel; for then both defence of men against men may be expected, and likewise who knows what pity God may stir up in the hearts of the actors at the very instant, besides the many ways and means whereby men may escape in such a present fury. And the second way, more cruel than that is, by animal and unreasonable creatures; for as they have less pity than men, so it is a greater horror, and more unnatural for men to deal with them; but yet with them both resistance may avail, and also some pity may be had, as was in the lions, in whose den Daniel was thrown, or that thankful lion that had the Roman slave in his mercy. But the third, the most cruel and unmerciful of all, is the destruction by insensible and inanimate things; and amongst them all the most cruel are the two elements of water and fire, and of those two the fire is the most merciless. When the letter was shewed to me by my secretary, wherein a general obscure advertisement was given of some dangerous blow at this time, I did upon the instant interpret and apprehend some dark phrases therein, contrary to the ordinary grammar construction of them; and (in another sort than I am sure any divine or lawyer in any university would have taken them) to be meant by this horrible form of blowing us all up by powder; and thereupon ordered that search to be made, whereby the matter was discovered, and the man apprehended. It resteth now that I should inform you what is to be done hereafter upon the occasion of this horrible accident. As for your parts, that are my faithful and loving subjects of all degrees, I know that your hearts are so burnt up with zeal in this errand, and your tongues so ready to utter your dutiful affection, and your hands and feet so bent to concur in the execution thereof (for which, as I need not to spur you, so can I not but praise you for the same) as it may very well be possible, that the zeal of your hearts may make some of you in your speeches rashly to blame such as may be innocent of the attempt." He then excuses the Papists in general, and says, "That many Papists laying their only trust upon Christ and his merits, at their last breath, may and oftentimes are saved; detesting in that point, and thinking the cruelty of the Puritans worthy of fire, that will admit no salvation to the Papists." He charges them "not to think that any foreign princes had a hand in the plot, but to speak and think of them reverently."

In the conclusion of the king's long speech are instructions to the parliament concerning the nature of their office; "that they are not to be too busy in proposing new laws, but to consult on those which are proposed by the king; that they should be cautious of proposing novelties, but most of all not to propose any bitter or seditious laws (v)."

After the chancellor had prorogued the parliament till Tuesday, 21st January, 1606, the king rose again, and gave his reasons for nominating that day for the next meeting.

(u) Digby after his condemnation, said in a letter to his wife: "Now for my intention, let me tell you, that if I had thought there had been the least sin in the plot, I would not have been of it for all the world; and no other cause drew me, to hazard my fortune and life, but zeal to God's religion." He expresses his surprize to hear that any Catholics had condemned it. Digby's Papers, published by Secretary Coventry.
(v) James makes a kind of apology for not having before this performed the office of a tutor to the parliament. "It could not," said he, "be possible for me, at my first entry here, before experience had taught it me, to be able to understand the particular mysteries of this state. Yet now that I have reigned almost three years amongst you, and have been careful to observe those things that belong to the office of a king; albeit that time be but a short time for experience in others, yet in a king may it be thought a reasonable long time, especially in me, who, although I be but in a manner a new king here, yet have been long acquainted with the office of a king in such another kingdom, as doth nearest of all others agree with the laws and customs of this state."

ing. "Since it pleased God," said he, "to deliver me upon one day of the week, which was Tuesday, and likewise on one day of the month, which was the fifth, thereby to teach me, that as it was the same devil that persecuted me, so it was the same God that still mightily delivered me; I thought it therefore not amiss that the one and twentieth day of January, which falls to be upon Tuesday, should be the day of this meeting of next sessions of parliament."

The king's speech, as might be expected, was much applauded by the courtiers, who pretended to discover greatness of soul in the expressions of moderation towards the papists; but the people in general were of a different opinion; they considered it as the proofs of an incurable tenderness to the Roman Catholics, and looked with horror and resentment on the uncharitable condemnation of the Puritans to fire, for an opinion which had no relation to the state. It does not, however, appear that either of these assigned motives were the real ones that actuated James in this declaration: he was at this time cajoled by the court of Spain with the hopes of a family alliance, attended with these flattering conditions: That he was to be made the arbiter of all the religious differences in Europe; that a large part of Flanders, and a yearly pension of a million of ducats, were to be the portion of the infanta; and that a reddition of such towns as he should demand were to be the security. He, on his side, was to assist Spain against the States General. Hence proceeded the cautious handling of the papists; hence the charge to the commons to think and speak reverently of foreign princes: and hence proceeded many proclamations to prevent the public from suspecting that the conspirators had been promised assistance from such powers. Nor were these all the steps that James took to reconcile the Spaniards to his conduct. Many Roman Catholics, who had taken up arms in Warwickshire in defence of the conspirators, were left unprosecuted, and an excuse sent to Spain for the fine and imprisonment of the earl of Northumberland (w).

The animosity of the generality of James's English subjects against popery, even before this provocation, had risen to a great pitch; and it had perhaps been more prudent in James, to have conformed himself to it. His theological learning, confirmed by disputation, had fixed his judgement in the Protestant faith; yet was his heart a little biassed by the allurements of the Catholic system, and he had been well pleased, if the making of some advances could have effected an union with that church. He strove to abate the acrimony of his own subjects against the religion of their fathers: he became himself the object of their diffidence and aversion. Whatever measures he embraced; in Scotland to introduce prelacy, in England to enforce the authority of the established church, and support its rites and ceremonies, were interpreted as so many steps towards popery; and were represented by the Puritans as symptoms of idolatry and superstition. Ignorant of the consequences, or unwilling to sacrifice to politics his inclination, which he called his conscience, he persevered in the same measures, and gave trust and preferment, almost indifferently, to his Catholic and Protestant subjects. And finding his person, as well as his title, less noxious to the church of Rome, than those of Elizabeth, he gradually abated the rigour of those laws, which had been enacted against that church, and which were so acceptable to his bigoted subjects. But the effects of these dispositions on both sides became not very sensible till towards the conclusion of his reign.

On the re-meeting of the parliament, the heinousness of the late conspiracy was the first consideration that engaged the attention of both houses. Some of the commons proposed that the prisoners might be tried before the king and parliament, others were for bringing in a bill to enact a more rigorous punishment than the law ordained. Both these motions were dropped, and the proceedings against them took their due course. The result of their resentment was an act which ordained an annual thanksgiving on the fifth of November; and two severe ones against the body of papists, entitled, "An act for discovering and repressing popish recusants;" and "an act to prevent dangers which may grow by popish recusants." These statutes are yet in force.

The business of a supply brought on the demand for redress of grievances. The king, who heard that the commons were deliberating on the subject of ecclesiastical abuses, was determined to be before-hand with them, and a message was delivered to the lords by the archbishop of Canterbury concerning the abuses of excommunication, with this proviso: "Though his majesty doth desire that the said jurisdiction ecclesiastic may be maintained and upholden in all respects as it is fit." A message from the commons desired a conference on these articles: the silencing of ministers, the multiplicity of ecclesiastical commissions, the manner of citations, and the point of excommunication. But the lords did not answer the message till some time after, when the commons were informed that they had appointed a committee for the conference. The royal prerogative had been so zealously maintained in the upper house, in a debate whether they should agree or not to the desired conference, that the king sent his thanks to all the lords in general for their regard to his power. The business of the conference was now proceeded on. The bishops were of the committee for the lords, and the affair was determined according to the sense of the king's message.

This point being gained, new difficulties arose. The nuisance of purveyorship (x), and the iniquity of the officers, were so strongly represented by the commons, that the ministry were confounded, and said that they would join in chasing out purveyors; but intreated an immediate supply to the king's necessities (y). A bill for three subsidies and six fifteenths, payable in four years, went on heavily in the lower house; for the redress of grievances was thought necessary to precede so large a grant (z). These were enumerated, and the amount was so vast, that James said peevishly, "They had sent an O yes through the nation to find them." In the heat of the debate, an alarm of the king's being murdered at Oking threw the whole town in confusion. The citizens were put under arms, and preparations made for a siege. The affrighted members sent message after message to the council, to know the truth of the various reports; in a little time they became less strong, then doubtful, and in some hours James sent word that he intended being in London that day. Whilst the minds of men were yet agitated by the double surprize, whilst the tide of affection ran yet high on account of the supposed accident, the courtiers pushed the supply so strongly and so warmly, that notwithstanding all that the clear-sighted members could do, they carried the motion. The next day, when time and reflection had abated their over-heated loyalty, the outwitted party began to consider of the largeness of the sums they had granted; and some of the members moved that it should not pass till the heavy grievances of the nation which they complained of were redressed. This, however, was overruled by the courtiers, and the bill was sent up to the house of lords, where it met with a quick and easy assent. Nor did the gratification which James enjoyed from the report terminate here. He was received at Hyde-park by the speaker and four members of the house of commons; the city paid him the same compliment; whilst the easy vulgar were unbounded in their extasies. The union was again brought before the houses, and a bill passed as ineffectual as the former.

The commons were in so little temper for such a compliance, that the country-party in the house had drawn up a list of the grievances of church and state, and briskly presented it, while the bill of supply was passing the lords.

(w) James likewise, to favour the Catholics, gave leave to Arundel of Wardour to raise a regiment of fifteen hundred English, and to the earl of Hume to raise another of a thousand Scots for the service of the archduke. Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 646.

(x) These men, by the licence of their office, which was to purvey for the king's household, pressed into their service all kinds of wheel-carriages and vehicles, in times of the greatest business, and by such means extorted money for respites. Two acts to redress this grievance passed the house of commons, but were rejected by the lords.

(y) Sir Thomas Ridgeway was one of the most zealous members in this business. After having expatiated on the blessings the island enjoyed under the present government, he enumerated the charges the king had sustained since his accession to the throne; and added, that the commonwealth was obliged to lighten the burden; for, as Moses said, How can he alone bear their strifes and incumbrances? Parl. Hist. vol. v. p. 147.

James at this time maintained, at a great charge, an ambassador or resident in almost every court in Europe; his domestic expences ran high; some of the masks that the queen gave cost three thousand pounds. James had scattered his favours with a childish profusion; and the commons plainly saw, in the enumerating the causes of his necessity, that these causes might have been avoided. Mr. Holt observed, that a subsidy was a public contribution, not to be applied to private uses, bounties, expences, ceremonies, and the like. Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 41.

(z) Sir Francis Bacon said in the house, that this grant would amount to about four hundred thousand pounds. Journals of the Commons, May 20, 1606.

The oppression which the subject suffered from purveyorship was again argued in the house, with proposals for taking away the arbitrary power of the board of green-cloth. This drew a message from the king, in which he assured them of a reformation in this article, and that the subject should not be brought before the green-cloth, but before the justice-seat. One Parker preached a sermon at St. Paul's, wherein he abused the house of commons in the grossest terms for irregular proceedings: he was protected by the king, under a promise of correction. This affair would have gone farther, if the parliament had not been prorogued suddenly, on the 27th of May, till the 18th of November following.

The friendly disposition of the English towards the Low Country Provinces occasioned such a coolness in the behaviour of the Spanish monarch, that James had reason to apprehend that he should enjoy little reality from the great offers of that court. Either through indolence, or from want of courage, he was so far from executing his part of the conditions, viz. an assistance against the states, that he did not attempt to hinder his subjects from enlisting under their banners. The Spaniard, despairing to rouse the inactivity of his English ally, and resenting the aid that the United Provinces received from his subjects, affected to treat James with the utmost contempt. Sir Charles Cornwallis, the English resident at the Spanish court, was told that James had so entirely lost the hearts of his subjects, that he had no influence over them, and therefore his friendship was of little consequence. Several conspirators who had been engaged in the gunpowder plot, now under the protection of the king of Spain, were refused to be given up, and the English merchants were persecuted by the inquisition, on pretence of retaliation for the sufferings of the papists in England (a). Notwithstanding these insults he did not forbid all hopes of alliance; and James still flattering himself with that fantastical delusion, winked at oppressions, which a more active monarch would have endeavoured to put an end to.

The nation appeared now to be in perfect tranquillity; the dazzling glitter of the court, whilst it set reflection at a distance, confounded the sense of evil with the allurement of pleasure; and private grievances were forgot in the enjoyment of public amusements. James, wantoning in the most lavish prodigality, would have experienced the full measure of happiness, had he effected his darling plan of an union. This event he looked on as one of the most important advantages of his accession; and an epocha which would strongly mark the lustre of his reign: nor did he ever suspect that his ingenuity and eloquence would be baffled in one of the most rational schemes he had ever projected, or that plebeian powers could withstand kingly force and kingly wisdom; besides, the late generosity of the commons had taught him, that if that formidable assembly was difficult of conviction, they were liable to be over-reached by the low cunning of court-politics. The next sessions he hoped would bring the affair to a favourable issue; and on the 18th of November, the day to which the parliament had been prorogued, he made a speech to that effect (b). Sir Francis Bacon employed all his powers of eloquence to the same purpose; and, in order to soften the members, some trifling concessions were made on a few of the least important articles in the list of grievances offered the last sessions: but neither could the keenness of the monarch, (whose discourse, says Hume, both for good reasoning and eloquent composition, approaches very near that of a man, who was undoubtedly, at that time, one of the greatest geniuses in Europe,) the favour of his concessions, nor the eloquence of his servant, Sir Francis Bacon, prevail over the determined resolution of the members of the commons; nor were the lords extremely forward to shew that devotion which had generally been proof against the arguments of public good. National animosity and personal jealousy now so far prevailed, that after many fruitless messages, and as fruitless conferences, the only point determined was an act for the utter abolition of all memory of hostilities between the two nations; and for repressing the occasion of discord for the time to come (c). James, impatient at these delays which his favourite scheme met with in the parliament, called together the two houses at Whitehall (d), where he laboured hard to convince them of the utility of the union, and the error of their proceedings; he mentioned a proclamation which he had made in consequence of the opinion of the judges, to naturalize those Scotch subjects born after his accession, and he charged them not to disgrace either his proclamation or his judges; who, when the parliament was done, had authority to try their lands and lives: lastly, he warned them to think of his power, and not to tempt his patience. But the king had offended the people by some precipitate steps which he had taken a little after his accession to the throne, in order to promote his favourite project; and these, it may be observed, did more injury than service to his plan: from his own authority he had assumed the title of king of Great Britain; and had quartered the arms of Scotland with those of England, in all coins, flags, and ensigns. The important consequences, however, which must attend an incorporation of the two nations, as it appeared to the lords and commons, more than balanced the king's rhetoric, and deterred them from attempting it at a time when his partiality, and the pretensions of the Scotch, forbade all hopes of its being done on advantageous, or even equitable terms.

The mortification which the disappointment occasioned to James was considerable; the conviction of his own abilities, and the flattery he had met with on his accession, caused him to look on every attempt to be within the reach of his kingly powers. He had indeed gone farther in this than his prerogative could secure; and its proving abortive would make even his subjects in Scotland look upon his influence in England with contempt. He had mixed entreaty with threats, and had condescended to beg the parliament to save him the disgrace of being frustrated: his

(a) Sir Charles Cornwallis, James's resident in Spain, was at this time treated with insolence and inhumanity. See the following letter from him on this subject to the lords of the privy council.

"May it please your Lordships, Madrid, 9 April, 1607, O. S.

"Upon the sixth of this present I received your lordship's of the third of the last month, together with a letter from his majesty to the king here, in relief of Adrian Thibault. Yesterday I had a message from the king, that this morning about nine of the clock I should have access unto him: I observed that hour, but was not observed with; for I stayed till after twelve of the clock, in a little base form, such as I think there are few in the king my master's skullery, which are not furnished with much better, unaccompanied and unattended (as ambassadors are in England) but left to walk alone, or take my seat in the form, when weariness should enforce me. Yet much favoured had I been if the poor form had been left me; but one of the king's chamber, either out of want of courtesy and respect, or of wit and good will, caused my form to be taken away, and carried into the next chamber; so as then, for the space of one whole hour, I was enforced to hold me to my walk; which had been much less grievous unto me if either the place had been more spacious, or myself as able (as accustomably I am) to have endured it: but having through distemper, and much grief in my spleen, not slept above two hours in two nights before, which, had not his majesty's service drawn me out, would rather have moved me to have kept my bed, than give so long attendance upon a bare pavement in the court, together with so long fasting, I became exceeding faint, and grieved not a little at so unrespective an usage." Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 299.

(b) In this speech James admonishes the parliament to be upon their good behaviour: he tells them, that as individuals they are subject to the power of their sovereign; warns them, that their office is not perpetual, and compares the dissolution of a parliament to the death of kings, who, after the expiration of their reigns with their lives, must give an account of their actions. "Beware, adds he, that ye be not like Icarus the son of Dædalus, that soared so near the sun with his wings of wax, that his wax melted, and his wings failed, and down he fell; and therefore I conclude with Neptune in Virgil, Sed motos præstat componere fluctus. I wish ye would know me, and observe me; and if any plebeian tribunes should incur any offence, or commit any such errors, that ye would correct them for it, and judge yourselves, as St. Paul saith, that ye be not judged; and that the whole body receive not a wound for one ill member thereof." After having assailed the parliament with many importunities concerning the union, he told them, that he desired no more than what he had power of himself to accomplish without them. Journals of the House of Commons, vol. i. p. 314, et seq.

(c) The commons thought fit to gratify the king by imprisoning one of their members, Sir Christopher Pigott, and dismissing him from the house, for having inveighed with great intemperateness against the Scotch in a debate on the subject of the union.

(d) In the speech the king made on this occasion, he gives a remarkable detail of the extent of his authority in the Scotch government; it is in answer to an objection made by the opposition on the different privileges claimed by the Scotch and English subjects. "The Scots, says he, in their pretence to a preserving their own fundamental laws, only mean those laws by which confusion is avoided, and their king's succession and monarchy maintained; not the common law as you do, for the Scots have no law but that which is jus regis." He boasts that he governs Scotland with his pen; that he does more by a clerk of the council than others do by the sword; that no man there dares to speak dishonourably of England, as the English have done of Scotland, for the authority of the chancellor would interrupt him. To an objection that had been started, that the king of Scotland had not a negative voice, but must pass the laws agreed on by the lords and commons, he assures them, that the form of the Scotch parliament is so little inclined to popularity that all bills to be exhibited on a sessions must be approved by the king before they can be propounded to the parliament. Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 199, & seq.

resentment

resentment carried him so far as to make him conceive a contempt and aversion for these assemblies, which continued to the end of his reign; nor were the parliamentary assemblies more favourable in their opinion of majesty: James's mean misrepresentations, his verbal assurances, his impotent menaces, and barren arguments, while they exposed the shallowness of the modern Solomon, unveiled prerogative itself. The commons now with curious eyes looked on a divinity which they had been taught to worship blindly. On canvassing its pretensions, they found them not only destructive to the constitution, but irreconcileable to every rational principle; and that the laws were weak barriers to its unlimited force. Among the many bitter things which had been said during the late contest, the inconvenience of his residing in England was so often hinted at, that James actually offered the parliament to spend his years alternately in Scotland and England, or to remove his court to York. The commons intended to desire him in an address not to listen to reports, but learn the sense of the house from the speaker; the king was apprized of their intention, and pacified them by a message importing, "That he was extremely tender of their privileges, and that every member might speak freely, though with modesty and discretion." Not being able to attain the ends for which he summoned the parliament to meet, on the fourth of July he prorogued them to the sixteenth of November. A petition was presented to the commons this session on the hardships inflicted on the English merchants by the Spaniards (e); in consequence of which the lower house sent a message to the lords, desiring a conference with them, in order to their presenting a joint petition to the king on the subject. But the ministry took it amiss, that the parliament should be petitioned on a subject within the particular province of the king and council; and the lords took some time to deliberate on this message, because, they said, the matter was weighty and rare; accordingly, after they had deliberated upon it, to shew that they were not guided by court influence, they agreed to the conference, though they refused to concur with the commons in proceeding upon it.

Except the unwillingness of the parliament with regard to the union, and an attempt on the king's ecclesiastical jurisdiction (f), most of their measures, during this session, were sufficiently respectful; though they still discover a vigilant spirit, and a careful attention towards national liberty. The votes also of the commons show, that the house contained a mixture of Puritans, who had acquired great authority among them (g), and who, together with religious prejudices, were continually suggesting ideas more suitable to a popular than a monarchical form of government. The natural appetite for rule made the commons lend a willing ear to every doctrine which tended to augment their own power and influence.

In 1607, a petition was moved in the lower house for a more rigorous execution of the laws against popish recusants, and an abatement towards protestant clergymen, who, on principles of conscience, scrupled to observe the ceremonies. Both these points were equally unacceptable to James; and he sent orders to the house to proceed no farther in that matter. The commons were inclined, at first, to consider these orders as a breach of privilege: but they were brought to compliance, when told that this measure of the king was supported by many precedents during the reign of Elizabeth (h).

The house of commons began now to feel themselves of such importance, that on the motion of sir Edwin Sandys, a member of great authority, they entered, for the first time, an order for the regular keeping of their journals (i). When all business was finished, the king prorogued the parliament.

About this time there was an insurrection of the country people in Northamptonshire, headed by one Reynolds, a man of low condition. They went about destroying inclosures; but carefully avoided committing any other outrage. This insurrection was easily suppressed on the 4th of July, and though great lenity was used towards the rioters, yet some of the ringleaders were punished. The chief cause of that commotion seems to have been far from trivial. The practice still continued in England, of disusing tillage, and throwing the land into inclosures for the sake of pasture. By this means the kingdom was depopulated, at least prevented from increasing so much in people as might have been expected from the daily increase of industry and commerce.

The year 1608 presents us with nothing worth recording: but the year 1609 is remarkable for the prevailing influence of liberty. The republic of Holland, animated with its virtue, from small beginnings, had become the astonishment of mankind; and now, having vanquished her tyrannical master in almost every quarter of the globe, she obliged him to yield his arbitrary pretensions, and declare her independent. In the spring, after a long negociation, was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, that war, which for near half a century had been carried on with such fury between Spain and the States of the United Provinces. Never contest seemed, at first, more unequal; never contest was finished with more honour to the weaker party. On the side of Spain were numbers, riches, authority, discipline: on the side of the revolted provinces were found the attachment to liberty and the enthusiasm of religion. By her naval enterprizes the republic maintained her armies; and joining peaceful industry to military valour, she was enabled, by her own force, to support herself, and gradually rely less on those neighbouring princes, who, from jealousy to Spain, were at first prompted to encourage her revolt. Long had the pride of that monarchy prevailed over her interest, and hindered her from hearkening to any terms of accommodation with her rebellious subjects. But finding all intercourse cut off between her provinces by the maritime force of the States, she at last agreed to treat with them as a free people, and solemnly to renounce all claim and pretension to their sovereignty.

The acknowledgement of their independency being gained, the treaty was easily brought to a conclusion, on the 30th of March, under the joint mediation and guarantee of France and England. All exterior appearances of honour were paid equally to both crowns: but very different were the sentiments which the States, as well as all Europe, entertained of the princes who wore them. Frugality and vigour, the chief circumstances which procure regard among foreign nations, shone out as conspicuously in Henry as they were deficient in James (k). Cecil, now earl of Salisbury, who managed the part that James acted, was on one side shackled by his master's extreme fear of incurring the necessity of making war, his coldness to the Dutch, whom he had before termed rebels, his cautiousness of displeasing Spain: and, on the other side, by the warm inclination of the English subjects towards the states. His conduct, influenced by these contrarieties, (e) Many petitions of this sort had been before presented to the king without effect. These hardships are mentioned in several letters from sir Charles Cornwallis, the resident in Spain, to the earl of Salisbury. "If some better course, writes he in one of these letters, be not instantly taken, I see no reason why his majesty should suffer his subjects to continue their traffic hither, so much to their loss and peril. Occasion to call to new question will arise out of the cruelty of Don Luys Fyrardo to the merchants taken in the Indies; since in the articles there is contained no special prohibition. And sure I am, that his majesty will not think it for his honour to give so much way to the Spanish pride as to consent to deprive his subjects to trade thither. I make no doubt but his majesty will not only require satisfaction for the lives of his subjects, there slain by Fyrardo, but for the liberty and restitution of goods to those that remain in their gallies and other prisons. Upon this will arise the question (and may be raised and now warranted with safety) of a trade thither by our merchants, till some further conclusion be had between the two kings. That themselves shall send any fleet to disturb them, either this year or the next (if the Hollanders continue the course they have begun) I see little or no possibility; if they here want their treasure from thence, they are neither able to maintain their wars abroad, nor themselves at home. If their people there want their necessaries from hence, necessity will enforce them to cast themselves into any arms that will supply them by trading with them. To write all I would about this subject would exceed all proportion of a letter: to be short, their estates, were they now well set upon, is irrevocable; this peace being an impediment to the greatest advantage and means to enrich our king and realm that in any age hath ever been offered." Winwood's Memorials; vol. ii. p. 235, & seq.

To the merchants' petition on the occasion of the wrongs they had received from the Spaniards, were subjoined just causes and reasons for enabling by law the subjects of England, by way of letters of mart, to recover the damages they had received from this people. These reasons are founded upon the iniquitous proceedings of the Spanish courts of confiscation, where the same person was commonly both judge and party, and the English were frequently put to the torture to make discovery. They take notice likewise, that it was a common practice with the Spaniards to join themselves with the Maltese, who were not then in friendship with England, and thereby entrap the English, and that under pretence of the pope's prohibiting all commerce with infidels, the most valuable branches of their Levant and Turky trade had been ruined.—Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 664.

was so lukewarm, that the fear and jealousy of the Dutch was much inflamed by the management practised with Spain, and Spain resented the protection which the Dutch, during the course of the mediation, was promised from England; who did not, however, so vigorously assist them as might have been expected, yet to its perseverance in not abandoning them may be attributed the terms they got from Spain, and the being acknowledged as a sovereign state by all other potentates (l).

The behaviour of the king of France, however, was neither generous nor consistent. In the beginning of the treaty his offers to the States were high and warm (m); but the fear of incurring the whole defence of his allies, with some proposals made to him by the court of Spain (n), caused him to grow cold towards the conclusion of it.

The little concern which James took in foreign affairs, renders the domestic occurrences, particularly those of parliament, the most interesting of his reign. A new session was held on the 9th of February, 1610; the king was full of hopes of receiving supply; the commons were elated with the idea of circumscribing his prerogative. The earl of Salisbury, now created treasurer on the death of the earl of Dorset, laid open the king's necessities, first to the peers, then to a committee of the lower house. He insisted on the unavoidable expence incurred, in supporting the navy, and in suppressing a late insurrection in Ireland: he mentioned three numerous courts which the king was obliged to maintain, for himself, for the queen, and for the prince of Wales: he observed, that queen Elizabeth, though a single woman, had received very large supplies in the years preceding her death, which alone were expensive to her: and he remarked, that, during her reign, she had alienated many of the crown lands; an expedient which, though it supplied her present necessities, without laying burdens on her people, extremely multiplied the necessities of her successor. From all these causes he thought it nowise strange, that the king's income should fall short so great a sum as eighty-one thousand pounds of his stated and regular expence; without mentioning contingencies, which ought always to be esteemed a fourth of the yearly charges. And as the crown was now necessarily burdened with a great and urgent debt of three hundred thousand pounds, he thence inferred the absolute necessity of an immediate and large supply from the people. Among other things he said, "That supplying his wants was a mark of esteem which could not be denied to a king, who was not only the wisest of kings, but the very image of an angel." To all these reasons, which James likewise urged in a speech addressed to both houses, the commons remained inexorable. But, not to shock the king with an absolute refusal, they granted him one subsidy and one fifteenth; which would scarcely amount to a hundred thousand pounds. And James received the mortification of discovering, in vain, all his wants, and of begging aid of subjects which had no reasonable indulgence or consideration for him.

Among the many causes of disgust and quarrel which now daily and unavoidably multiplied between the king and the parliament, this article of money is to be regarded as none of the least important. After the discovery and conquest of the West-Indies, gold and silver became every day more plentiful in England, as well as in the rest of Europe; and the price of all commodities and provisions rose to a height beyond what had been known since the declension of the Roman empire. As the revenue of the crown rose not in proportion (o), the prince was insensibly reduced to poverty amidst the general riches of his subjects, and required additional funds, in order to support the same magnificence and force which had been maintained by former monarchs. But, while money thus flowed into England, we may observe, that, at the same time, and probably from that very cause, arts and industry of all kinds received a mighty increase; and elegance in every enjoyment of life became better known, and more cultivated among all ranks of people. The king's servants, both civil and military, his courtiers, his ministers, demanded more ample supplies from the impoverished prince, and were not contented with the same simplicity of living, which had satisfied their ancestors. The prince himself began to regard an increase of pomp and splendour as requisite to support the dignity of his character, and to preserve the same superiority above his subjects, which his predecessors had enjoyed. Some equality too, and proportion to the other sovereigns of Europe, it was natural for him to desire; and as they had universally enlarged their revenue, and multiplied their taxes, the king of England deemed it reasonable, that his subjects, who were generally as rich as theirs, should bear with patience some additional burdens and impositions. But unhappily for the king, those very riches, with the knowledge of the age, bred opposite sentiments in his subjects; and begetting a spirit of freedom and independence, disposed them to pay little regard either to the entreaties or menaces of their sovereign. While the barons possessed their former immense property and extensive jurisdictions, they were apt, at every disgust, to endanger the monarch, and throw the whole government into confusion: but this confusion often, in its turn, proved favourable to the monarch, and made the nation again submit to him, in order to re-establish justice and tranquillity. After the power of alienations, as well as the increase of commerce, had thrown the balance of property into the hands of the commons, the situation of affairs, and the dispositions of men's minds, became susceptible of a more regular plan of liberty; and the laws were not supported singly by the authority of the sovereign. And though in that interval, after the decline of the peers, and before the people had yet experienced their force, the princes assumed an exorbitant power, and had almost annihilated the constitution under the weight of their prerogative; but so soon as the commons recovered from their lethargy, they seem to have been astonished at the danger, and were resolved to secure liberty by firmer barriers than their ancestors had hitherto provided for its preservation.

Had James possessed much frugality, he might have warded off this crisis somewhat longer; and waiting for a favourable opportunity to increase and fix his revenue, might have secured the extensive authority transmitted to him. On the other hand, had the commons been inclined to act with more generosity and kindness towards their prince, they might probably have turned his necessities to good account, and have bribed him to depart from the more dangerous articles of his prerogative. But he was a foreigner, and ignorant of the arts of popularity; they were soured by religious prejudices, and tenacious of their money: and, in this situation, it is no wonder, that, during this whole reign, we scarcely find an interval of mutual confidence and friendship between the prince and the parliament.

The king, by his prerogative alone, had some years before altered the rates of the customs, and had established higher impositions on several kinds of merchandize. This exercise of power will naturally, to us, appear arbitrary and illegal; yet, according to the principles and practices of that time, it might admit of some apology. The duties of tonnage and poundage were at first granted to the crown, by a vote of parliament, and for a limited time; and as the grant frequently expired and was renewed, there could not then arise any doubt concerning the origin of the king's right to levy these duties; and this imposition, like all others, was plainly derived from the voluntary consent of the people. But as Henry V. and all the (l) King James concluded a separate treaty with the States, by which he engaged to furnish twenty armed vessels, from three hundred to six hundred tons, to be employed against any power whatsoever who should disturb the intended peace with Spain, in case it should take place. The expence of these auxiliaries was to be repaid within five years after the war was finished. The States General bound themselves to assist James with the same number of ships, of the like force, four thousand foot and three hundred cavalry. The same terms was stipulated for their repayment. The treaty was to be perpetual; neither party was to make peace with the aggressor, without the consent of the other. This league was not to be prejudicial to the defensive one made between the States and the king of France. Rymer, vol. xvi. p. 668.

(m) He signed a defensive league with the States: by this treaty he was to furnish the States with ten thousand men, to be paid by him as long as they should need them; and if a greater assistance was necessary, he was to furnish it; the expence of the additional assistance was to be repaid him by the States upon the conclusion of the war. The States obliged themselves, in case Henry was attacked, to furnish him with five thousand men, either by land or sea, as he should require, or more if there was occasion; the expence of the additionals being defrayed as above. Guthrie, 1751, vol. iii. p. 607.

(n) This was the renewal of an offer of double marriages between the courts of France and Spain, with the giving up to France the right of sovereignty over the Low Countries. On this negociation, Henry abated much of his zeal for the preservation, or at least for the honour of the States. He insinuated, that it would be convenient to accept of a long truce, without the stipulation of a direct acknowledgement from Spain of independency.

(o) Besides the great alienation of the crown lands, the fee-farm rents never increased, and the other lands were let on long leases, and at a great undervalue, little or nothing above the old rent.

succeeding sovereigns had the revenue conferred on them for life, the prince, so long in possession of these duties, began gradually to consider them as his own proper right and inheritance, and regarded the vote of parliament as a mere formality, which rather expressed the acquiescence of the people in his prerogative, than bestowed any new gift or revenue upon him.

The parliament, when it first granted poundage to the crown, had fixed no particular rates: the imposition was given as a shilling a pound, or five per cent. on all commodities: it was left to the king himself, and the privy council, aided by the advice of such merchants as they should think proper to consult, to fix the value of goods, and thereby the rates of the customs; and as that value had been settled before the discovery of the West-Indies, it was become inferior to the prices which almost all commodities bore in every market in Europe; and consequently the customs on many goods, though supposed to be five per cent. was in reality greatly inferior. The king, therefore, was led to think that rates which were now plainly false, ought to be corrected; that a valuation of commodities, fixed by one act of the privy council, might be amended by another; that if his right to poundage were inherent in the crown, he should also possess, of himself, the right of correcting its inequalities; if this duty were granted by the people, he should at least support the spirit of the law, by fixing a new and a juster valuation of all commodities. But besides this reasoning, which seems plausible, the king was supported in that act of power by direct precedents, some in the reign of Mary, some in the beginning of Elizabeth (p). That less umbrage might be taken, he was moderate in the new rates which he established: the customs, during his whole reign, rose from one hundred and twenty-seven thousand pounds a-year to one hundred and ninety thousand; though, besides the increase of the rates, there was a sensible increase of commerce and industry during that period: every commodity, besides, which might serve to the subsistence of the people, or might be considered as a material of manufactures, was exempted from the new impositions of of James (q): but all this caution could not prevent the complaints of the commons. A spirit of liberty had now taken possession of the house: the leading members, men of an independent genius, and large views, began to regulate their opinions, more by the future consequences which they foresaw, than by the former precedents which were set before them; and they less aspired at maintaining the ancient constitution, than at establishing a new one, and a freer, and a better. In their remonstrances to the king on this occasion, they observed it to be a general opinion, "That the reasons of that practice might be extended much farther, even to the utter ruin of the ancient liberty of the kingdom, and the subjects' right of property in their lands and goods (r). Though expressly forbidden by the king to touch his prerogative, they passed a bill abolishing these impositions; which was however rejected by the house of lords.

In another address to the king, they objected to the practice of borrowing upon privy seals, and desired, that the subjects should not be forced to lend money to his majesty, nor give a reason for their refusal. Some murmurs likewise were thrown out in the house against a new monopoly of the licence of wines (s). It must be confessed, that forced loans and monopolies were established on many and ancient as well as recent precedents; though in complete opposition to all the principles of a free government.

The commons also discovered some discontent against the king's proclamations. James told them, "That though he well knew, by the constitution and policy of the kingdom, that proclamations were not of equal force with laws; yet he thought it a duty incumbent on him, and a power inseparably annexed to the crown, to restrain and prevent such mischiefs and inconveniences as he saw growing on the state, against which no certain law was extant, and which might tend to the great detriment of the subject, if there should be no remedy provided till the meeting of a parliament. And this prerogative, he adds, our progenitors have, in all times, used and enjoyed (t)." The intervals between the sessions, we may observe, were frequently so long, as to render it necessary for a prince to interpose by his prerogative. The legality of this exertion was established by practice; and was even acknowledged by lawyers, who made, however, this difference between laws and proclamations, that the authority of the former was perpetual, that of the latter expired with the sovereign who emitted them (u). But what the authority could be, which bound the subject, yet was different from the authority of laws, and inferior to it, seems inexplicable by any maxims of reason or politics: and in this instance, as in many others, it is easy to see how inaccurate the English constitution was, before the parliament was enabled, by continued acquisitions or incroachments, to establish it on fixed principles of liberty.

Upon the settlement of the reformation, that extensive branch of power, which regards ecclesiastical matters, being then without an owner, seemed to belong to the first occupant; and Henry VIII. failed not immediately to seize it, and to exert it even to the utmost degree of tyranny. The possession of it was continued with Edward; and recovered by Elizabeth; and that ambitious princess was so remarkably jealous of this flower of her crown, that she severely reprimanded the parliament, if ever they presumed to intermeddle in matters concerning religion; and they were so overawed by her authority, as to submit, and to ask pardon on these occasions. But James's parliaments were much less obsequious than were those of Henry or Elizabeth. They ventured to lift up their eyes, and to consider this prerogative. They there saw a large province of government, possessed by the king alone, and scarcely ever communicated with the parliament. They were sensible that this province admitted not of any exact boundary or circumspection. They had felt that the Roman pontiff, in former ages, under pretence of religion, was gradually making advances to usurp the whole civil power. They dreaded still more dangerous consequences from the claims of their own sovereign, who resided among them, and who, in many other respects, possessed such unlimited authority. They therefore deemed it absolutely necessary to circumscribe this branch of prerogative; and accordingly, in the preceding session, they passed a bill against the establishment of any ecclesiastical canons without consent of parliament (v). But the house of lords, as is usual, defended the barriers of the throne, and rejected the bill.

In this session, the commons, after passing anew the same bill, made remonstrances against the proceedings of the high commission court. It required no great penetration to see the extreme danger to liberty, arising in a regal government, from such large discretionary powers as were exercised by that court. But James refused compliance with the application of the commons. He was sensible, no doubt, that, besides the diminution of his authority, many inconveniences must necessarily result from the abolishing of all discretionary power in every magistrate; and that the laws, were they ever so carefully framed and digested, could not possibly provide against every contingency; much less, where they had not, as yet, attained a sufficient degree of accuracy and refinement.

But the principal business which occupied the commons during this session, was the abolition of wardships and purveyance; prerogatives which had been more or less touched on, every session, during the whole reign of James. In this affair, the commons employed the proper means, which might entitle them to success: they offered the king a settled revenue, as an equivalent for the powers which he should part with; and the king was willing to hearken to terms. After much dispute, he agreed to give up these prerogatives for two hundred thousand pounds a-year, which they agreed to confer upon him (w). And nothing

(w) We learn from Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 193. the reason assigned for this particular sum. "From thence my lord treasurer came to the price; and here he said, that the king would no more rise and fall like a merchant. That he would not have a flower of his crown (meaning the court of wards) so much tossed; that it was too dainty to be so handled: and then he said, that he must deliver the very countenance and character of the king's mind out of his own hand-writing; which, before he read, he said he would acquaint us with a pleasant conceit of his majesty. As concerning the number of ninescore thousand pounds, which was our number, he could not affect, because nine was the number of the poets, who were always beggars, though they served so many muses; and eleven was the number of the apostles, when the traitor, Judas, was away; and therefore might best be affected by his majesty:

nothing remained, towards closing the bargain, but that the commons should determine the funds by which this sum should be levied. This session was too far advanced to bring so difficult a matter to a full conclusion; and though the parliament met again, towards the end of the year, and resumed the question, they were never able to terminate an affair, upon which they seemed so intent. The journals of that session are lost; and, as the historians of this reign are very negligent in relating parliamentary affairs, of whose importance they were not sufficiently apprised, we know not exactly the reason of this failure. It only appears, that the king was extremely dissatisfied with the conduct of the parliament, and soon after dissolved it. This was his first parliament, and it sat nearly seven years.

Amidst all these attacks, some more, some less violent, on royal prerogative, the king displayed all his high notions of monarchy and the authority of princes. Even in a speech to the parliament, where he begged for supply, and where he should naturally have used every art to ingratiate himself with that assembly, he expressed himself in these terms: "I conclude, then, the point touching the power of kings, with this axiom of divinity, that, as to dispute what God may do, is blasphemy, but what God wills, that divines may lawfully and do ordinarily dispute and discuss; so it is sedition in subjects to dispute what a king may do in the height of his power. But just kings will ever be willing to declare what they will do, if they will not incur the curse of God. I will not be content, that my power be disputed upon; but I shall ever be willing to make the reason appear of my doings, and rule my actions according to my laws." Notwithstanding the great extend of prerogative in that age, these expressions would probably give some offence. But we may observe, that, as the king's despotism was more speculative than practical, so the independency of the commons was, at this time, the reverse; and though strongly supported by their present situation, as well as disposition, was too new and recent to be as yet founded on systematical principles and opinions.

This year was distinguished by a memorable event, which gave great alarm and concern in England; the murder of the French monarch by the poinard of the fanatical Ravaillac, on the 3rd of May. With his death, the glory of the French monarchy suffered an eclipse for some years; and as that kingdom fell under an administration weak and bigotted, factious and disorderly, the Austrian greatness began anew to appear formidable to Europe. In England, the antipathy to the Catholics revived a little upon this tragical event; and some of the laws, which had formerly been enacted, in order to keep these religionists in awe, began now to be executed with greater rigour and severity.

Though James's timidity and indolence fixed him, during most of his reign, in a very prudent inattention to foreign affairs, there happened in 1611, an event in Europe of such consequence as to rouse him from his lethargy, and summon up all his zeal and enterprize. A professor of divinity, named Conradus Vorstius, the disciple of Arminius, was called from a German to a Dutch university, that of Leyden; he differed from his Britannic majesty in some nice questions concerning the intimate essence and secret decrees of God, he was considered as a dangerous rival in scholastic fame, and was, at last, obliged to yield to the legions of that royal doctor, whose syllogisms he might have refuted or eluded. James was so inflamed at the heresy (x), that after having commented on the most offensive passages in the book published by Vorstius, he put an express injunction to the States to discharge and punish that blasphemous monster, as he called him. The States, however, paid so little regard to the opinion of James, or to his commands, that Vorstius was acquitted with honour, and continued in his professorship. This drew from Winwood, James's ambassador at the Hague, a threatening protest, which, however, after his purpose was answered, James afterwards disclaimed. If vigour was wanting in other incidents of James's reign, here he behaved even with haughtiness and insolence; and the States were obliged, after several remonstrances, to deprive Vorstius of his chair, and to banish him their dominions. The king carried no farther his animosity against that professor; though he had very charitably hinted to the States, "That, as to the burning of Vorstius for his blasphemies and atheism, he left them to their own Christian wisdom; but surely never heretic better deserved the flames." It is to be remarked, that, at this period, all over Europe, except in Holland alone, the practice of burning heretics still prevailed, even in Protestant countries; and instances were not wanting in England during the reign of James (y).

To consider James in a more advantageous light, we must take a view of him as the legislator of Ireland; and most of the institutions, which he had framed for civilizing that kingdom, being finished about this period, it may not here be improper to give some account of them. He frequently boasts of the management of Ireland as his master-piece; and it will appear, upon inquiry, that his vanity in this particular, was not altogether without foundation.

After the subjection of Ireland by Elizabeth, the more difficult task still remained; to civilize the inhabitants, to reconcile them to laws and industry, and to render their subjection durable and useful to the crown of England. James proceeded in this work by a steady, regular, and well-concerted plan; and in the space of nine years, according to sir John Davis (z), he made greater advances towards the reformation of that kingdom, than had been made in the four hundred and forty years which had elapsed since the conquest was first attempted. It was previously necessary to abolish the Irish customs, which supplied the place of laws, and which were calculated to keep that people for ever in a state of barbarism and disorder.

By the Brehon law or custom, every crime, however enormous, was punished, not with death, but by a fine or pecuniary mulct, which was levied upon the criminal. Even murder itself was atoned for in this manner; and each man, according to his rank, had a different rate or value affixed to him, which if any one were willing to pay, he needed not fear assassinating his enemy. This rate was called his eric. When sir William Fitzwilliams, being lord deputy, told Maguire, that he was to send a sheriff into Fermannah, which, a little before, had been made a county, and subjected to the English law; "Your sheriff, said Maguire, shall be welcome to me: but let me know, beforehand, his eric, or the price of his head, that, if my people cut it off, I may levy the money upon the county." As for oppression, extortion, and other trespasses, so little were they regarded, that no penalty was affixed to them, and no redress for such offences could ever be obtained.

The customs of Gavelkinde and Tanistry were attended with the same absurdity in the distribution of property. The land, by the custom of Gavelkinde, was divided among all the males of the sept or family, both bastard and legitimate: and, after partition made, if any of the sept died, his portion was not shared out among his sons; but the chieftain, at his discretion, made a new partition of all the lands belonging to that sept, and gave every one his share. As no man, by reason of this custom, enjoyed the fixed property of any land; to build, to plant, to enclose, to cultivate, to improve, would have been so much lost labour.

The chieftains and the tanists, though drawn from the principal families were not hereditary, but were established by election, or, more properly speaking, by force and violence. Their authority was almost absolute; and, notwithstanding that certain lands were assigned to the office, its chief profit resulted from exactions, dues, assessments, for which there was no fixed law, and which were levied at pleasure. Hence arose that common bye-word among the Irish, "That they dwelt westward of the law, which majesty: but there was a mean number, which might accord us both; and that was ten: which, says my lord treasurer, is a sacred number; for so many were God's commandments, which tend to virtue and edification." If the commons really voted twenty thousand pounds a-year more, on account of this pleasant conceit of the king and the treasurer, it was certainly the best paid wit, for its goodness, that ever was in the world.

(x) James's quarrel with Vorstius was a personal one: he took offence at the ironical manner in which he is treated in a work of this author's. Barneveldt, the republican, patronized Vorstius, and prince Maurice opposed him: this circumstance perhaps encreased the monarch's warmth. Salisbury expatiates on his master's zeal in these terms: "Almighty God (writes he) doth know the zeal which stirreth the king against that man (Vorstius) so kindles in him upon every accident of discourse, as we have all reason to bless God in making us subjects to a king, that, without mixture of glory or private design, taketh so much to heart the injury that is done to the Blessed Trinity." Winwood, vol. iii. p. 316.

(y) Edward Wightman and Bartholomew Legate were actually burnt in England by James's warrant, after having been convicted of erroneous doctrine, and canonically condemned by Neal bishop of Coventry, and king bishop of London. One of these unhappy people was a lunatic at the time of his condemnation.

dwelt

dwelt beyond the river of the Barrow:" meaning the country where the English inhabited, and which extended not beyond the compass of twenty miles, lying in the neighbourhood of Dublin.

After having abolished the Irish customs, and substituted English law in their place; James took all the natives under his protection, and in 1612 declared them free citizens, after which he proceeded to govern them by a regular administration, military as well as civil. A small army was maintained, its discipline inspected, and its pay transmitted from England, in order to keep the soldiers from preying upon the country, as had been usual in former reigns. When sir Cahir O'Doghartie, an enterprizing youth, raised an insurrection, and massacred the garrisons of several forts, a reinforcement was sent over, O'Doghartie was slain, and the flames of that rebellion were immediately extinguished. Some of his adherents were executed as traitors, and vast confiscations resulted from the enterprize.

All minds being first quieted by a general indemnity; circuits were established, justice administered, oppression banished, and crimes and disorders of every kind severely punished. As the Irish had been universally engaged in the rebellion against Elizabeth, a resignation of all the rights, which had been formerly granted them to separate jurisdictions, was rigorously exacted; and no authority, but that of the king and the law, was permitted throughout the kingdom.

A resignation of all private estates was even required; and when they were restored, the proprietors received them under such conditions as might prevent, for the future, all tyranny and oppression over the common people. The value of the dues, which the nobles usually claimed from their vassals, was estimated at a fixed sum, and all farther exactions prohibited under severe penalties.

A considerable part of the province of Ulster having now devolved to the crown, in consequence of the treasonable conduct of the proprietors, James resolved to allot the lands to such of his subjects as would undertake, on certain conditions, the formation of a regular settlement. That no person might receive a larger portion than he could conveniently plant, the greatest share was fixed at two thousand acres. The undertakers (as they were called) were respectively required to build a strong castle, if they engaged for the largest shares; or a substantial house for a middle share; or, for the smallest portion, a bawn or fortified court. Their tenants were directed to build houses near the castle or principal mansion, for the purposes of mutual protection. The king consented to furnish them, gratis, for the first two years, with as much timber as would be requisite; and, for their further encouragement, he permitted them, for the space of five years, to import into Ireland, from any part of Great Britain, materials for building and husbandry, cattle, and all kinds of provision, without the payment of customs; and also to export, for seven years, on the same easy terms, such commodities as the lands now distributed should produce. These proposals occasioned numerous applications from the enterprizing inhabitants of Great Britain; and the Irish being allowed to join in the scheme, the shares were quickly appropriated. The citizens of London engaged with alacrity in the colonial project. A party of them entered into a society, which was incorporated under the title of "The Governor and Assistants of the new Plantation of Ulster." Under their auspices the town of Derry was rebuilt; and it received, from its new founders, the appellation of London-Derry. Well built towns began to appear in different parts of Ulster; agriculture and manufactures soon flourished in seats of indolence and barbarism; the spirit of commerce was introduced; and, by the institution of free schools, the advantages of education were disseminated. The success of the Ulster plantation encouraged the king to establish colonies in the province of Leinster; and, from his laudable attention to the affairs of Ireland, that kingdom, instead of being a burden, became a valuable appendage to the crown of Great Britain.

Such were the arts, by which James introduced humanity and justice among a people, who had ever been buried in the most profound barbarism.

A laudable act of justice was, about this time, executed in England upon lord Sanquhir, a Scottish nobleman, who had been guilty of the base assassination of Turner, a fencing-master. The English nation, who were generally dissatisfied with the Scots, were enraged at this crime, equally mean and atrocious; but James appeased them, by preferring the severity of law to the intercession of the friends and family of the criminal.

The sudden death of Henry, prince of Wales, on the 6th of November, 1612, diffused an universal grief throughout the nation. Though youth and royal birth, both of them strong allurements, prepossess men mightily in favour of the early age of princes; it is with peculiar fondness that historians mention Henry: and, in every respect, his merit seems to have been extraordinary. He had not reached his eighteenth year, and already possessed more dignity in his behaviour, and commanded more respect, than his father, with all his age, learning, and experience. Neither his high fortune, nor his youth, had seduced him into any irregular pleasures: business and ambition seem to have been his sole passion. His inclinations, as well as exercises, were martial. The French ambassador taking leave of him, and asking his commands for France, found him employed in the exercise of the pike; "Tell your king, said he, in what occupation you left me engaged (a)." He had conceived great affection and esteem for the brave sir Walter Raleigh. It was his saying, "Sure no king but my father would keep such a bird in a cage (b)." He seems indeed to have nourished too violent a contempt for the king on account of his pedantry and pusillanimity; and by that means was pleased with the restless and martial spirit of the English nation. Had he lived, he had probably promoted the glory, perhaps not the felicity, of his people. The unhappy prepossession, which men commonly entertain in favour of ambition, courage, enterprize, and other warlike virtues, engages generous natures, who always love fame, into such pursuits as destroy their own peace, and that of the rest of mankind. Several reports were propagated concerning the manner of his death; and it was even hinted that Henry had been carried off by poison; but the physicians, on opening his body, found no symptoms to confirm such an opinion. The bold and criminal malignity of men's tongues and pens spared not even the king on the occasion. Indeed the prince was of so forward a character, that he was supposed to have become disagreeable to his father. But James's character seems rather to have failed in the extreme of facility and humanity, than in that of cruelty and violence, with respect to his own family. His indulgence to Henry was great, and perhaps imprudent, by giving him a large and independent settlement, even in so early youth. The people were undoubtedly inclined to favour him from his avowed contrariety to his father, who at present had incurred a great degree of popular odium.

The marriage of the princess Elizabeth, with Frederic, elector palatine, was finished some time after the death of the prince, and served to dissipate the grief which affected James on that melancholy event. But this marriage, though celebrated with great joy and festivity (c), proved, itself, an unhappy event to the king, as well as to his son-in-law, and had ill consequences on the reputation and fortunes of both. The elector, trusting to so great an alliance, engaged in enterprizes beyond his strength: and the king, not being able to support him in his distress, lost entirely, in the end of his life, what remained of the affections and esteem of his own subjects.

The recent fate of Arabella Stewart was a very contrary one to that of her kinswoman Elizabeth. James, to whom she was cousin-germain, had seized on her possessions, and reduced her to a pension. The unhappy maiden, tired of this dependent state, and urged by youthful inclination, entered into an intrigue with Seymour, grandson to the earl of Hertford, whom, notwithstanding several reprimands from the higher powers, she privately married. Both the delinquents were seized on, but they made their escape, one on board of a French bark, the other on board of a Newcastle collier. The unhappy Arabella was re-taken, and conveyed to the Tower. The fatigue she had undergone, the severity of her treatment, and the keenness of her disappointment, had so fatal an effect upon her tender constitution, that she immediately mediately lost her senses, and soon after her life. Her husband did not venture to return to his country till after her death. The jealousy which the nearness of Arabella's consanguinity occasioned to the crown, was the undoubted, nay the avowed, cause of her melancholy fate (d).

Except during sessions of parliament, the history of this reign may more properly be called the history of the court than that of the nation. An interesting object had, for some years, engaged the attention of the court: it was a favourite, and one beloved by James with so profuse and unlimited an affection, as left no room for any rival or competitor. About the close of the year 1609, Robert Carr, a youth of twenty years of age, and of a good family in Scotland, arrived in London, after having passed some time in his travels. All his natural accomplishments consisted in good looks: all his acquired abilities, in an easy air and graceful demeanour. He had letters of recommendation to his countryman lord Hay; and that nobleman no sooner cast his eye upon him, than he discovered talents sufficient to entitle him immediately to make a great figure in the government. That nobleman, apprized of the king's passion for youth and beauty, and exterior appearance, studied how matters might be so managed that this new object should make the strongest impression upon the monarch. Without mentioning him at court, he assigned him the office, at a match at tilting, of presenting to the king his buckler and device; and hoped that he would attract the attention of the monarch. Fortune proved favourable to his design, by an incident which bore at first a contrary aspect. When Carr was advancing to execute his office, his unruly horse started and threw him; by which accident his leg was broke in the king's presence. James approached him with pity and concern: love and affection arose on the sight of his beauty and tender years; and the prince ordered him immediately to be lodged in the palace, and to be carefully attended by his own physicians. He himself, after the tilting, paid him a visit in his chamber, and frequently returned during the course of his confinement. The ignorance and simplicity of the boy finished the conquest, begun by his exterior graces and accomplishments. Other princes have been fond of chusing their favourites from among the lower ranks of their subjects, and have reposed themselves on them with the more unreserved confidence and affection, because the object has been beholden to their bounty for every honour and acquisition: James was desirous that his favourite should also derive from him all his sense, experience, and knowledge. Highly conceited of his own wisdom, he pleased himself with the fancy, that this raw youth, by his lessons and instructions, would, in a little time, be equal to his most sagacious ministers, and be initiated into all the profound mysteries of government, on which he set so high a value. And as this kind of creation was more perfectly his own work than any other, he seems to have indulged an unlimited fondness for his minion, beyond even that which he bore to his own children. Shortly after his recovery he knighted him, made him a gentleman of the bed-chamber, created him viscount Rochester, gave him the garter, brought him into the privy council, and though, at first, without assigning him any particular office, bestowed on him the supreme direction of all his business and political concerns. Agreeable to this rapid advancement in confidence and honour, were the riches heaped upon the needy favourite; and while Salisbury and all the wisest ministers could scarcely find expedients sufficient to keep in motion the overburthened machine of government, James, with unsparing hand, loaded with treasures this insignificant and useless pageant (e).

The favourite was not, however at first, so intoxicated with advancement, as not to be sensible of his own ignorance and inexperience. He had recourse to the assistance and advice of a friend; and he was more fortunate in his choice, than is usual with such pampered minions. In sir Thomas Overbury he met with a judicious and sincere counsellor, who, building all hopes of his own preferment on that of the young favourite, endeavoured to instil into him the principles of prudence and discretion. By zealously serving every body, Carr was taught to abate the envy which might attend his sudden elevation: by shewing a preference for the English, he learned to escape the prejudices which prevailed against his country; and so long as he was content to be ruled by Overbury's friendly counsels, he enjoyed, what is rare, the highest favour of the prince, without being despised by the people.

To complete the measure of courtly happiness, nought was wanting but a kind mistress; and, where high fortune concurred with all the graces of youth and beauty, this circumstance could not be difficult to attain. But it was here that the favourite met with that rock on which all his fortunes were wrecked, and which plunged him for ever into an abyss of infamy, guilt, and misery.

No sooner had James mounted the throne of England, than he remembered his friendship for the unfortunate families of Howard and Devereux (f), who had suffered for their attachment to the cause of Mary and to his own. Having restored young Essex to his blood and dignity, and conferred the titles of Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the house of Norfolk, he sought the farther pleasure of uniting these families by the marriage of the earl of Essex with lady Frances Howard, daughter of the earl of Suffolk. She was only thirteen, he fourteen years of age; and it was thought proper, till both should attain the age of puberty, that he should go abroad and pass some time in his travels. He returned into England after an absence of four years, and was pleased to find his countess in the full lustre of beauty, and possessed of the love and admiration of the whole court. But, when the earl approached, and claimed the privileges of a husband, he met with nothing but symptoms of aversion and disgust, and a flat refusal of any farther familiarities. He applied to her parents, who constrained her to attend him into the country, and to partake of his bed; nothing, however, could overcome her rigid sullenness and obstinacy; and she still rose from his side, without having shared the nuptial pleasures. Disgusted with reiterated denials, he at last gave over the pursuit, and separating himself from her, thenceforth abandoned her conduct to her own will and discretion.

Such coldness and aversion in lady Essex, arose not without an attachment to another object. The favourite had opened his addresses, and had been too successful in making impression on the tender heart of the young countess. She imagined that, so long as she refused the embraces of Essex, she never could be deemed his wife, and that a separation and divorce might still open the way for a new marriage with her beloved Rochester (g). Though their passion was so violent, and their opportunities of intercourse so frequent, that they had already indulged themselves in all the gratifications of love, they still lamented their unhappy fate, while the union between them was not entire and indissoluble. And the lover, as well as his mistress, was impatient, till their mutual ardour should be crowned by marriage.

This momentous affair could not be concluded without consulting Overbury, with whom Rochester was accustomed to share all his secrets. While that faithful friend had considered his patron's attachment to the countess of Essex merely as an affair of gallantry, he had favoured its progress; and it was partly owing to the ingenious and passionate letters which he dictated, that Rochester had met with such success in his addresses. Like an experienced courtier, he entertained the idea, that a conquest of this nature would throw a lustre on the young favourite, and would tend still farther to endear him to James, who was charmed to hear of the amours of his court, and listened with attention to every tale of gallantry. But great was Overbury's alarm, when Rochester mentioned his design of marrying the countess; and he used every method to dissuade his friend from an attempt fraught with so much folly and wickedness. He represented how invidious, how difficult an enterprize to procure her a divorce from her husband: how dangerous, how shameful, to take into his own bed a profligate woman, who, being married to a young nobleman of the first rank, had not scrupled to prostitute her character, and to bestow favours on the object of a capricious and momentary passion. And, in the zeal of friendship, he went so far as to threaten Rochester, that he would separate himself for ever from him, if he could so far forget his honour and his interest as to prosecute the marriage he intended with the countess of Essex (h).

(d) On the first news of the flight of this unhappy pair, letters had been dispatched to the king and queen of France, and to the archduke, requiring them to deliver them up, if they should land on their territories. The countess of Shrewsbury, who had given her assistance towards the match, was confined in the Tower; and the earl her husband to his own house. Sir Francis Bacon displayed his genius in aggravating the supposed crimes of all that were concerned in this trivial matter.

(e) It is said, that the king found his pupil so slenderly educated, as to be ignorant even of the lowest rudiments of the Latin tongue; and that the monarch, laying aside the sceptre, took the birch into his royal hand, and instructed him in the principles of grammar. During the intervals of this noble occupation, affairs of state would be introduced; and the stripling, by the ascendant which he had acquired, was now enabled to repay in political, what he had received in grammatical, instruction. Such scenes and such incidents are the more ridiculous, though the less odious, as the passion of James seems not to have contained in it any thing criminal or flagitious. History charges herself willingly with a relation of the great crimes, and still more with that of the great virtues of mankind; but she appears to fall from her dignity, when necessitated to dwell on such frivolous events and ignoble personages. Hume.

Notwithstanding this wise counsel of Overbury, Rochester had the weakness to reveal this conversation to the countess; and when her rage and fury broke out against Overbury, he had also the weakness to enter into her vindictive projects, and to swear vengeance against his friend, for the utmost instance, which he could receive, of his faithful friendship. Some contrivance was necessary for the execution of their purpose. Rochester addressed himself to the king; and after complaining, that his own indulgence to Overbury had begotten in him a degree of arrogance, which was extremely disagreeable, he procured a commission for his embassy to Russia; which he represented as a retreat for his friend, both profitable and honourable. When consulted by Overbury, he earnestly dissuaded him from accepting this offer, and took on himself the office of satisfying the king, if he should be in any measure displeased with the refusal (i). To the king again he aggravated the insolence of Overbury's conduct, and obtained a warrant for committing him to the Tower, on the 21st of April, which James intended as a slight punishment for his disobedience. The lieutenant of the Tower was a creature of Rochester's, and had lately been put into the office for this very purpose: he confined Overbury so strictly, that the unhappy prisoner was debarred the sight even of his nearest relations; and no communication of any kind was allowed with him, during near six months which he lived in prison.

This obstacle being removed, the lovers pursued their purpose; and the king himself, forgetting the dignity of his character, and his friendship for the family of Essex, entered zealously into the project of procuring the countess a divorce from her husband. Essex also embraced the opportunity of separating himself from a bad woman, by whom he was despised; and he was willing to favour their success by any honourable expedient. The pretence for a divorce was his incapacity to fulfil the conjugal duties; and he confessed, that, with regard to the countess, he was conscious of such an infirmity, though he was not sensible of it with regard to any other woman. In her place too, it is said a young virgin was substituted under a mask, to undergo a legal inspection by a jury of matrons. After such a trial, seconded by court-influence, and supported by the ridiculous opinion of fascination or witchcraft, the sentence of divorce was pronounced between the earl of Essex and his countess (k). And, to crown the scene, the king, solicitous lest the lady should lose any rank by her new marriage, bestowed on his favourite the title of earl of Somerset.

Notwithstanding this success, the countess of Somerset was not satisfied, till she should farther satiate her revenge on Overbury; and she engaged her husband, as well as her uncle, the earl of Northampton, in the atrocious design of taking him off secretly by poison. Fruitless attempts were reiterated by weak poisons; but, at last, they gave him one, on the 16th of September, so sudden and violent, that the symptoms were apparent to every one who approached him (l). His interment was hurried on with the greatest precipitation; and, though a strong suspicion immediately prevailed in the minds of the public, the full proof of the crime was not brought to light till some years after.

The fatal catastrophe of Overbury increased the suspicion, that the prince of Wales had been carried off by a similar potion, given him by Somerset. Men considered not, that the contrary inference was much juster. If Somerset was so great a novice in this detestable art, that, during the course of five months, a man who was his prisoner, and attended by none but his emissaries, could not be dispatched but in so bungling a manner; how could it be imagined that a young prince, living in his own court, surrounded by his own friends and domestics, could be exposed to Somerset's attempts, and be taken off by so subtle a poison, if such a one exist, as could elude the skill of the most experienced physicians?

The earl of Salisbury, the ablest minister that James ever possessed, died May 14, 1612; and was succeeded by the earl of Suffolk, a man of mean capacity. And it was now his task to supply, from an exhausted treasury, the profusion of James and of his young favourite. Indeed so great was James's affection for this young man, that he said openly in his council, That he took more delight in Rochester's company than in any man's living.

The difficulty of raising money still increasing, a project which had been formed by Salisbury was now carried into execution (m). An hereditary rank, which should take place after a baron's youngest son, and dignified by the title of Baronet, was purchased from the crown, at the price of a thousand pounds (n). An inferior order to them, with the title of Knights of Nova Scotia, at the price of three hundred pounds. The dignities of baron, viscount, and earl, were fixed respectively at ten, fifteen, and twenty thousand pounds. The star-chamber also took every pretext to condemn to excessive fines, for the king's use, those that were cited before them. Privy seals were circulated to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds: benevolences were exacted to the amount of fifty-two thousand pounds; and some monopolies of no great value were erected. But all these expedients proved insufficient to supply the king's necessities, even though he began to enter into some schemes for retrenching his expences. The absurd custom of duelling (o) had been imported in the reign of James into this country from France; there it had taken its rise and growth, under Henry the Fourth: he had in some respect been the occasion of the ignominious fate of the lord Sanquhir, by asking him, with an air that was construed by the unhappy nobleman significant, "Whether the fencing-master (whom he afterwards on this hint murdered, and who had put out his eye in a fencing-bout) was yet alive?"

Four able men were at this time at the head of the law: sir Edward Coke, sir Henry Hobart, sir Francis Bacon, and sir Henry Yelverton. This last had distinguished himself very eminently in an opposition to the large grant that was given to the crown in the third session of parliament. Sir Francis Bacon, on his entering into the office of solicitor-general, protected Priest and Wright, two duellists; he made a speech in the star-chamber on the occasion, that was much admired; but the objects were of too mean condition to strike an important example. These were not the only flagrant disorders that had crept into the commonwealth: the excessive love of pleasure that possessed the court infected all ranks of men; every night produced masks, in which people of fortune engaged; idleness, expence, and pleasure, took place of industry, frugality, simplicity, and learning. Nor was the evil partially extended: spacious buildings were erected for exhibiting theatrical performances (p) to the multitude; and these shews, that carry in them a poison subversive of the virtues on which the welfare of large societies is founded, became the idols of the people.

At this time James made offer of a large parcel of plate, pawned to queen Elizabeth by the States General, in 1587, and belonging to the house of Burgundy, to be redeemed; threatening, that if it was not he would melt it down. Winwood.

(n) Each knight was to maintain thirty foot soldiers in Ireland for three years, at the rate of eight-pence a-day, and to pay the wages of one year, upon the passing the patent. The whole sum that was raised upon these baronets was one thousand and ninety-five pounds, as a composition for their maintaining the soldiers in Ulster. Baker's Chronicle, 1679, p. 416. Guthrie, vol. iii. p. 704.

(o) Many duels were fought between the individuals of the Scotch and English nations. One of the Scotch court domestics had offered a gross affront to a bencher at Gray's Inn. Another had beaten Philip Herbert, younger brother to the earl of Pembroke, who was rewarded with a peerage for his pusillanimity in not resenting the affront.

(p) These were destructive to the religious sentiments, as well as the morals of the vulgar. A statute was enacted in the third year of James's reign, for the preventing and avoiding of the great abuse of the holy name of God in stage-plays, interludes, may-games, shews, and such-like. Vide Statutes at Large.

The filial piety of James, which had lain long dormant, now for the first time exerted itself to action. The body of Mary, queen of Scots, was removed at his expence from Peterborough to Westminster, and a tomb with many pompous inscriptions erected.

Among the regulations enacted this year in the councils of Scotland, the following one carries with it too much of the disposition and turn of thinking of the monarch to be omitted. The counsellors, to keep their persons and places in great respect were commanded to ride in the streets, either with foot-clothes or in coaches, but never to be seen on foot.

The court, notwithstanding the large sums it had exacted on various pretences, was at length driven into the necessity of parliamentary resources. A public lottery, the first of its kind in England, afforded a small delay; but the invention of the ministry being drained as empty as the exchequer, a parliament was called for the fifth of April, 1614. It was reported, that several persons, attached to the king, had entered into a confederacy; and having laid a regular plan for the new elections, had distributed their interest all over England, and had undertaken to secure a majority for the court. So ignorant were the commons, that they knew not this incident to be the first infallible symptom of any regular or established liberty. Had they been contented to follow the maxims of their predecessors, who, as the earl of Salisbury said to the last parliament, never, but thrice in six hundred years, refused a supply (q); they needed not dread that the crown should ever interest itself in their elections. Formerly, the kings even insisted, that none of their household should be elected members; and though the charter was afterwards declared void, Henry VI. from his great favour to the city of York, conferred a peculiar privilege on its citizens, that they should be exempted from this trouble (r). It is well known, that, in ancient times, a seat in the house being considered as a burthen, attended neither with honour nor profit, it was requisite for the counties and boroughs to pay fees to their representatives. About this time a seat began to be regarded as an honour, and the country gentlemen contended for it; though the practice of levying wages for the parliament men was not altogether discontinued. It was not till long after, when liberty was thoroughly established, and popular assemblies entered into every branch of public business, that the members began to join profit to honour, and the crown found it necessary to distribute among them all the considerable offices of the kingdom.

It was from the asssurances of his ministers that James assented to make trial of a new parliament, and assumed so much as to demand contribution without bargain; and to declare he would rather lose his life, than the honours and flowers of his crown (s). The first business that the parliament entered on was the settlement of the succession on the issue of Elizabeth, in default of the male line (t). After this both houses were summoned into the royal presence at the Banqueting-house, Whitehall; where the monarch, after some excuses and protestations upon the abuses of the government, earnestly recommended to them concord with the crown, and unanimity in the granting a supply (u). Notwithstanding the cautious endeavours of the ministry, it quickly appeared that the members were not of the proper stamp to serve the court purposes. The opposition carried a motion against the attorney-general's serving as a member of the house of commons (v). The courtiers exhausted their arguments for a speedy supply; but it was determined that a redress of grievances should precede it. Committees were appointed for preparing lists of all the national complaints. The indulgence to the papists, and severe treatment of the non-conformists, were vehemently complained of. A bill was prepared for preventing taxes and impositions on merchants, and the debate on it proceeded with great warmth (w). Certain patentees for monopolies were ordered to surrender their patents. Sir Thomas Parry, one of the creatures of the court, who had been the most busy in managing elections, was expelled the house (x). This was followed by an order for the officers of peace for London and Middlesex to bring in the letters they had received in favour of popish recusants.

In a renewed debate concerning impositions, sir Henry Wootton, who had been employed as ambassador to Venice, and Winwood, the present secretary of state, attempted to prove, that all hereditary princes had a right to impose taxes, though elective ones had not; and instanced the princes of Germany and Italy, with the kings of France and Spain; particularly Henry the Fourth's raising fourteen millions eight hundred thousand pounds, by an imposition on salt only. These absurd comparisons between princes, whose powers and prerogatives were different, according to the different limitations of their respective governments, were ridiculed by the house. Sir Roger Owen advanced, "That the imposition laid by the French king was an usurpation, and contrary to the fundamental laws of France; that the dukedoms of Florence and Milan were mere tyrannies." Sir Thomas Roe, "That if the kings of Spain had such a power, they had received it from the cortes, or parliaments." Sir Edwyn Sandys observed, "That the courtiers' arguments made against themselves, since the French king had raised so immense a sum on his subjects from such an assumed power; that the kings of France, and the rest of the imposing princes, do also make laws, which in a short time will bring all things to a tyrannical course and confusion, both to prince and people: witness the death of the last great imposing prince." In answer to the distinction between an elective and an hereditary prince, he maintained, "That all kings were originally elected, except such as came in by the sword; whom, for that reason, it was lawful to expel by the sword, whenever the people had the power to do it (y)."

(q) Journ. 17 Feb. 1609. It appears, however, that Salisbury was somewhat mistaken in this fact: and if the kings were not oftener refused supply by the parliament, it was only because they would not often expose themselves to the hazard of being refused: but it is certain that English parliaments did anciently carry their frugality to an extreme, and seldom could be prevailed upon to give the necessary support to government.

(r) Coke's Institutes, part 4. chap. i. of Charters of Exemption.

(s) The following, which is the exordium to the speech he made at the opening of the sessions, is in too peculiar a stile to be omitted:—"It is the sayeing of the wyseste king that evere was, that the harte of kings weare inscrutable; but in the last parliament, I muste calle to your remembrance the comparrisone I used, whearin I presented myselfe unto you as a mirrore, whearin you mighte cleerlye see the integretye of my purpos for our lengtheninge that parliamente for the generall good and benefyte of the commonwelthe; but as I then sayd of the nature of a mirrore, that it mighte be deffyled by the eyes of the beholderes, so did some of the lowere house looke upon me with polluted eyes, and, as I may saye, deffyled my mirrore. I canne say no more nowe than I did then, but to offere you the same mirrore, to looke to, protestyng, as I shall answere it to Almyghty God, that my integretye is like the whitness of my roabe, my purety like the mettle of golde in my crown, my firmness and clearness, like the presious stones I weare, and my affectyones naturalle, like the redness of my harte." Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 273.

(t) This settlement, which was in consequence of a demand of the king, and the recognition-bill in the beginning of his reign, are two of the remarkable instances which shew that the hereditary succession to the crown of England is not absolute; and that such a monarchical claim is founded on the neglect of asserting the right of assent, and not on any clearly proved principles in the constitution.

(u) The arguments he made use of for this purpose were as follow: "That as the laste parliamente begane with trouble and contenshone, and ended so, so this maye begine with alacritye and love, and conclude so lykewise; whaer safty shall be abroade, and love at home, and all aspersiones and rumores of discontente between me and my people shall be taken awaye, and wee maye synge togethere, Ecce! quam bonum & jucundum. And when you shall retwrne to your contraye, you shall have prayses, and be approoved in the choyse made of you, that you have given contente to your king." Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 285.

(v) In the debates on this subject, sir Roger Owen shewed, That no attorney-general was ever chosen; nor, anciently, any privy counsellor; nor any that took livery of the king. The precedent he quoted for this was in the seventh year of Richard II. when a knight bannaret was rejected on this account. It was resolved on the question, that the attorney-general should remain in the house for this parliament, but that he should never serve for the future. James had condescended to solicit the house that the attorney-general might keep his seat this parliament.

(w) In a question whether the king had a right of imposing taxes, it was unanimously carried in the negative; notwithstanding the corruption of the judges had given it against the people.

(x) Warm arguments were urged against this business of undertaking. Sir Roger Owen asserted, that it was one of the articles for deposing Richard the Second.

The king had sent to desire that sir Thomas's punishment might be left to him, with a promise that it should be more severe than the commons themselves would inflict. This request was not granted.

(y) Sir Edwyn Sandys had expressed his resentment of this usurpation with great vigour and spirit, when the subject of impositions was first argued in the house. "Some other princes, he said, had imposed, but never claimed, any right; now, the king had claimed it in open parliament: they upon four or five; this king upon so many hundreds: they but for a few months, and, at the prayer of the commons in parliament, put down; here made perpetual by letters patent. That this liberty of imposing trenches on the foundation of all our interests, maketh us bondmen, giveth us no propriety; the king may by the same reasons make laws without parliaments, Journals of Parliament, vol. i. p. 472.

It appears by the Journals, that James, after obtaining the judgement of the Exchequer, had published certain settled arbitrary rates and imposts upon goods, for himself and his heirs for ever. The commons said, that this was strange, because no proclamation bound longer than the king's life; that the judgement in the Exchequer was erroneous and unconstitutional; and that the matter was above all judgement, but that of parliament. Journals, vol. i. p. 481, & seq.

A demand

A demand was made for a conference with the lords (z) concerning a remonstrance against the king's imposing taxes without the consent of parliament; and the commons displayed an admirable skill, aptness, and judgement, in drawing up the heads on which they intended to proceed. The lords shewed themselves extremely jealous of so spirited an exertion, and refused their consent to a conference. This brought on a complaint against Richard Neile (a), bishop of Lincoln, who, in an advice to the lords not to agree with the request of the commons, had affirmed, the matter on which the conference was desired struck not only at the branch, but at the root of the prerogative; that it was contrary to the oaths of allegiance to confer on it; and that he doubted not but there would proceed some undutiful and seditious speeches from the committees of that house, which it would be unfit for them to hear. Many expostulations passed between the two houses on this subject (b): the commons refused to proceed on any business till they had received full satisfaction, which occasioned an angry message from the king, threatening to dissolve them if they did not proceed on the business of supply (c). Papers of arbitrary projects to govern without parliaments were every night flung about the streets. But these threats did not deter the commons from keeping firm to their resolution. The king finding that it was impossible to obtain a supply, without remitting some of his high pretensions; and fearing for his creatures, should the parliament continue to sit, dissolved them on the seventh of June, before even one statute was enacted.

In this parliament the opposition had fallen very violently upon the new-created titles, on the lottery, on the admission of papists to offices and honours, and on the many proposals which had been made to marry the king's son to a popish princess. Neither did the increasing growth of luxury, which had been propagated by the example of the court, escape the censure of the patriot members: a bill against gold, silver, gilding, &c. was brought into the house, and received with approbation. It was pleaded that this sumptuary law was consonant to the ordinances of God and nature; that vain expence in apparel, and other kinds of shew, was the cause of the want of hospitality: and to convince the house of the enormous height to which this despicable vice had arose in that centre of extravagance and folly, the court, an example was mentioned of a great courtier having expended eighteen pounds a-year upon shoestrings. James was so injudicious as to wreak his vengeance on the leading members: and several of them were thrown into prison: Thomas Wentworth, afterwards earl of Strafford, was one of these sufferers (d). A benevolence was demanded in a very arbitrary manner; but it met with such a firm spirit of opposition from all ranks of men, that it answered very indifferently the purposes of the court.

The king of Denmark paid his brother-in-law another visit, and dissipation continued strongly to prevail. Whilst this monarch was in England, a court cabal began to threaten the fortune of the favourite Somerset; a man who differed in no respect from the common herd, excepting in the degree of his vices, which had attained an astonishing height from the pampering of a luxurious court. A viciousness which had no balance from sense, experience, or judgement, drove him into excesses that at length afforded his enemies a full opportunity to effect his ruin.

The favourite had hitherto escaped the inquiry of justice; but he had not escaped that still voice which can make itself be heard amidst all the hurry and flattery of a court, and astonishes the criminal with a just representation of his most secret enormities. Conscious of the murder of his friend, sir Thomas Overbury, Somerset received small consolation from the enjoyments of love, or the indulgence of his sovereign. The graces of his youth gradually disappeared, the gaiety of his manners was obscured, his polite behaviour was changed into sullenness; and the king, whose affections had been engaged by these superficial accomplishments, began to estrange himself from a man who no longer contributed to his amusement. The sagacious courtiers observed the first symptoms of this disgust: Somerset's enemies seized the opportunity, and offered a new minion to the king. George Villiers, a youth of one-and-twenty, younger brother of a good family, returned at this time, in the beginning of 1615, from his travels, and was remarked for the advantages of a handsome person, genteel air, and fashionable apparel. At a comedy he was purposely placed in James's sight, and immediately engaged the attention, and, in the same instant, the affections of that monarch. Ashamed of his sudden attachment, the king endeavoured, but in vain, to conceal the partiality which he felt for the handsome stranger; and he employed all his profound politics to fix him in his service, without seeming to desire it. He declared his resolution not to confer any office on him, unless entreated by the queen; and pretended, that it should only be in complaisance to her choice he would agree to admit him near his person. The queen was immediately applied to; but she, well knowing the extravagant height to which the king carried these attachments, refused, at first, to lend her countenance to this new passion. It was not till entreated by Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, a decent prelate, and one much prejudiced against Somerset, that she would condescend to oblige her husband, by asking this favour of him (e). And the king, thinking now that all appearances were fully saved, no longer constrained his affection, but immediately bestowed the office of cupbearer on young Villiers.

The whole court was thrown into parties between the two favourites; while some endeavoured to advance the rising fortunes of Villiers, others deemed it safer to adhere to the established credit of Somerset. The king himself, divided between inclination and decorum, increased the doubt and ambiguity of the courtiers; and the stern jealousy of the old favourite, who refused every advance of friendship from his rival, begat perpetual quarrels between their several partizans. But the discovery of Somerset's guilt in the murder of Overbury, at last decided the controversy, and exposed him to the ruin and infamy which he so justly merited.

An apothecary's apprentice, who had been employed in

(z) Sir Roger Owen, who was appointed to open the conference, was directed to make the following observation: That the king, in answer to the last petition of the commons on this head, had referred them to the law of the land, and yet in the mean time proceeded to multiply impositions. Journ. House of Com. vol. i. p. 481.

(a) The following is an anecdote that will serve to illustrate the character of this prelate: Neile, bishop of Lincoln, and Andrews, bishop of Winchester, being at dinner with the king in public, James in this situation had the imprudence to propose aloud this question, "Whether he might not take his subjects' money, without consent of parliament?" The sycophant Neile replied, "God forbid you should not, for you are the breath of our nostrils." Andrews declined answering, and said, He was not skilled in parliamentary cases. On the king's urging him, he replied pleasantly, "I think your majesty has an undoubted right to my brother Neile's money, for he offers it." Life of Andrews, Bishop of Winchester.

(b) In the debates of the lower house, it was proposed to pass a bill to seize his bishopric for seven years towards a supply. Many members testified their concern that the king should be beset with such parasites; Mr. Alford was for carrying their complaint to the king; sir Jerome Horsey said, That they had had continual interruption all this parliament; that this bone amongst the rest was thrown in by a devil, if a bishop might be a devil; he wished a select committee might be nominated to consider of an immediate message to the king. Sir Edwyn Sandys justly observed, that to go immediately to the king, would wrong the liberties of the upper house. The commons were determined by the judicious arguments urged by this member. It was ordered, on the question, that there should be a cessation of all business, but proceedings on the bishop of Lincoln, till an answer should come from the lords concerning that matter. The next day the house received an admonitory letter from the king to desist from their resolution. They were on the point of coming to some severe resolution against informers, when sir Thomas Lake, one of the secretaries of state, discovered that the king had been shewn the order by the speaker, who received a severe reprimand from the house, for his unparliamentary proceeding. The anger of the commons against this offending prelate was heightened by James's meddling in the matter; and, though they received a softening proposal from the lords, they adhered to their resolution of obliging the bishop to answer at the bar of the house of commons. Journals, vol. i. p. 496, & seq.

(c) On an enquiry into the king's necessities it was found, that he was already one million two hundred thousand pounds in debt, and that upwards of eighty-five thousand pounds went yearly in pensions.

(d) This member had expressed his disapprobation of the measures of the court, in a manner improper and intemperate: he applied the two following verses from the prophet Daniel to the late king of France and the king of England: "Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom; but within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle. And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom, but he shall come in peaceably and obtain the kingdom by flatteries." Journals, vol. i. p. 493.

(e) The reason of her unwillingness exhibits a remarkable trait in James's character. "My lord," said she to the archbishop, "you and the rest of you know not what to do; I know your master better than you all; for if this young man be once brought in, the first person that he will plague must be you that labour for him; yea, I shall have my part also; the king will teach him to despise and hardly intreat us all, that he may seem to be beholden to none but himself." James affected sagacity and design in his most trifling concerns, and insisted on the ceremony of the queen's recommending, that he might have to say, upon a complaint of the ill behaviour of his favourite, "It was long of yourself, for you were the party that commended him to me."

making

making up the poisons, having retired to Flushing, began to talk very freely of the whole secret; and the affair at last came to the ears of Trumbal, the king's envoy in the Low Countries. By this means, sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state, was informed, and he immediately carried the intelligence to James.

Somerset now perceived, notwithstanding his master's profound dissimulation, that his favour began to wain. He knew the inveteracy of his enemies, and was conscious of the advantages his crimes had given them. Tortured with the fears of guilt, and the precariousness of his situation, he solicited for a pardon, which he obtained in the fullest form. It was drawn up by sir Robert Cotton, who copied the manner of a pardon granted by Henry the Eighth to Wolsey, with the following questionable clause: "That the king, out of his mere motion and especial favour, did pardon all and all manner of treasons, misprision of treasons, murders, felonies, and outrages whatsoever, by the said Robert, earl of Somerset, committed, or to be hereafter committed." This pardon, though signed by the king, was impeded from passing the offices, by the enemies of Somerset. James by this time had received strong intimations of the guilty secret, but still acted the part of dissimulation, and retired with his quondam favourite to Theobalds in Hertfordshire; either with design to avoid appearing in the prosecution, or to fly from the clamorous rumours of murder. From thence he went to Royston, where he continued to treat Somerset with all the appearances of friendship; and at the same time ordered sir Edward Coke, lord chief justice, and sir Francis Bacon, the attorney-general, to take upon themselves his prosecution. A warrant was actually served on him whilst James, who had an unseemly way of lolling his arms about his favourite's neck, was indulging himself in that posture. Somerset exclaimed against the outrage of arresting him in the king's presence; but James could not be prevailed on to remit it; and feigning an entire ignorance of the affair, cried, "Nay, man, if Coke sends for me I must go;" then, after the most affectionate farewel, as soon as he was carried off, he exclaimed, "Go, and the deel go with thee, for I will neere see thy face more." He told the lord chief justice, that Somerset and his wife had made him a pimp, to carry on their bawdry and murder; and therefore commanded him to examine the affair with strict scrutiny, and to spare no man whatsoever; adding, "God's curse be upon you and yours if you spare any of them, and God's curse be upon me and mine if I pardon any of them." Sir Jervis Ellis, lieutenant of the Tower, Franklin, the apothecary, and other delinquents, were apprehended.

Whatever was the nature of the secret, James's intimacy with Somerset had certainly produced an intercourse which gave him some uneasiness. The letters that sir Francis Bacon wrote on the occasion of the prosecution proved that the criminal was, from this circumstance, formidable enough to require management. "He approves of a charm to be infused into Somerset's ear, but wishes it was more enlarged, and that the utmost favours should be continued, on condition of his prudent demeanors." Somerset continued so assured in his behaviour, that thoughts were entertained of restoring him altogether to favour. Bacon, in another letter, dissuades the king from such an impolitic conduct, and advises certain hopes to be given to the criminal two or three days before the trial; "But all these hopes, continues he, of favour and mercy, are to be understood with this limitation; if he does not, by his contemptuous and insolent carriage at the bar, make himself uncapable and unworthy of them." "That danger, returned James, is well to be foreseen, lest he, upon the one part, commit unpardonable errors, and I, on the other part, seem to punish him in the spirit of revenge."

After these precautions had been used, and the criminal at length convinced that his life depended upon his prudent behaviour, the two principals were brought to their trial (f). The countess pleaded guilty (g), and Somerset made a languid defence. They both received sentence of death, and continued some years in prison; but had afterwards a pardon, and enjoyed a pension of four thousand pounds per annum. In one of the letters which Somerset wrote to James after he was remanded to the Tower, there is this obscure paragraph: "I will say no farther, neither in that which your majesty doubted my aptness to fall into, for my cause nor my confidence is not in that distress as to use that means of intercession." They retired upon their pension, and languished out old age in infamy and obscurity. The union of this guilty couple, which had been accomplished by the violation of the most sacred laws of society, became their severest punishment; for their guilty loves were turned into the most deadly hatred; and they passed many years together in the same house, without any intercourse or correspondence with each other.

These following instruments of the murder, sir Jervis Ellis, lieutenant of the Tower (h), Mrs. Turner (i), Weston, who had been appointed keeper to Overbury, and Franklin, the apothecary, were convicted and executed. Sir Thomas Monson, a creature of Somerset's, was accused as a party, and brought to his trial, but for private reasons was remanded to prison (k). The earl of Northampton, uncle to the countess, had been privy to all the circumstances of the murder, but died a little while after the perpetration of it (l).

The disgrace, fall, and ruin of Somerset, and his banishment from court, removed all obstruction to the rising fortune of Villiers, who rose at once to the full height of fa-

(f) Sir Anthony Welden relates an anecdote he had from sir George More, lieutenant of the Tower. When he (More) came to tell Somerset he must prepare for his trial on the morrow, he refused to appear, and said, "The king durst not bring him to it." On More's informing the king of these expressions, he burst into tears, and intreated him to use his utmost skill, and sooth the prisoner by whatever means into temper and submission. The same author relates, that More, when Somerset was brought to his trial, placed a servant on each side of him, with a cloak on their arms, giving a peremptory order, If Somerset did any way fly out on the king, that they should instantly hoodwink him with that cloak, take him by force from the bar, and carry him off.

One of the precautions which Bacon had recommended to James was, to be careful to chuse a steward of judgement, that might be able to moderate the evidence, and cut off digressions; "For I may interrupt, adds he, but I cannot silence."

On the day of trial, when Somerset was on the point of speaking for himself, the lord high steward gave him the following caution: "My lord of Somerset, said he, hath behaved himself modestly in the hearing; and only this (before you speak for yourself) by way of advice I will say unto you, in giving you two examples: your wife, that yesterday confessed the fact; and there is great hopes of the king's mercy, if you now mar not that which she made. On the contrary, Byron, who, when the king of France used all the means he possibly could to bring him to the acknowledgement of his offence; which if he had done, there was no question to be made of the king's grace. And I think there never was, nor is, a more gracious and merciful king than our master. But Byron still persisting in the denial of the fact, you know his end." Cabala, p. 34. State Trials, vol. i. p. 258.

(g) At her arraignment appeared several letters that had passed between her and her agents; the purpose of which was the expected success of some magical courses which these people had undertaken, and this weak woman had depended on, for the ends of debilitating her husband, and rendering her lover constant in his affection; several wax and brazen images moulded for these purposes were likewise exposed. State Trials, vol. i.

(h) Sir William Wade was removed from the lieutenancy of the Tower immediately before Overbury's confinement, and this instrument of Somerset's villainy substituted in his place.

(i) It may be worthy of remark, that Coke, in the trial of Mrs. Turner, told her that she was guilty of the seven deadly sins; she was a whore, a bawd, a sorcerer, a witch, a papist, a felon, and a murderer. And what may more surprise us, Bacon, then attorney-general, took care to observe, that poisoning was a popish trick. Such were the bigoted prejudices which prevailed: poisoning was not, of itself, sufficiently odious, if it were not represented as a branch of popery. Stowe tells us, that when the king came to Newcastle, on his first entry into England, he gave liberty to all the prisoners, except those who were confined for treason, murder, and papistry.

(k) Sir Anthony Weldon tells us the following story on the subject of this remand. The king being at the game of maw, said, "To-morrow comes Tom Monson to his trial." "Yea, said the king's card-hold; where if he does not play his master-prize, your majesty shall never trust me." This so run in the king's mind, continues the author, as the next game he said he was sleepy, and would play out that set next night. The gentleman departed to his lodging; but he was no sooner gone but the king sent for him: what communication they had I know not (yet it may be can more easily guess than any other) but it is most certain, next under God, that gentleman saved his life; for the king sent a post presently to London, to let the lord chief justice know he would see Monson's examination and confession, to see if it were worthy to touch his life for so small a matter. Monson was too wise to set any thing but fair in his confession; what he would have stab'd with should have been (viva voce) at his arraignment. Weldon, p. 103, & seq.

(l) The following is the copy of a letter from the earl of Northampton to sir Jervis Ellis, lieutenant of the Tower:

"Worthy Mr. Lieutenant, let me intreat you to call Lidcote and three or four of his friends, if so many come, to view the body, if they have not already done it; and so soon as it is viewed, without staying the coming of a messenger from the court, in any case see it interred in the body of the chapel within the Tower, instantly.

"If they have viewed, then bury it by and by; for it is time, considering the humours of that damned crew, that only desire means to move pity and raise scandals. Let no man's instance move you to make stay in any case; and bring me these letters when I next see you.

"Fail not a jot herein, as you love your friends; nor after Lidcote and his friends have viewed stay one minute, but let the priest be ready; and if Lidcote be not there send for him speedily, pretending that the body will not tarry.

"In post haste at twelve." Winwood, vol. iii. p. 482.

vour, of honours, and of riches. Had James's passion been governed by common rules of prudence, the office of cup-bearer would have attached Villiers to his person, and might well have contented one of his age and family; nor would any one, who was not cynically austere, have much censured the singularity of the king's choice in his friends and favourites. But such advancement was far inferior to the fortune which he intended for his minion. James, from his want of money, had hitherto been deprived of the pleasure of enriching this minion; but the spoils of Somerset afforded him that satisfaction. These spoils amounted to the sum of two hundred thousand pounds, and an estate of nineteen thousand a year; an immense wealth, if estimated by the value of money in those days. The unrivalled Villiers now shone forth in all the gaudy plumage of royal favour. James found in the disposition of the young man an unbounded levity, and a ductile licentiousness, which promised as glorious a harvest as vice and folly would desire. In the course of a few years, he created him viscount Villiers, earl, marquis, and duke of Buckingham, knight of the garter, master of the horse, chief justice in eyre, warden of the cinque ports, master of the king's bench office, steward of Westminster, constable of Windsor, and lord high admiral of England. His mother obtained the title of countess of Buckingham: his brother was created viscount Purbeck; and a numerous train of needy relations were all pushed up into credit and authority. And thus the fond prince, while he meant to play the tutor to his favourite, and to train him up in the rules of prudence and politics, took an infallible method, by loading him with premature and exorbitant honours, to render him, for ever, rash, precipitate, and insolent.

In the midst, however, of James's pleasure he met with some crosses which thwarted him. Lord chief justice Coke, from some transactions that had happened during Somerset's trial, was extremely displeased with the court: this displeasure gave rise to an integrity which had never yet appeared in his political conduct. He formed a strong party among the lawyers, and attacked the usurpations of the crown upon all occasions. Part of the prerogative concerning commendams to livings was now disputed in the Common Pleas; the judges were against the crown, and had even the spirit to disregard a command from the king to stop proceedings. The command was delivered in a letter from the attorney-general, sir Francis Bacon. The judges pronounced the command to be contrary to law; and as such they were not to obey, but proceed to judgement as bound by their oath. This roused James from his retreat at Royston; he sent a haughty reprimand to the judges, in which he highly asserted his prerogative, and treated their oath merely as a form devised by his predecessors, which, he said, could never be meant as a weapon to wound the royal power. The judges were ordered to attend the star-chamber, and James displayed his arbitrary pretensions in a species of reasoning peculiar to himself. Coke maintained the justness of the refusal by the authority of two acts of parliament; and when Bacon officiously took up the cause of majesty, he excepted against such an interference, as of an opposite nature to the office of attorney-general, whose business it was to plead before the judges, not against them. The judges, however, had not the courage longer to resist; and, to the great dissatisfaction of the chief justice, meanly submitted the case to the judgement of the privy council, who, as a matter of course, determined it for the prerogative. An answer of Coke's in this debate is worthy of record. On James's raising his voice, and asking the judges in a peremptory manner, "Whether if in a case depending before them, he conceived it to concern him in profit or power, and thereupon required to consult with them, and a stay of proceedings, whether they ought not to stay them accordingly?" all but the lord chief justice assented to the demanded obligation; but he with dignity replied, "That when such a case happened, he would do that which was fit for a judge to do."

Bacon, the greatest preferment-seeker of the age, to the abuse of his excellent talents, had sought aggrandisement by the most contemptible means. Ever the tool of authority, from the creature of Somerset he had become the creature of Villiers; blind and insensible to the superiority of true dignity, he eagerly pursued, in the most disgraceful manner (m), that deceitful image of it which attracts the vulgar. From Villiers he had now the promise of succeeding the chancellor, who was in a visible decline. In a letter to James, full of the most servile adulation, he begged this place, and asserted it was the interest of the king to give it him. He objected to Coke's popularity, and said, "That such men were no sure mounters for his majesty's saddle; to Hobart, because he was no statesman; and if he and Coke were placed at both ends of the council-board, the prerogative would be cramped between the two lawyers, who would generally agree in exalting law above power. For myself, says he, I can only present your majesty with gloria in obsequio; when a direction is once given, it shall be pursued and performed, and your majesty only troubled with the true care of a king, to think in chief what you would have done, not how."

In a rupture between the judges and the chancellor, the jurisdiction of whose court was already extended to the detriment of the law, the chancellor was prosecuted for having incurred a premunire (n) in entertaining a cause that had been adjudged in the court of Common Pleas. The prosecution was supported by Coke and the judges (o). James was glad of an opportunity to weaken the authority of the courts of common law. On the searching of precedents there were found many examples of proceedings in Chancery after judgement in these courts: on this authority, James summoned the parties into the star-chamber, where, according to custom, he harangued with his usual flights of the power of kings, and obedience of subjects. "Kings, he said, sat in the throne of God, and from thence all judgement is derived." He compared the power of judgement in Christian kings to that of Moses, to whom all profound questions were left. He determined from thence that there is a conjunction between God and the king upward, and the king and the judges downward. "Encroach not, said he, upon the prerogative; deal not in difficult questions. That which concerns the mystery of the king's power is not lawful to be disputed, for that is to wade into the weakness of princes, and to take away the mystical reverence that belongs to those who sit on the throne of God. It was an odious and inept speech to say that a premunire lay against the court of Chancery; I mean not that the Chancery should exceed its limits, but the king only is to correct it, and none else." He commanded that no man hereafter should presume to shew a premunire against the court of Chancery. Then in the most hyperbolical strains he praised the star-chamber, and afterwards addressed himself to the whole auditory, and advised them "Not to presume to meddle with things against the king's prerogative or honour; for if they did the judges will punish them; and in case the judges do not, he must punish both them and the judges. Plead not, continued he, upon puritanical strains, that make all things popular, but keep you within the ancient limits (p)."

Sir Edward Coke was the sufferer from this triumph of James, to whom he was personally odious. He was prosecuted with the utmost rancour on the following heads: first, for having concealed a statute due to the crown of twelve thousand pounds from the lord chancellor Hatton, whose widow he had married; secondly, for having expressed himself upon the bench as if the common law was in danger of being overthrown, with insinuations as if the king was its enemy; thirdly, for having behaved disrespectfully to the king in the case of commendams, and

(m) In a letter to James he draws a lively picture of his servility. "How honestly ready I have been, most gracious sovereign (writes he) to do your majesty humble service to the best of my power, in the commission of union, and this last parliament for the bill of subsidy, both body and preamble, in the bill of attainders, in the matter of purveyance, in the ecclesiastical petitions, in the grievances, and the like; as I was ever careful, not without good success, sometimes to put forward that which was good, sometimes to keep back that which was worse." Cabala.

(n) On the statute of Henry IV. that the judgement given in the king's court shall not be examined in chancery, parliament, or elsewhere, until it be undone by attaint or error.

(o) Some time before this rupture, James, in a conversation with the lord chief justice Coke and the lord chancellor, had charged them to refer all disputes to his private decision. Letters from and to Sir Dudley Carleton, 1758, p. 45.

(p) Bacon's advice to the king, in the business of the premunire, is one of the innumerable instances that this contemptible time-server has given of the servility and corruptness of his heart. "This great and public affront, says he, not only to the reverend and well-deserving person of your chancellor (at a time when he was thought to lie on dying, which was barbarous) but to your high court of Chancery, which is the court of your absolute power, may not (in my opinion) pass lightly, nor end only in some formal atonement; but use is to be made thereof for the settling your authority, and strengthening your prerogative, according to the true rules of monarchy." Cabala, p. 32.

injuriously to the lord chancellor in the affair of the præmunire. Though the lord chief justice could not be legally convicted on any of these articles, yet, by the sentence of the star-chamber, he was brought upon his knees, deprived of his office (q), and ordered to retire to a private life, there to review his law-works, to some passages of which James had made objections.

There were many circumstances in Coke's behaviour, that had concurred to draw upon him this unjust treatment. He was not only hateful to James from the opposition he had raised to the usurpations of the crown; he had even ventured to offend the favourite Villiers. Sir Nicholas Tufton had a patent place in the green-wax office in the King's Bench, which Villiers wanted to fill with one of his creatures. He obtained the surrender of the place from Sir Nicholas by the bribe of a peerage; but met with an obstacle in Coke, who refused to admit a clerk of Villiers's nomination.

The recent triumph of the prerogative over law delighted the courtiers with the prospect of an established tyranny: what could be more promising to the enemies of civil liberty than the increasing jurisdiction of the Chancery, and the confirmed usurpation of the star-chamber!

An occasion for an extraordinary expence and pageantry offered this year, in the creation of a prince of Wales. A profusion of titles followed this ceremony. Villiers obtained that of viscount, and at the end of the year was made earl of Buckingham. The great bar to that excess of pomp and pleasure the court delighted to revel in, was the poverty of the exchequer; a malady to which the unmeaning prodigality of James continually subjected it. Necessity reduced the ministry to adopt a measure which was considered in this country as disgraceful, and which held the monarch up to the contempt and derision of the continental powers.

When queen Elizabeth advanced money for the support of the infant republic of Holland, besides the view of securing herself against the power and ambition of Spain, she still reserved the prospect of reimbursement; and she got consigned into her hands the three important fortresses of Flushing, the Brille, and Rammekins, as pledges for the money due to her. Indulgent to the necessitous condition of the States, she agreed that the debt should bear no interest; and she stipulated, that if ever England should make a separate peace with Spain, she should pay the troops which garrisoned those fortresses (r).

After the truce was concluded between Spain and the United Provinces, the States made an agreement with the king, that the debt, which then amounted to eight hundred thousand pounds, should be discharged by yearly payments of forty thousand pounds; and as five years had elapsed, the debt was now reduced to six hundred thousand pounds; and in fifteen years more, if the truce were renewed, it would be finally extinguished (s). But of this sum, twenty-six thousand pounds a-year were expended on the pay of garrisons: the remainder alone accrued to the king; and the States, weighing these circumstances, thought, that they made James a very advantageous offer when they expressed their willingness, on the surrender of the cautionary towns, to pay him immediately two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, and to incorporate the English garrisons in their army. It occurred also to the king, that even the payment of forty thousand pounds a-year was precarious, and depended on the accident that the truce should be renewed between Spain and the republic: if war broke out, the maintenance of the garrisons lay upon England alone; a burthen very useless and too heavy for the slender revenues of the English nation: that even during the truce, the Dutch, straitened by other expences, were far from being regular in their payments; and the garrisons were at present in danger of mutinying for want of subsistence: that the annual sum of fourteen thousand pounds, the whole saving on the Dutch payments, amounted, in fifteen years, to no more than two hundred and ten thousand pounds; whereas two hundred and fifty thousand pounds were offered immediately, a larger sum, and if money be computed at ten per cent. the current interest at that period, more than double the sum to which England was entitled (t): that if James waited till the whole debt were discharged, the troops, which composed the garrisons, remained a burthen upon him, and could not be broken, without receiving some consideration for their past services: that the cautionary towns were only a temporary restraint upon the Hollanders; and in the present emergency, the conjunction of interest between England and the republic was so intimate as to render all other ties superfluous; and no reasonable measures for mutual support would be wanting from the Dutch, even though freed from the dependence of these garrisons: that the exchequer of the republic was at present very low, insomuch that they found difficulty, now that the aids of France were withdrawn, to maintain themselves in that posture of defence which was requisite during the truce with Spain: and that the Spaniards were perpetually insisting with the king on the restitution of these towns, as belonging to their crown; and no cordial alliance could ever be made with that nation, while they remained in the hands of the English. These reasons, together with his urgent wants, induced the king to accept of sir Noel Caron's offer (u); and he evacuated the cautionary towns on the 6th of June, 1606, which held the States in a degree of subjection, and which an ambitious and enterprizing prince would have regarded as his most valuable possessions. This is the date of the full liberty of the Dutch commonwealth.

When the crown of England devolved on James, it might have been foreseen by the Scottish nation, that the independence of their kingdom, the object for which their ancestors had shed so much blood, would now be lost; and that, if both states persevered in maintaining separate laws and parliaments, the weaker would more sensibly feel the subjection, than if it had been totally subdued by force of arms. But these views did not generally occur. The glory of having given a sovereign to their powerful enemy, the advantages of present peace and tranquillity, the riches acquired from the munificence of their master; these considerations secured their dutiful obedience to a prince, who daily gave such sensible proofs of his friendship and partiality towards them. Never had the authority of any king, who resided among them, been so firmly established as was that of James, even when absent; and as the administration had been hitherto conducted with great order and tranquillity, there had happened no occurrence to draw thither our attention. But in May 1617, the king was resolved to pay a visit to his native country, in order to renew his ancient friendships and connections, and to introduce that change of ecclesiastical discipline and government, on which he was extremely intent (v).

When the Scottish nation was first seized with that zeal for reformation, which, though it caused such disturbance during the time, has proved so salutary in the consequences; the preachers, assuming a character little inferior to the prophetic or apostolical, disdained all subjection to the spiritual rulers of the church, by whom their innovations were punished and opposed. The revenues of the dignified clergy, no longer considered as sacred, were either appropriated by the present possessors, or seized by the more powerful barons; and what remained, after mighty dilapidations, was, by act of parliament, annexed to the crown. The prelates however, and abbots, maintained their temporal jurisdictions and their seats in parliament; and though laymen were sometimes endowed with ecclesiastical titles, the church, notwithstanding its frequent protestations to the contrary, was still supposed to be represented by those spiritual lords, in the states of the kingdom. After many struggles the king, even before his accession to the throne of England, (in 1598,) had acquired sufficient influence over the Scottish clergy, to extort from them an acknowledgement of the parliamentary jurisdiction of bishops; though attended with many precautions, in order to secure themselves against the spiritual encroachments of that order. When king of England, (q) On Coke's being thus deprived of his office, Bacon, with whom he had been long at variance, wrote him an abusive railing epistle, with the following exordium; "That he supposed this to be the time of his affliction, and therefore he took the seasonable advantage to shew him his imperfections." The whole of this letter is written in a stile of fulsome cant that does as little credit to the genius of the author, as the malice which is in it does to the qualities of his heart. Cabala, p. 88, & seq.

(t) An annuity of fourteen thousand pounds during fifteen years, money being at ten per cent. is worth on computation only one hundred and six thousand five hundred pounds, whereas the king received two hundred and fifty thousand. Yet the bargain was good for the Dutch, as well as the king, because they were both of them freed from the maintenance of useless garrisons.

(u) Sir Noel Caron was ambassador from the States of Holland to the court of England.

(v) The three chief points of this kind, which James proposed to accomplish by his journey to Scotland, were, the enlarging of episcopal authority, the establishing of a few ceremonies in public worship, and the fixing of a superiority in the civil above the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

he engaged them, (in 1606,) though still with great reluctance on their part, to advance a step farther, and to receive the bishops as perpetual presidents or moderators in their ecclesiastical synods; reiterating their protestations against all spiritual jurisdiction of the prelates, and all controlling power over the presbyters. And by such gradual innovations, the king flattered himself, that he should quietly introduce episcopal authority: but as his final scope was fully seen from the beginning, every new advance gave fresh occasion of discontent, and aggravated the abhorrence entertained against the prelacy.

What rendered the king's aim more apparent were, the endeavours which he used to introduce into Scotland some of the ceremonies of the church of England: the rest, it was easily foreseen, would soon follow. The fire of devotion, excited by novelty, and inflamed by opposition, had so possessed the minds of the Scottish reformers, that all rites and ornaments, and even order of worship, were disdainfully rejected as useless burthens. A mode of worship was established, the most naked and most simple imaginable; one that borrowed nothing from the senses; but reposed itself entirely on the contemplation of that divine essence, which discovers itself to the understanding only. Notwithstanding this James endeavoured to infuse a small tincture of ceremony into the national worship, and to introduce such rites as might, in some degree, according to his own apprehension, occupy the mind, and please the senses, without departing too far from that simplicity, by which the reformation was distinguished. The finer arts too, though still rude in these northern kingdoms, were employed to adorn the churches; and the king's chapel, in which an organ was erected, and some pictures and statues displayed, was proposed as a model to the rest of the nation. But music was grating to the prejudiced ears of the Scottish clergy; sculpture and painting appeared instruments of idolatry; the surplice was a rag of popery; and every motion or gesture, prescribed by the liturgy, was a step towards that spiritual Babylon, so much the object of their horror and aversion. Every thing was deemed impious, but their own comments on the Scriptures.

It will not be necessary to give a particular account of the ceremonies which the king was so intent to establish. It suffices here to remark, that the rites introduced by James regarded the kneeling at the sacrament, private communion, private baptism, confirmation of children, and the observance of Christmas and other festivals. The acts, establishing these ceremonies, were afterwards known by the name of the articles of Perth, from the place where they were ratified by the assembly.

A conformity of discipline and worship between the churches of England and Scotland, which was James's aim, he never could hope to establish, but by first procuring an acknowledgement of hisown authority in all spiritual causes; and nothing could be more contrary to the practice as well as principles of the presbyterian clergy. The ecclesiastical courts possessed the power of pronouncing excommunication; and that sentence, besides the spiritual consequences supposed to follow from it, was attended with immediate effects of the most important nature. The person excommunicated was shunned by every one as profane and impious; and his whole estate, during his life-time, and all his moveables, for ever, were forfeited to the crown. Nor were the previous steps, requisite before pronouncing this sentence, formal or regular, in proportion to the weight of it. Without accuser, without summons, without trial, any ecclesiastical court, however inferior, sometimes pretended, in a summary manner, to denounce excommunication, for any cause, and against any person, even though he lived not within the bounds of their jurisdiction. And by this means, the whole tyranny of the inquisition, though without its order, was introduced into the kingdom.

The clergy, however, were not content with the unlimited jurisdiction which they exercised in ecclesiastical matters: they assumed a censorial power over every part of administration; and, in all their sermons, and even prayers, mingling politics with religion, they inculcated the most seditious and most turbulent principles. Black, minister of St. Andrews, went so far, in a sermon which he preached in 1596, as to pronounce all kings the devil's children; he gave the queen of England the appellation of Atheist; he said, that the treachery of the king's heart was now fully discovered; and in his prayers for the queen he used these words; "We must pray for her for the fashion's sake, but we have no cause: she will never do us any good." When summoned before the privy council, he refused to answer to a civil court for any thing delivered from the pulpit, even though the crime of which he was accused, was of a civil nature. The church adopted his cause. They raised a sedition in Edinburgh in December, 1596. The king, during some time, was in the hands of the enraged populace; and it was not without courage, as well as dexterity, that he was able to extricate himself. A few days after, a minister, preaching in the principal church of that capital, said, that the king was possessed with a devil; and, that one devil being expelled, seven worse had entered in his place. To which he added, that the subjects might lawfully rise, and take the sword out of his hand (w).

By the stretches of power usurped by the ecclesiastics, and by the apparent patient conduct of James, the church began to lose ground, even before the king's accession to the throne of England: but no sooner had that event taken place, than he made the Scottish clergy sensible, that he was become the sovereign of a great kingdom, which he governed with great authority. Though formerly he would have thought himself happy to have made a fair partition with them of the civil and ecclesiastical authority, he was now resolved to exert a supreme jurisdiction in church as well as in state, and to put an end to their seditious practices. An assembly had been summoned at Aberdeen, in July, 1604; but, on account of his journey to London, he prorogued it to the year following. Some of the clergy, however, disavowing his ecclesiastical supremacy, met at the time first appointed, notwithstanding his prohibition. He threw them into prison. Such of them as submitted, and acknowledged their error, were pardoned. The rest were brought to their trial. They were condemned for high treason. The king gave them their lives; but banished them the kingdom. Six of them suffered this penalty.

The general assembly was afterwards induced, June 6, 1610, to acknowledge the king's authority in summoning ecclesiastical courts, and to submit to the jurisdiction and visitation of the bishops. Even their favourite sentence of excommunication was declared invalid, unless confirmed by the ordinary. The king recommended to the inferior courts the members whom they should elect to this assembly; and every thing was conducted in it with little appearance of choice and liberty.

By his own prerogative likewise, which he seems to have stretched on this occasion, the king had erected a court of high commission, on the 15th of February, in imitation of that which was established in England. The bishops and a few of the clergy, who had been summoned, willingly acknowledged this court; and it proceeded immediately upon business, as if its authority had been grounded on the full consent of the whole legislature. But James reserved the final blow for the 18th of June, when he should himself pay a visit to Scotland. He proposed to the parliament, which was then assembled, that they should enact, that, "whatever his majesty should determine in the external government of the church, with the consent of the archbishops, bishops, and a competent number of the ministry, should have the force of law." What number should be deemed competent was not determined: and their nomination was left entirely to the king: so that his ecclesiastical authority, had this bill passed, would have been established in its full extent.

The ministers assembled and drew up a petition against the innovations which the king wanted to introduce, and put him in mind of the letter, in which he assured them, that his intended journey to Scotland was not to produce any alteration in the civil or ecclesiastical government of the kingdom. The protestation concludes thus: "These and many other reasons have moved us, in all reverence, by this our humble supplication, to entreat your highness and honourable estates, not to suffer the afore-named article, or any other prejudicial to our former liberties, to pass at this time, to the grief of this poor church; that the universal hope of thousands in this land, who rejoiced at your majesty's happy arrival, be not turned into mourning; wherein, as we are earnest supplicants to God to incline your majesty's heart this way, as the most expedient for the honour of God, and weal of your subjects, so, if we shall be frustrated of this our reasonable desire, then do we in all humility (with that dutiful acknowledgement of our loyalty to your majesty as becometh) protest, for ourselves and all our brethren who shall adhere to this protestation, that as we are free of the same, so must we be forced rather to incur the censure of your majesty's law, than to admit or obtemper any imposition that shall not flow from the church orderly convened, others having power from the same." This petition and protestation was subscribed but by one minister, in the name of the brethren and supplicants, but in a separate paper each minister that was present at this assembly signed his name as a testimony of his concurrence. One Hewit, who from his preferment had a seat in the parliament-house, was the person pitched on to present the petition to the king. The archbishop of St. Andrew's, a zealous prelate having heard of what was going forward, attempted in the king's anti-chamber to snatch the paper out of Hewit's hands. James was made acquainted with this transaction, and came into the anti-chamber, and enquired into the particulars of the bustle: the archbishop answered, "That a number of ministers having framed a protestation against the article of his majesty's prerogative, had given it to the man whom he had made abbot to present, and that he had undertaken to do the same, for which he was taking him to task, it being an undutiful part, without signifying the matter to his ordinary, to take such a business in hand." On this representation of the matter, the poor priest, frighted with the terrible looks of the king and the archbishop, fell upon his knees, and with a visible confusion said, "That he supposed the protestation would not have offended his majesty, and that he had promised to present the same in parliament; but now that it appeared to him otherwise, he would no more meddle therewith." The king, seeing by the two papers that a number had avowed this petition, suspected that the innovating article would be protested against in full parliament, and commanded the register to erase it as a thing unnecessary, it giving no addition to his prerogative.

He afterwards called together an assembly of the clergy, on whom he wanted to impose these four articles: that the eucharist should be received kneeling; that a private administration of it should not be denied to sick persons; that Christmas, Easter, Ascension-day, and Whit-Sunday, should be kept as holy-days; and that confirmation should be solemnized by the bishops' blessing. James to this assembly put on a very magisterial air, and asked them, why they had disputed admitting that power which had been acknowledged by the lords of the articles. "It is a power innate, said he, and a special prerogative, which we, that are Christian kings, have, to order and dispose of external things in the policy of the church; and, Sirs, for your approving or disapproving, I will never regard it, unless you bring me a reason which I cannot answer." The ministers very prudently waved this difficult task, and submitted the king's demands to the opinion of the general assembly; and James found that they all must be subject to an after-judgement. Symson, the minister who drew up and signed the protestation against the article that had met with the assent of the lords, was committed to prison; and Catherwood, who carried circular letters to the ministers to encourage them to adhere to it, was banished. The four articles of innovation which James would have imposed upon the clergy were rejected in the general assembly, that met immediately on his departure, but were adopted the year after.

Through every step of this affair, in the parliament as well as in all the general assemblies, the nation betrayed the utmost reluctance to all these innovations; and nothing but James's importunity and authority had extorted a seeming consent, which was belied by the inward sentiments of all ranks of people. Even the few, over whom religious prejudices were not prevalent, thought national honour sacrificed by a servile imitation of the modes of worship practised in England. And every prudent man agreed in condemning the measures of the king, who, by an ill-timed zeal for insignificant ceremonies, had betrayed, though, in an opposite manner, equal narrowness of mind with the persons whom he treated with such contempt. It was judged, that, had not these dangerous humours been irritated by opposition; had they been allowed peaceably to evaporate; they would at last have subsided within the limits of law and civil authority. And that, as all fanatical religions naturally circumscribe to very narrow bounds the numbers and riches of the ecclesiastics; no sooner is their first fire spent, than they lose their credit over the people, and leave them under the natural and beneficent influence of their civil and moral obligations.

At the same time that James shocked in so violent a manner the religious principles of his Scottish subjects, he acted in opposition to those of his English. He had observed, in his progress through England, that a Judaical observance of the Sunday, chiefly by means of the Puritans, was every day gaining ground throughout the kingdom, and that the people, under colour of religion, were, contrary to former practice, debarred such sports and recreations as heretofore they were known to have indulged. The king imagined, that the people were become gloomy, and that it would be easy to infuse into their minds a greater degree of cheerfulness. With this view, he issued a proclamation to allow and encourage, after divine service, all kinds of lawful games and exercises; and, by his authority, he endeavoured to give sanction to a practice which his subjects regarded as the utmost instance of profaneness and impiety (x).

An event now offers, which, with all its variety of circumstances, exposes to the reader a subject for contempt, aversion, pity, and applause. At the time when sir Walter Raleigh was first confined in the Tower, his haughty temper had rendered him the most unpopular man in England; and his condemnation was chiefly owing to that public odium under which he laboured. During the fifteen years imprisonment which he suffered, the sentiments of the nation were much changed with regard to him. Men had leisure to reflect on the hardship, not to say injustice, of his sentence; they pitied his active and enterprising spirit, which languished in the rigours of confinement; they were struck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and military enterprizes, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity, which, at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World. But, great as were his abilities, great as were their improvements, he had not yet attained to that exquisite judgement that distinguishes what is truly desireable from what is vulgarly esteemed so; unsatisfied with ease, unsatisfied with fame, he still affected courts and their disgraceful dependencies. Though used with a barbarous indignity by his sovereign, he seized on every opportunity to offer his services. Much useful and ingenious advice he had given on many occasions, particularly in regard to forming the mind of prince Henry; a sickness of the queen's too procured him the means of ingratiating himself, by undertaking the restoration of her health, from the power of medicines of his own composing, the result of an unlimited knowledge. These little arts, and the general applause of the nation, forced from James a mitigation of his unjust treatment: the enjoyment of his lands was restored to him, and some indulgencies as to liberty. The considerable estate of Sherbourn had been secured to his family by a former conveyance which Raleigh had made to his son: the omission of a word in the deed of conveyance made a flaw in young Raleigh's title; this flaw reverted the forfeited lands to the crown; the rapacious Somerset was informed of it, and begged it for himself. Raleigh's wife petitioned James on the occasion: the answer that he returned was, "I mun ha the lands, I mun ha the lands for Carr (y)."

The

(x) Franklyn, p. 31. To shew how rigid the English, chiefly the Puritans, were become in this particular, a bill was introduced into the house of commons, in the 18th of the king, for the more strict observance of the Sunday, which they called the Sabbath. One Shepherd opposed this bill, objected to the appellation of Sabbath as puritanical, defended dancing by the example of David, and seems even to have justified sports on that day. For this profaneness he was expelled the house, by the suggestion of Mr. Pym. The house of lords opposed so far this puritanical spirit of the commons, that they proposed, that the appellation of Sabbath should be changed into that of the Lord's Day. Journ. 15, 16 Feb. 1620. 28 May, 1621. In Shepherd's sentence, his offence is said by the house to be great, exorbitant, unparalleled.

(y) On this occasion Somerset was addressed in the following pathetic strain by sir Walter Raleigh: "And for you, Sir, seeing your fair day is but in the dawn, mine drawn to the setting, your own virtues and the king's grace assuring of many fortunes, and much honour; I beseech you, begin not your first building upon the ruins of the innocent, and let not mine and their sorrows attend your first plantation. I have ever been bound to your nation, as well for many other graces as for the true report of my trial to the king's majesty; against whom had I been malignant, the hearing of my cause would not have changed enemies into friends, malice into compassion, and the minds of the greatest number then present into the commiseration of mine estate. It is not the nature of foul treason to beget such fair passions; neither could it agree with the

The late coolness between the courts of England and Spain had produced an opportunity for Raleigh, who now enjoyed full liberty, to offer a project that promised a recruit to his broken fortunes; and flattered the insatiable avarice of James. He had formerly made a voyage to Guiana, on the coast of America, and, from his experience and knowledge of the country, had entertained a belief that its bowels contained inexhaustible riches. He had actually marked particular parts of the territory, in which he fancied were mines of gold. The plan of an expedition that promised mountains of wealth, sufficient not only to enrich all the adventurers, but to afford immense treasures to the nation, was received with eagerness by the avaricious James, though at the same time he assured Sarmiento, the Spanish ambassador, that Raleigh should be bound up by his commission from all hostilities towards the subjects of Spain, and that if any were committed he should be delivered up to the resentment of his catholic majesty. Such was the honour of James! The commission was made out on the 26th of August, 1617. It contained no caution against attacking the Spaniards, and it would have been absurd to suppose that the design could be accomplished without meeting with an opposition that would necessitate the commander of the expedition to the infringement of such a restraint. The king, though strongly solicited, refused to grant him a pardon, which seemed a natural consequence, when he was entrusted with power and command: but James declared himself still diffident of Raleigh's intentions; and he meant, he said, to reserve the former sentence as a check upon his future behaviour.

When the courage and avarice of the Spaniards and Portuguese had discovered so many new worlds, they were resolved to shew themselves superior to the barbarous heathens whom they invaded, not only in arts and arms, but also in the justice of the quarrel: they applied to Alexander VI. who then filled the papal chair; and he generously bestowed on the Spaniards the whole western, and on the Portuguese the whole eastern part of the globe. The more scrupulous Protestants, who acknowledged not the authority of the Roman pontiff, established the first discovery as the foundation of their title; and if a pirate or sea-adventurer of their nation had but erected a stick or stone on the coast, as a memorial of his taking possession, they concluded the whole continent to belong to them, and thought themselves intitled to expel or exterminate, as usurpers, the ancient possessors and inhabitants. It was in this manner that sir Walter Raleigh, about twenty-three years before, had acquired to the crown of England a claim to the continent of Guiana, a region as large as the half of Europe; and though he had immediately left the coast, yet he pretended that the English title to the whole remained certain and indefeazable. But it had happened in the mean time, that the Spaniards, not knowing, or not acknowledging this imaginary claim, had taken possession of a part of Guiana, had formed a settlement on the river Oroonoko, had built a little town, called St. Thomas, and were there working some mines of small value.

Raleigh set sail on the 14th of August, 1618. His fleet consisted of fourteen ships, all fitted out by private persons (z). After a tedious voyage the adventurers reached the coast of Guiana; after having experienced the distresses of storms, sickness, and want of water. New obstacles now opposed the acquisition of the golden fleece: the river Oroonoko was found too shallow for the large ships to sail up; a division of the force was therefore unavoidable; the smaller vessels, with a detachment of three hundred men, were sent in quest of the mine, whilst the chief commander, Raleigh, staid behind with five of the large ones, to receive, in case of an attack, the Spanish galleons, which were daily expected. The detachment was commanded by his son, and the pilotage was entrusted to his old friend captain Keymis, who had some knowledge of the coast. On their landing, at the appointed place, they were briskly fired upon by the soldiers of St. Thomas, a garrisoned town newly built by the Spaniards; they repulsed the enemy, took, plundered, and burnt their town; but not without the loss of many of their men, and their captain, the young Raleigh. Among the plunder were found papers that contained the whole of Raleigh's scheme: they had been sent to Spain by Sarmiento, to whom James had had the weakness to communicate it. The knowledge of this particular so enraged the soldiers, that, refusing to be conducted farther by Keymis, they returned to the place where lay their commander, without having attempted the discovery of any mine. Raleigh, before the arrival of his forces, had heard the news of his accumulated misfortunes; misfortunes no less severe than, the death of his son, the discomfiture of his hopes, and the danger of his life from the violence committed on the Spanish town. In vain did Keymis attempt an excuse for the fatal misadventure: Raleigh's chagrin was too great to allow any: Keymis acknowledged that he was within two hours march of the place where the mine was situated; yet refused, on the most absurd pretences, to take any effectual step towards finding it. Sensible to reproach, and dreading punishment for his behaviour, Keymis, in despair, retired to his cabin, and put an end to his own life. This encreased the perplexity of the unhappy adventurer, who lost in Keymis an evidence to justify the integrity of his conduct.

The small acquisitions, gained by the sack of St. Thomas, discouraged Raleigh's companions from entering into any other views; though there were many circumstances in the treaty and late transactions between the nations, which might invite them to engage in such a piratical war against the Spaniards. When England made peace with Spain, the example of Henry IV. was imitated, who, at the treaty of Vervins, finding a difficulty in adjusting all questions with regard to the Indian trade, had agreed to pass over that article in total silence. The Spaniards having, all along, published severe edicts against the intercourse of any European nation with their colonies, interpreted this silence in their own favour, and considered it as a tacit acquiescence of England, in the established laws of Spain. The English, on the contrary, pretended that, as they had never been excluded by any treaty from commerce with any part of the king of Spain's dominions, it was still as lawful for them to trade with his settlements in either Indies, as with his European territories. In consequence of this ambiguity, many adventurers from England sailed to the Spanish Indies, and met with severe punishment when caught; as they, on the other hand, often stole, and, when superior in power, forced a trade with the inhabitants, and resisted, nay sometimes plundered, the Spanish governors. Violences of this nature, which had been carried to a great height on both sides, it was agreed to bury in total oblivion; because of the difficulty which was found in remedying them, upon any fixed principles.

A mutiny amongst the crew succeeded the affair at St. Thomas: some were for returning to England, some against it. The unfortunate Raleigh was of the former opinion; and combating the other, prevailed so far as to bring his remaining force home. James was soon made acquainted with all the circumstances of the miscarriage; and the artful Sarmiento did not fail to work upon his disappointment by representing, in lively colours, a war between the two nations, and an eternal breach of the marriage-contract. Inflamed and frightened by these insinuations, James issued out a proclamation declaring an abhorrence of what had been done, and condemned the cause unheard. Notwithstanding the proclamation, Raleigh landed at Plymouth; and, after having surrendered himself, wrote a pathetic letter to James, in which he stated the case in a clear and just light (a). But James was not to be moved by considerations of justice or compassion; the fear the duty and love of faithful subjects (especially of your nation) to bewail his overthrow that had conspired against their most natural and liberal lord. I therefore trust, that you will not be the first that shall kill us outright, cut down the tree with the fruit, and undergo the curse of them that enter the fields of the fatherless; which, if it please you to know the truth, is far less in value than in fame: but that so worthy a gentleman as yourself will rather bind us to you (being six gentlemen, not base in birth and alliance) which have interest therein; and myself, with my uttermost thankfulness, will remain ready to obey your commandments." Cabala, p. 356.

James had been at length prevailed on to give to sir Walter Raleigh's wife and son eight thousand pounds for his estate of Sherbourn. This eight thousand pounds he calls in his declaration a competent satisfaction for all sir Walter Raleigh's estates. Raleigh's Life by Dr. Birch, p. 64.

(z) In this venture sir Walter Raleigh hazarded the wrecks of his broken fortune, besides an estate which his wife had complaisantly given up to him for this purpose. Raleigh's Life by Dr. Birch, p. 72.

(a) The following is Raleigh's letter to James on this occasion:

"May it please your most excellent majesty;

"If in my journey outward-bound I had my men murdered at the island, and yet spared to take revenge; if I did discharge some Spafear of a rupture with Spain was his only actuating principle; and that power thought it of the utmost consequence to get so material a point adjudged in its favour.

The death of Raleigh was to be the cement of friendship between the two courts: how to compass it with the appearance of legality was the only remaining question. It is thought that Sarmiento was the person who instigated the cutting him off upon his former sentence, although the kind of understanding which James possessed might have furnished him with such an invention. Raleigh had actually, before he set out on his expedition, an offer of the procurement of a pardon for the sum of fifteen hundred pounds; but sir Francis Bacon (b) had dissuaded him from this salutary measure, by repeated assurances that the power given him by his commission would be construed, in the eye of the law, a sufficient one. His present situation grew so interesting and menacing, that he at length gave way to the repeated instances of his friends, and attempted his escape: but his heart failing him, even after he had got into the boat that was to convey him to a bark secured for the purpose, he re-surrendered himself. Then, after a conviction that his fate was already determined, in a fit of despair he applied to one Manourie, a quack, to assist him in a second attempt: in order to effect it, Manourie gave him drugs that flung out upon the whole surface of his body innumerable blotches and boils; and Raleigh, to forward the success of the plan, condescended to many unmanly meannesses. They so far prevailed, that, on account of his apparent ill state of health, he was suffered to repair to his own house; but Manourie betrayed the secret to Stukely, his inveterate keeper, who, though a near relation, had been sent down to Plymouth by the court for the double purpose of inveigling him to land, and to guard him afterwards. Stukely, in consequence of private orders, seemed to encourage the design, and received a considerable sum from Raleigh to forward it. The French ambassador also offered him the protection of his master, and a vessel to carry him to France; these transactions were suffered by Stukely, and betrayed: the treacherous dissimulation was carried so far, that he accompanied Raleigh into a boat, which was immediately beset by the officers of the court. Stukely had the hardened assurance to own the deceit, and carried his kinsman a prisoner to the Tower (c). The business of the council was to render Raleigh's transactions odious to the people; they particularly enlarged on the intention of making an escape to France. The declaration James published on this head begins thus: "That kings are not bound to give account of their actions to any but to God; however, he declares, that he is willing to represent his proceedings in this case to the world. It then urges several charges against sir Walter Raleigh; among others, that the mine of Guiana was a mere fiction; that Raleigh's original and only design was to plunder the Spanish settlements, and to surprize their fleets; that he had formed a cruel purpose to leave the land-soldiers on shore at Guiana; that, after the defeat of his designs, he had no intention to return home, but to go to the East Indies, or to settle at Newfoundland; that, after his arrival in England, he contrived several stratagems to escape. The king affirms in this declaration, that he, in his own princely judgement, gave no belief to sir Walter's assertions, that he had seen and tried the gold ore of the mine of Guiana, as being persuaded that in nature there were no such mines of gold entire, or that the Spaniards, so industrious in the chace of treasure, would not have neglected it so long (d)." Raleigh composed an unanswerable apology for his conduct, but was reduced to beg, though in vain, the intercession of the favourite. On the 28th of October, and in the sixty-sixth year of his age, he was taken out of his bed, though in a fit of an ague, and brought to the King's-Bench. He attempted to make a defence, by explaining the justness of his conduct in the expedition to Guiana; but was interrupted by the court, who told him, that the matter of the voyage had nothing to do in the present case, and that treason could not be pardoned by implication. He then addressed the court in very pathetic terms for a respite of execution for a few days, that he might settle his private affairs, and vindicate his reputation. This, however, his examiners could not allow; for an order was produced, ready signed by James, though at that time at Theobald's in Hertfordshire, for his execution the next morning. Barbarous as was this transaction of the king, it had no effect on the present composed mind of Raleigh. His manly philosophical deportment, during the interval of his sentence and execution, was admirable; nor less so was his behaviour on the scaffold: he denied, with an aweful appeal to God, the heavy charges (e) that had been laid against him; then fitting himself with composure for the nish barks taken, without spoil; if I did forbear all parts of the Spanish Indies, wherein I might have taken twenty of their towns on the sea-coasts, and did only follow the enterprize I undertook for Guiana, where, without any directions from me, a Spanish village was burnt, which was new set up within three miles of the mine; by your majesty's favour, I find no reason why the Spanish ambassador should complain of me.

"If it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder twenty-six Englishmen, tying them back to back, and then cutting their throats, when they had treated with them a whole month, and come to them on the land without so much as one sword; and it may not be lawful for your majesty's subjects, being charged first by them, to repel force by force; we may justly say, O miserable English!

"If Parker and Mecham took Campechie and other places in Honduras, seated in the heart of the Spanish Indies, burnt towns, and killed the Spaniards, and had nothing said to them at their return; and myself, who forbore to look into the Indies, because I would not offend, must be accused; I may as justly say, O miserable Raleigh!

"If I have spent my poor estate, lost my son, suffered by sickness, and otherways a world of hardships; if I have resisted, with manifest hazard of my life, the robberies and spoils with which my companions would have made me rich; if, when I was poor, I could have made myself rich; if, when I had gotten my liberty (which all men and nature itself do much prize) I voluntarily lost it; if, when I was sure of my life, I rendered it again; if I might elsewhere have sold my ship and goods, and put five or six thousand pounds in my purse, and yet brought her into England; I beseech your majesty to believe, that all this I have done, because it should not be said that your majesty had given liberty and trust to a man whose end was but the recovery of his liberty, and who had betrayed your majesty's trust.

"My mutineers told me, that if I returned for England I should be undone; but I believed in your majesty's goodness more than in all their arguments. Sure I am the first, that being free and able to enrich myself, yet hath embraced poverty and peril; and as sure I am that my example shall make me the last. But your majesty's wisdom and goodness I have made my judges; who have ever been, and shall ever be,

"Your majesty's most humble vassal,

"WALTER RALEIGH."

(b) Bacon in a letter to James urges the taking him off upon his former sentence for treason, as the only judicial way of proceeding against him. Original Letters, &c. by Dr. Birch, p. 182, 183.

(c) This infamous wretch was taken in the fact of clipping the very coin he had received as a reward for his perfidiousness. He was condemned to be hanged for the offence, and was driven to the straight of selling to his shirt to purchase a pardon. He withdrew himself from the odium of mankind to the island of Lundy in the Severn, where he died mad, in less than two years after sir Walter Raleigh's execution. Sir Walter Raleigh's Life by Dr. Birch, p. 67.

(d) This is an extraordinary acknowledgement of James's: the allowing a subject to go out on a design which he strongly suspected to be an illegal one, and when the penalty of the crime was to be loss of life. But though James affirms that he gave no credit to the reality of the mines, yet, in his commission, he takes care to secure to himself a full fifth of all the gold that should be found in them.

(e) That Raleigh was innocent of many of the invidious calumnies with which he is loaded by the king's declaration, is, we think, a matter of small doubt.

First, there are the protestations of a dying man, strengthened by asseverations not likely to be used for the purposes of deceit, in so tremenduous a situation.

Secondly, arguments to be drawn from the nature of the thing.

1st. If sir Walter Raleigh had no other view in the expedition but to enrich himself by piracy, and that the prime object had been the plunder of the Spanish town lately built on the coast of Guiana, it is improbable that the attainment of that end would have thrown him and his friend into so terrible a consternation, as to induce the one to destroy himself, and the other to prepare for flight; which intention of flight is one of the facts alledged against him in the king's declaration.

2dly. The plunder of a single town was too contemptible an object for the hazard and danger of so long a voyage. If there were more places to plunder on the same coast, and that plunder was the end, why not attempt any other? it may be alledged that the town was thought to contain vast riches, that little was found there, and that the despair arose from this disappointment. But what could induce a supposition of such riches? not the industry of the Spaniards; it must be the persuasion of mines possessed by them, and to be discovered by the adventurers. The design of Raleigh could not be a general plunder and acknowledged piracy, for he was never taxed with making any propositions of such a tendency; and indeed it would have been a very absurd chimera to have supposed that the gentlemen of fortune and family which he had under his command would have left their country and home enjoyments for ever, to follow an idle adventurer in the constant pursuit of a precarious gain, to be attained with innumerable hardships, difficulties, and dangers. Could there have been any criminal circumstance proved against him, why not put his life on that issue? why cut him off upon his former sentence? That he had no certain knowledge where lay the mine, is not to be doubted; that he knew of the town lately built by the Spaniards is clear from his instructions to Keymis; but that the only proposed end of so expensive a preparation, and so tedious a voyage, was the plunder of a few Spanish towns on the coast of Guiana, is very improbable.

Raleigh was a dupe to his own over-heated imagination, and overreached in the whole affair by the low cunning of James. His disposition for adventures had always been expensive to him: during the reign of Elizabeth the discovery of Virginia had cost him forty thousand pounds.

the axe, on feeling the edge of which he said, "It is a sharp remedy, but a sure one for all ills." He then laid his head upon the block, and received the fatal blow, on the 29th of October, with an indifference that left strong impressions of veneration on the beholders.

The favourable opinion the whole nation, and even James himself, had of the man he had so meanly and unjustly sacrificed, is to be seen in some paragraphs of a letter which Buckingham wrote to Cottington, James's agent at the court of Spain. "His majesty, saith Buckingham, hath given them so many testimonies of his sincere intentions towards them, which he daily continueth, as now of late by the causing sir Walter Raleigh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them satisfaction. His majesty hath strained upon the affections of his people, and especially concerning sir Walter Raleigh. Further, you may let them know how able a man sir Walter Raleigh was to have done his majesty service, if he should have been pleased to employ him; yet, to give them content, he hath not spared him, when by preserving him he might have given great satisfaction to his subjects, and had at command, upon all occasions, as useful a man as served any prince in Christendom (f)."

Raleigh was the younger brother of a good family, and distinguished himself both in the sea and land services. His artful address insinuated him early into the favour of Elizabeth, and he maintained it to her death, in opposition to the frequent prevalency of a contrary faction. On the fair opportunity which the accession of the Stuarts offered, some articles were by him intimated to restrain the prerogative: Cecil, to make his court effectually, and crush the man whose superior talents were the object of his envy and his fear, frustrated the attempt, and discovered it to James. Hence sprung the primary motive of that hatred which at length brought this respectable genius to a premature fate. On his trial for treason, Cecil, though of the same faction, and an avowed friend, appeared with the invidious malice of an inveterate enemy. The sentence of death then passed upon him (in 1603) was extorted with an apparent violation of those laws that guard the lives of the subjects (g). Coke, the attorney-general, protesting, that if circumstances alone were not valid in the case of treason, the crown could not stand one year on the king's head.

Raleigh, at different times of his life, tasted both of the hatred and esteem of the public. He was extremely odious to the people at the time of his trial, on the supposition of his having been one of the principal promoters of the death of Essex: his after-sufferings, his philosophical deportment, his literary merits, and unjust execution, turned the tide of envy to respect, love, and compassion. The character of sir Walter Raleigh merited neither of these extremes: his apprehension was quick, his parts subtle; he had an indefatigable industry, and a great command of temper; but his judgement was clouded with partial views of self-interest, and the servile prejudices of the times; though guiltless of any atrocious crimes, yet his morals had taken a deep tint from the vices of the court; his shining qualities dazzle the judgement and extort a complacency for his foibles; but his virtues were not of the stamp to merit genuine applause.

The death of Raleigh heightened that distaste which the public had long conceived for James: to execute a man of merit upon a sentence originally illegal; a sentence whose rigour had been already felt in the loss of a large fortune, and a fifteen years' imprisonment; a sentence which had been understood to have been pardoned by the trust and command lately conferred, was looked on as an instance of the utmost cruelty and injustice. To do this upon the motives of gratifying the Spaniards, in a point on which they had small pretensions, was an instance of the utmost meanness; and this to forward an alliance which the whole nation detested, excited an indignation and contempt which nothing but the imbecility of the times prevented from rising to a height that would have shook the firmest foundation of that divine right which can commit folly, crimes, and injustice with impunity.

In the same proportion as was James's disregard to the good of the nation, arose his attachment to worthless individuals. Buckingham now enjoyed his favour to a height of extreme dotage: in his person centered every kind of honour in which a subject could be gratified; on his caprice depended the preferment of the ablest men in the three kingdoms; and to his inexperience, levity, and ignorance, were confided the whole direction of the affairs of government.

Suffolk, the only remaining weed of Somerset's planting, was now removed for a new growth. His well-known rapaciousness gave a just handle for his impeachment; Coke, who personally hated him, had the management of pounds. He had also sent out several ships to the territory of Guiana for information concerning that country and the supposed mines. These circumstances, which shew the vanity of his pursuits, are evidences to prove the integrity of his designs in this last fatal attempt. The only clew to reconcile the many contradictions that a variety of circumstances throw upon this affair, is, to suppose that Raleigh had a real confidence of finding mines on that coast, and depended on their treasures as an excuse for the hostilities committed in their attainment; and that James sent him out with a halter about his neck, to be, either the means of filling his coffers, or the expiatory sacrifice for the resentment which the attempt might draw from Spain.

The strongest circumstance that appears against Raleigh's having a confidence in the discovery of a mine, is an accusation of his not having taken sufficient implements for the purpose of mining. But is it certain that this accusation is grounded upon fact? or, if it was, might it not proceed from neglect, or any other reason than the ascribed one? would a man of Raleigh's ingenuity, going out with an intention to deceive, have suffered such an argument to be produced against him? His being entirely silent on the sentence of treason, on which he actually suffered, strengthens the evidence of his strong asseverations on the article of the mine; for had he been determined to clear himself, and load his enemies, by daring perjuries in so tremenduous a situation, why make any distinctions? why not attempt to clear himself by the same means of all the aspersions that were not undeniably proved against him?

The king's declaration on the subject of Raleigh's execution is drawn up in so poor a manner that it evidently exposes the falseness of its assertions; whereas the unfortunate Keymis put an end to his life, from despair occasioned by the cold reception he met with from sir Walter Raleigh. The declaration says, "It was much observed, that after that unfortunate return of Keymis, notwithstanding sir Walter Raleigh did publicly give out that he would question him for failing to prosecute the mine, he had him at dinner and supper, and used him as familiarly and as kindly as before."

One of the allegations in this declaration is, "That sir Walter Raleigh's conscious guilt made him apprehend that he should, on his coming to London, be again imprisoned in the Tower." Immediately after this we meet with a contradictory assertion: "That his countenance was much altered when he suspected this fate from the reading Stukely's commission from the privy-council; that the door being half open, Manourie saw this alteration from the stair-head (Raleigh being alone in his chamber); that he stamped with his feet, and pulled himself by the hair, swearing in these words, "God's wounds! is it possible my fortune should return upon me thus again?"

James attempts to prove that there was no deceit used to trepan sir Walter Raleigh into custody; but Stukely, in an apology he made for his conduct, avers, that in using craft he did but perform the commission he had from the court.

In the king's declaration is a minute description of Raleigh's sham illness, and the shifts this great man was enforced to practise in his endeavours to save his life. A prince here exults over an unfortunate subject, caught in the trap which he had laid for him, and cruelly triumphs in the accidental weaknesses of a man, whom he had reduced into one of those interesting situations that are the severest trials of human fortitude.

The following is the reason the king gives for taking him off upon his former sentence. "And because he could not by law be judicially called in question, for that his former attainder of treason is the highest and last work of the law (whereby he was civiliter mortuus) his majesty was enforced (except attainder should become privileges for all subsequent offences) to resolve to have him executed upon his former attainder."

The pitiful evasion of this excuse is easily seen through, since, if the king had been willing to have put his life upon the judgement of his country, he might have given him a pardon on his former condemnation, and afterwards tried him on the accusation of piracy; but James did not choose to trust the affair to this issue. Circumstances were entirely changed since the time that Raleigh was tried for treason, and this period of James's reign. Raleigh's cause was at present a popular one, and James had now lost that influence which was attained by the novelty of his person and government; an influence, which, in the case of Raleigh, occasioned one of the most iniquitous sentences that stand on the records of this country. His Majesty's Reasons for his proceedings against sir Walter Raleigh, in Somers's third Collection of Tracts, 1751, p. 196, & seq. Sir Lewis Stukely's apology, entitled, The Humble Petition and Information of Sir Lewis Stukely, &c. ibid. p. 215, & seq.

(f) James, as Buckingham here asserts, sacrificed to the unreasonable demands of Spain one of his best and most useful subjects. But the king of Spain, notwithstanding the repeated solicitations of James's ambassador, refused to deliver up to judgement every English criminal that had taken refuge in Spain.

(g) Sir John Hawles, solicitor-general to king William, writes thus on the circumstances of sir Walter Raleigh's trial:

"I would know by what law is the deposition of a person, who might be brought face to face to the prisoner, read as evidence; I would know by what law it is forbidden, that the accuser should be brought face to face to the accused; I would know by what law Brook's deposition of what the lord Cobham told him of Raleigh was evidence against Raleigh; I would know by what law the story Dyer told of what an unknown man said to him at Lisbon of Don Raleigh was evidence against Raleigh; I would know by what statute the statutes of the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third and fifth of Edward the Sixth are repealed.

it. He had been re-taken into favour on a mean application to the minion, whose countenance he had courted by the sacrifice of his daughter, a great beauty with a large fortune, to his brother, sir John Villiers. This match had been proposed to Coke before his disgrace, and rejected with marks of contempt; he afterwards entreated submissively the alliance, and offered an acquiescence to any terms of settlement that the party should approve. Bacon, who had now attained the chancellorship (h), was another of Suffolk's severe antagonists. Coke conducted the impeachment with an ability and acrimony peculiar to himself: Suffolk was accused and convicted of mal-administration in his office. His sentence was confinement in prison during the king's pleasure, and a fine of thirty thousand pounds. The loss of the treasurer's staff preceded it.

James had entertained an opinion, which was peculiar to himself, and which had been adopted by none of his predecessors, that any alliance, below that of a great king, was unworthy of a prince of Wales; and he never would allow any princess but a daughter of France or Spain to be mentioned as a match for his son. This instance of pride, which really implies meanness, as if he could receive honour from any alliance, was so well known, that Spain had founded on it the hopes of governing, in the most important transactions, this monarch, so little celebrated for politics or prudence. During the life of Henry, the king of Spain had dropped some hints of bestowing on that prince his eldest daughter, whom he afterwards disposed of in marriage to the young king of France, Lewis XIII. At that time the views of the Spaniards were to engage James into a neutrality respecting the succession of Cleves, which was disputed between the protestant and popish line: but the bait did not then take; and James, in consequence of his alliance with the Dutch, and with Henry IV. of France, marched, in 1610, four thousand men under the command of sir Edward Cecil, who joined these two powers, and put the marquis of Brandenburgh and the palatine of Newbourg in possession of that duchy.

Sarmiento, now gratified with the title of count Gondomar, was the Spanish ambassador in England; a man whose flattery was the more artful, because covered with the appearance of frankness and sincerity; whose politics were the more dangerous, because disguised under the mask of mirth and pleasantry. He now made offer of the second daughter of Spain to prince Charles; and, that he might render the temptation irresistible to the necessitous monarch, he gave hopes of an immense fortune, which would attend the princess. The court of Spain, though determined to contract no alliance with a heretic, entered into negociations with James, which they artfully protracted, and, amidst every disappointment, they still redoubled his hopes of success. Five leading articles were at length agreed on between the two monarchs, viz. "I. That the pope's dispensation be first obtained by the mere act of the king of Spain. II. That the children of this marriage be not constrained in matters of religion, nor their title prejudiced, in case they prove Catholics. III. That the infanta's family, being strangers, may be Catholics, and shall have a decent place appointed for divine service, according to the use of the church of Rome, and the ecclesiastic and religious persons may wear their proper habits. IV. That the marriage shall be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the instructions of the council of Trent; and after the infanta's arrival in England such a solemnization shall be used as shall make the marriage valid according to the laws of that kingdom. V. That she shall have a competent number of chaplains, and a confessor, being strangers; one whereof shall have power to govern the family in religious matters." By the formation of these articles it is easy to discover that the Spanish monarch thought they could never be acceded to; but such was the infatuation of James, that through fear of interrupting the treaty by any exceptions, it is probable he would have agreed to any thing, however absurd, that the Spanish court might propose.

In that great revolution of manners which happened during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the only nations who had the honourable, though often melancholy advantage, of making an effort for their expiring privileges, were such as, together with the principles of civil liberty, were animated with a zeal for religious parties and opinions. Besides the irresistible force of standing armies, the European princes possessed this advantage, that they were descended from the ancient royal families; that they continued the same appellations of magistrates, the same appearance of civil government; and restraining themselves by all the forms of legal administration, could insensibly impose the yoke on their unguarded subjects. Even the German nations, who formerly broke the Roman chains, and restored liberty to mankind, now lost their own liberty, and saw with grief the absolute authority of their princes firmly established among them. In their circumstances, nothing but a pious zeal could have made them entertain hopes of preserving any longer those privileges which their ancestors, through so many ages, had transmitted to them.

As the house of Austria, throughout all her extensive

(h) Villiers, at the time he obtained the seals for Bacon, sent him a message by a gentleman to the following purport:

"That he knew him to be a man of parts, and, as the times were, fit to serve his master in the keeper's place; but he also knew him of a base ungrateful disposition, and an arrant knave, apt in his prosperity to ruin any that had raised him in his adversity. Yet, for all this, knowing how fit an instrument he might be for his master, he had obtained the seals for him; but with this assurance, should he ever requite him as he had done some others, to whom he had been more bound, he would cast him down as much below scorn, as he had now raised him high above any honour he could have expected."

This charge refers to Bacon's ungrateful treatment of his first patron, the earl of Essex. This nobleman had applied with all the warmth of friendship to Elizabeth for the place of solicitor-general for Bacon: on meeting with a refusal, he made up the disappointment out of his own private fortune, and bestowed upon him the gift of Twickenham-park, which was afterwards sold at an under price for the value of eighteen hundred pounds.

When Essex fell under the displeasure of the court, Bacon, who was one of the queen's counsel, managed a charge against him before an assembly of counsellors, judges, and peers, concerning a book that had been lately dedicated to him. It was an history of the first year of king Henry the Fourth, and being wrote with freedom, Elizabeth wanted to have some of the passages brought into the case of treason.

On Essex's attainder, Bacon was again employed against his generous patron; and, after his unhappy fate, the same Bacon, by the queen's command, drew up and published a declaration, setting forth the crimes and misdemeanors of the said earl. A behaviour so unjustifiably scandalous drew upon Bacon a general detestation, which was not extinguished during his whole life, nor can his memory be exempt from it, whilst any generous qualities remain in the human species. Weldon. Mallet's Life of Bacon. Bacon's Apology.

Weldon gives the following account of Bacon's absurd conduct after he had obtained the seals, viz.

"Now was Bacon invested in his office, and, within ten days after, the king goes to Scotland. Bacon instantly begins to believe himself king; lies in the king's lodgings, gives audience in the great banqueting-house, makes all other counsellors attend his motions, with the same state the king used to come out to give audience to ambassadors; when any other counsellor sat with him about the king's affairs, would, if they sat near him, bid them know their distance; upon which secretary Winwood arose, went away, and would never sit more (under his encroached state), but instantly dispatched one to the king to desire him to make haste back, for even his very seat was already usurped. In this posture he lived until he heard the king was returning, and began to believe that the play was almost at an end, he might personate a king's part no longer; and therefore did again re-invest himself with his old rags of baseness, which were so tattered and poor at the king's coming to Windsor. He attended two days at Buckingham's chamber, being not admitted to any better place than the room where trencher-scrapers and lacquies attended; there sitting upon an old wooden chest, with his purse and seal lying by him on that chest. After two days he had admittance: at first entrance he fell down flat on his face at the duke's foot, kissing it, vowing never to rise till he had his pardon; then was he again reconciled, and since that time so very a slave to the duke, and all that family, that he durst not deny the command of the meanest of the kindred, nor oppose any thing." Weldon, p. 120, & seq.

If this tale is told with exaggerations, it must be allowed that it has a foundation in reality. Bacon had certainly disobliged Winwood, James, and Buckingham, during the king's residence in Scotland. Through motives of jealousy he had violently opposed the match between Coke's daughter and sir John Villiers. He had gone so far in his opposition as to threaten Winwood with a premunire for granting a warrant to search for the lady, who had been secreted by her mother to prevent the match, and had ventured to write a letter to James, in which he represented the intended union as a thing that might prove detrimental to himself and favourite. James returned a very angry epistle, and Bacon began to find himself in a precarious situation. He was informed by sir Henry Yelverton, that Buckingham had openly said, "He repented the having raised him so high; that the ingratitude with which he had behaved to the earls of Essex and Somerset was an inveterate custom in him:"

That it was common in every courtier's mouth, that his greatness should be abated; and, as his tongue had been a razor to some, it would be retaliated on him:

That there was laid up many petitions against him to his majesty:

That Buckingham had said, "That he would not secretly bite; but whosoever had any interest, or tasted of the opposition to his brother's marriage, he would openly oppose them to their faces, and they should discern what favour he had by the power he would use."

Bacon wrote many submissive letters to the king and favourite, without receiving any assurances of forgiveness. One of the letters he wrote to the king on this occasion ends in the following strain:

"And so expecting that the sun, which, when it went from us, left us cold weather, and now it is returned towards us, hath brought with it a blessed harvest, will, when it cometh to us, dispel and disperse all mists and mistakings." Original Letters by Dr. Birch, p. 139, & seq. Cabala, p. 57.

dominions, dominions, had ever made religion the pretext for her usurpations, she now met with resistance from a like principle; and the Catholic religion, as usual, had ranged itself on the side of monarchy; the Protestant, on that of liberty. The states of Bohemia, having taken arms against the emperor Matthias, continued their revolt against his successor Ferdinand, and claimed the observance of all the edicts enacted in favour of the Protestant faith, together with the restoration of their ancient laws and constitution. The neighbouring principalities, Silesia, Moravia, Lusatia, Austria, even the kingdom of Hungary, took part in the quarrel; and throughout all these populous and martial provinces, the spirit of discord and civil war had universally diffused itself, and spread the flames of desolation.

Ferdinand II. who possessed more vigour and greater abilities, though not more lenity and moderation, than are usual with the Austrian princes, strongly armed himself for the recovery of his authority; and, besides employing the assistance of his subjects, who professed the Catholic religion, he engaged on his side a powerful alliance of the neighbouring potentates. All the Catholic princes of the empire had embraced his defence; even Saxony, the most powerful of the Protestant: Poland had declared itself in his favour; and, above all, the Spanish monarch, deeming his own interest closely connected with that of the younger branch of his family, prepared powerful succours from Italy, and from the Low Countries; and likewise advanced large sums for the support of Ferdinand and the Catholic faith.

The states of Bohemia, alarmed at these mighty preparations, began also to solicit foreign assistance; and, together with that support which they obtained from the evangelical union in Germany, they endeavoured to establish connexions with greater princes. They cast their eyes on Frederic, elector palatine. They considered, that besides commanding no despicable force of his own, he was son-in-law to the king of England, and nephew to prince Maurice, whose authority was become almost absolute in the United Provinces. They hoped that these princes, moved by the connexions of blood, as well as by the tie of their common religion, would interest themselves in all the fortunes of Frederic, and would promote his greatness. They therefore made him a tender of their crown, which they considered as elective; and the young palatine, stimulated by ambition, without consulting either James or Maurice, whose opposition he foresaw, immediately accepted the offer, and marched all his forces into Bohemia, in support of his new subjects.

The news of these events soon reached England, and the whole kingdom was eager to engage in the quarrel. Scarcely was the ardour greater, with which all the states of Europe, in former ages, flew to rescue the Holy Land from the dominion of infidels. The nation was, as yet, sincerely attached to the blood of their monarchs, and they considered their connexion with the palatine, who had married a daughter of England, as very close and intimate. And when they heard of Catholics carrying on wars and persecutions against Protestants, they thought their own interest concerned, and regarded their neutrality as a base desertion of the cause of God, and of his holy religion. In such a quarrel, they would gladly have marched to the opposite extremity of Europe, have plunged themselves into a chaos of German politics, and have expended all the blood and treasure of the nation, by maintaining a contest with the whole house of Austria, at the very time, and in the very place, in which it was the most powerful.

But James, besides that his temper was unfit for such vast undertakings, was restrained by another motive, which had an amazing influence over him: he refused to patronize the revolt of subjects against their sovereign. From the very first he denied to his son-in-law the title of king of Bohemia: he forbade him to be prayed for in the churches under that appellation: and though he owned that he had by no means examined the pretensions, privileges, and constitution of the revolted states, so exalted was his idea of the rights of kings, that he concluded subjects must ever be in the wrong, when they stood in opposition to those who had acquired or assumed that majestic title (i). Thus, even in measures founded on true politics, James intermixed so many narrow prejudices, as diminished his authority, and exposed him to the imputation of weakness and error.

In the mean time affairs every where hastened to a crisis. Ferdinand levied a great force, under the command of the duke of Bavaria and the count of Bucquoy; and advanced upon his enemy in Bohemia. In 1620, Spinola collected a veteran army of thirty thousand men in the Low Countries. When Edmonds, the king's resident at Brussels, made remonstrances to the archduke Albert, he was answered, that the orders for this armament had been transmitted to Spinola from Madrid, and that he alone knew the secret destination of it. Spinola again told the minister, that his orders were still sealed; but, if Edmonds would accompany him in his march to Coblentz, he would there open them, and give him full satisfaction. It was more easy to see his intentions, than to prevent their success. Almost at one time, it was known in England that Frederic, being defeated in the great and decisive battle of Prague, had fled with his family into Holland, and that Spinola had invaded the Palatinate, and, meeting with no resistance, except from some princes of the union, and from one English regiment of two thousand four hundred men, commanded by the brave sir Horace Vere, had, in a little time, reduced the greater part of that principality. Complaints now ran high against James's neutrality and inactive disposition. The happiness and tranquillity of their own country became distasteful to the English, when they reflected on the grievances and distresses of their Protestant brethren in Germany.

James, however, flattered himself that, after he had formed an intimate connexion with the Spanish monarch, by means of his son's marriage, the restitution of the Palatinate might be procured, from the motive alone of friendship and personal attachment. But this weak monarch was not sensible that the Spanish match was itself attended with such difficulties, that all his art of negociation would not be able to surmount them; much less, that this match could in good policy be depended on, as the means of procuring such extraordinary advantages. His unwarlike disposition, increased by age, riveted him still faster in his errors, and determined him to seek the restoration of his son-in-law, by remonstrances and entreaties, by arguments and embassies, rather than by assisting him in the struggle to support his cause. And the same defect of courage which held him in awe of foreign nations, made him likewise afraid of shocking the prejudices of his own subjects, and kept him from openly avowing the measures which he was determined to pursue. Or, perhaps, he hoped to turn these prejudices to account; and, by their means, engage his people to furnish him with supplies, of which their excessive frugality had hitherto made them so sparing and reserved.

Anne of Denmark, James's queen, did not live to see the entire ruin of her daughter's fortune. Her death happened in the beginning of the year 1619, in the forty-fifth year of her age. She was a woman of a vain, haughty, and violent temper (k). The court amusements took their bias from these qualities; they were pompous and gaudy, without any degree of taste or propriety (l). The direction

(i) George Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, was at this time detained by illness from attending the privy council; he therefore wrote to Mr. secretary Naunton, that it was his opinion that the elector should accept the crown, and England openly support him; but James rejected the reasons which the archbishop urged to support his opinion, as favouring too much the pretensions to liberty in subjects.

(k) At the time of her daughter's marriage with the Palsgrave she had been flattered from the king of Spain with hopes that she might have him for a son-in-law. This put her into so ill a disposition for the Protestant match, that she descended to such childish expressions of resentment as to call her daughter in derision Good-wife Palsgrave.

Spotswood gives us the following account of the violence of this princess's temper:

"Prince Henry was assigned to the care of the earl of Mar: on the queen's intended journey to London she went to his house, and demanded her son, that he might accompany her. This demand being denied by the family of the earl of Mar, she became so incensed, that it occasioned her a fever, and that fever a miscarriage. The king being advertized of her sickness, sent the duke of Lenox with a warrant to receive the prince, and deliver him to the queen. Notwithstanding this indulgence, she wrote a letter to the king, full of passion, requiring a public reparation by the punishment of the earl of Mar and his servants. The king sent her word, that she should do wisely to forget the grudges she carried to the earl of Mar, and thank God for the peaceable possession they had obtained of the kingdom of England, which, next under God, he ascribed to the last negociation of the earl of Mar in England. When this message was delivered to the queen she replied, in great wrath, that she rather would have wished never to see England, than be in any sort beholden to the earl of Mar." Spotswood, p. 477.

(l) The two following authentic letters are examples of the vulgar style that prevailed in this princess, and consequently infected the whole court:

Queen Anne to king James.

"I am glad that our brother's horse (m) does please you, and that my dog Stennie (n) does well; for I did command him that he should make tion of the revels were the bounds of Anne's empire. It was perhaps from the little influence she had over her husband, that she escaped the odium that fell on all those that transacted the public affairs.

This year, 1619, a very arbitrary act of sovereignty was exercised on the earl of Ormond. He was thrown into prison for refusing to stand the king's arbitration concerning a disputed estate between him and the lord Dingwell. The king had adjudged it in favour of his antagonist. This lord Dingwell was sir Richard Preston, an old companion and favourite of James. He obliged the late earl of Ormond to marry his daughter to him, and created Preston, on this occasion, baron Dingwell in Scotland. On the death of this earl, the title descended to his nephew, sir Walter Butler, on whom the estate was entailed; the lord Dingwell disputed this right on the pretension of his wife's succeeding as general heir, and obtained possession by an unjust exertion of the power of the crown, notwithstanding that Ormond's title to the estate was corroborated by the will of the deceased earl. Ormond was not the only individual that suffered from illegal acts of power in this reign. Whitelock, a lawyer, and sir Robert Mansell, the vice-admiral, were both committed to prison; one for giving his opinion in a case which was supposed to touch the king's prerogative, and the other for asking it. The opinion was not given in public, but as a private intimation to a friend.

Edmund Peachum, who was taken up for writing some offensive passages in a sermon, was racked several times in prison, that a confession of treasonable purposes might be extorted from him by the force of pain. The strength of his resolution rendering this method ineffectual, the question was, how to convict him on the circumstances of those passages. James drew up with his own hand a state of the question. In this performance he employed all the powers of his logic to enlarge the boundaries of high treason to the present case. The sermon had never been made public, either by preaching or printing. In Peachum's case Bacon, who then held the place of attorney-general, by the command of the king extorted by the force of importunity the several opinions of the judges. Sir Edward Coke affirmed, "That such an auricular taking of opinions was not according to the custom of the realm; that it was new and dangerous." Bacon's artifices and importunities at length prevailed: he wrote word to James that he was not wholly out of hope, that my lord Coke would comply when he had in some dark manner put him in doubt that he should be left alone.

James attempted to turn to his own pecuniary advantage the zeal which the people expressed for the reinstating of the Palsgrave's fortune. On the almost entire loss of the palatinate a benevolence was demanded, as an aid towards its recovery. Whether the people looked upon this as an excuse only to extort money from them; whether they were disgusted at its being demanded at a time too late to expect any fruits from such an assistance; or whether they were unwilling to encourage the examples of these illegal methods of raising money, the king got little from his subjects by this stratagem (p). He soon after called a parliament, forming great hopes from the general disposition towards a German war.

In this parliament, which met on the 16th of June, 1621, there appeared, at first, nothing but duty and submission on the part of the commons; and they seemed determined to sacrifice every thing, in order to maintain a good correspondence with their prince. They would allow no mention to be made of the new customs or impositions, which had been so eagerly disputed in the former parliament: the imprisonment of the members of that parliament was here, by some, complained of; but, by the authority of some leading members, that grievance was buried in oblivion: and, being informed that the king had remitted several considerable sums to the palatine, the commons, without a negative, voted him two subsidies; and that too, at the very beginning of the session, contrary to the maxims frequently adopted by their predecessors.

Afterwards, they proceeded, but in a very temperate manner, to the examination of grievances. They found, that patents had been granted to sir Giles Mompesson and sir Francis Michel, for licensing inns and ale-houses; that great sums of money had been exacted, under pretext of these licences; and that such inn-keepers as presumed to continue their business, without satisfying the rapacity of the patentees, had been severely punished by fine, imprisonment, and vexatious prosecutions.

The same persons had also procured a patent, which they shared with sir Edward Villiers, brother to Buckingham, for the sole making of gold and silver thread and lace, and had obtained very extraordinary powers for preventing any rivalship in these manufactures. They were armed with authority to search for all goods, which might interfere with their patent; and even to punish, at their own will and discretion, the makers, importers, and venders of such commodities. Many had grievously suffered by this exorbitant jurisdiction; and the lace which had been manufactured by the patentees was universally found to be adulterated, and to be composed more of copper than of the precious metals.

These grievances the commons represented to the king; and they met with a very gracious and very cordial reception. He seemed even thankful for the information given him; and declared himself ashamed, that such abuses, unknowingly to him, had creeped into his administration. "I assure you," said he, "had I before heard these things complained of, I would have done the office of a just king, and out of parliament have punished them, as severely, and peradventure more, than you now intend to do." A sentence was passed for the punishment of Michel and Mompesson. It was executed on the former. The latter broke prison and escaped. Villiers was, at that time, sent purposely on a foreign employment; and his guilt being less enormous, or less apparent, than that of the others, he was the more easily protected by the credit of his brother Buckingham (q).

Encouraged by this success, the commons carried their scrutiny, and still with a respectful hand, into other abuses of importance. The great seal was, at that time, in the hands of the celebrated Bacon, now distinguished by the title of viscount St. Albans. In order to supply his prodigality, Bacon had taken bribes, by the title of presents, and that in a very open manner, from suitors in chancery (r). Complaints at last reached the house of commons, and the members sent up an impeachment against him to the peers. The encouragement which James had been prevailed on to give towards the discovery of the iniquitous practices of the times, was too great to make an honourable retreat. Buckingham and the chancellor could not both be preserved without the dissolution of the parliament, and such a step must have tacitly condemned both the monarch and the minister, whose reputations could no otherwise be preserved but by the sacrifice of their corrupt instruments. James was extremely anxious to clear himself from any imputation of blame, insomuch that during the course of the enquiries, he went to the house of lords, and made use of the strongest terms to profess his innocence (s), and desire of justice on the delinquents. Thus your ear hang like a sow's lug, and when he comes home I will treat him better than any other dog."

Queen Anne to viscount Villiers.

"You do well in tugging the sow's (o) ear, and I thank you for it, and would have you do so still, upon condition that you continue a watchful dog to him, and be always true to him." MSS. British Museum, folio 6986.

(p) James at this time demanded a benevolence from his Scotch subjects, but every rank of people excused themselves from compliance. Spotswood, p. 541.

(q) Yelverton, the attorney-general, was accused by the commons for drawing the patents for these monopolies, and for supporting them. He apologised for himself, that he was forced by Buckingham, and that he supposed it to be the king's pleasure. The lords were so offended at these articles of defence, though necessary to the attorney-general, that they fined him ten thousand pounds to the king, five thousand to the duke. The fines, however, were afterwards remitted. Franklyn, p. 55. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 31, 32, &c.

(r) In the complaint which the commons brought up against the lord chancellor, Dr. Field, bishop of Llandaff, was accused of brokage in a bribe intended for the chancellor. Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 351, & seq.

(s) The houses had been told, that he had done nothing in these cases without having referred the same to several judges for the point of law, and to divers lords for the point of commodity. These were the lord chancellor, three of the judges, and serjeant Finch.

In the speeches he made on this occasion he said, "That if the enormities complained of had been laid before him, he would have punished the delinquents as severely out of parliament, and peradventure more than the parliament intended to punish them." He told the house, "That he believed their body had bribed his son to do good offices for them." And added, "The like I may say of one that sits there—Buckingham: he hath been so ready upon all occasions to do good offices both for the house in general, and every member thereof in particular."

James, amongst others of these kind of cajolements, praised much the intention of a bill against informers. "Such a bill, said he, will be the greatest ease, both to me and all those that are near about me at court, that may be; for I remember that since the beginning of this parliament Buckingham hath told me, he never found such quiet and rest as in this time

Thus encouraged, the lords proceeded with zeal. An accusation of four-and-twenty articles of bribery, was brought into the house of commons against the chancellor. This unfortunate tool of government was even obliged to abandon his defence. The king would not hazard his appearing to plead his cause. An ample confession of the whole charge, with some trifling extenuations, was signed by him, with an humble petition for a favourable sentence (t). Thus ignominious was the fall of the famous Bacon, despicable in all the active part of life; and only glorious in the contemplative. Him the rays of knowledge served but to embellish, not enlighten; and philosophy itself was degraded by a conjunction with a person of his temper of mind (u). He did not survive, above five years, this public disgrace. We are told that he often lamented that ambition and false glory had diverted him from spending his whole time in the manner worthy of his extensive genius; but there is too much reason to believe from his conduct, that these sentiments arose from the weight of his mortifications, and not from the conviction of his judgement. He preferred many servile applications to James, and flattered him so far, as to represent his grandfather, Henry the Seventh (v), in an amiable light. This management obtained the pardon of his whole sentence, which was, a fine of forty thousand pounds, imprisonment in the Tower during the king's pleasure, to be for ever incapable of any office or place, or employment in the commonwealth, and never to sit again in parliament, or come within the verge of the court. Besides the favour of a pardon, the king conferred on him a nominal pension of eighteen hundred pounds a-year; but through the deficiency of its payment he languished out the remainder of his life in indigent circumstances (w). It is needless for an historian to describe the strength or extent of his genius; his precious bequests to posterity paint them stronger than can any other pen.

John Williams, D. D. dean of Westminster, and afterwards bishop of Lincoln, received the advantage of the counsel that was so fatal to Bacon: Buckingham, having no other creature in whose understanding and compliance he could so thoroughly confide, deposited the seals in his hands, with the title of lord keeper instead of lord chancellor; this office so nominated being held at the king's pleasure (x). The delinquents of an inferior order met with a punishment no less severe than Bacon's. Sir Giles Mompesson was degraded from the order of knighthood, ordained to stand perpetually in the degree of a person out-lawed, his testimony to be received in no court, to be excepted out of all pardons hereafter to be granted, to be imprisoned during life, not to approach within twelve miles of the courts of the king and prince, nor of the king's high courts usually holden at Westminster, his lands for life to be forfeited to the king, to undergo fine and ransom at ten thousand pounds, to be disabled to hold any office in the commonwealth, and, lastly, to be ever held an infamous person (y). Sir Francis Mitchel, a necessitous justice of the peace, was found to be concerned in some of the oppressive patents: his sentence was degradation, imprisonment during the king's pleasure, a fine of one thousand pounds, and to be disabled from holding any office under the king or commonwealth (z).

Sir Henry Yelverton, who was at this time a prisoner in the Tower, in consequence of a sentence of the star-chamber, for having enlarged a charter given to the city of London beyond the king's warrant, was accused in this business of illegal grants. He had obtained the office of attorney-general by the means of Somerset; his adherence to his patron had naturally rendered him odious in the eyes of Buckingham, who had actually occasioned the prosecution against him, and had assumed so insolent a carriage, even on his first favour from James, as to make use of this scoffing expression, "That he would make Yelverton the poorest attorney in England." From a continuation of the same animosity, James was incited to propose to the lords to give up his prisoner to the rigour of their judgement. Yelverton was brought to their bar, and pleaded his own cause, though not to the clearing of his own character, yet much to the disreputation of James and his favourite; he shewed the necessity he lay under either of losing his bread, or of obeying all their illegal injunctions (a). James was time of parliament, from projectors and informers, who, at other times, miserably vexed him at all hours." He told the Lords, "That he acknowledged their house to be the supreme court of justice, in which he was ever present by representation; that he could not give them a greater assurance nor better pledge of his purpose, than by the honour he had done them of placing his only son among them."

(t) One of the articles of this charge is to this effect: the vintners in London refused to give above a certain price for wine; the merchants complained to the council; the king made a reference to the chancellor; the chancellor ordered the vintners to give the price demanded, and imprisoned two or three of the most obstinate, till they complied. For his pains he received a present of one thousand pounds. Bacon's Submission. State Trials, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 364.

"It may seem to us remarkable, says an ingenious writer, that Bacon was not accused for arbitrary proceedings, but for corruption."

(u) During the time he had the seals, he received a number of letters from Buckingham in favour of different people who had causes depending in chancery. There is great reason to believe that every one of these mandates were implicitly obeyed by the obedient chancellor. These letters are in a late collection published by Dr. Birch.

(v) James idolized the character of this monarch, and affected in several instances to resemble him. It was at his desire that Bacon undertook to write the history of that monarch.

(w) It appears from Letters, &c. published by Dr. Birch, that James made a kind of promise that Bacon's fortune should not be affected by his disgrace. This promise was so ill kept, that, in a letter of Bacon's to the king (in the same collection,) he complains, that the pension of eighteen hundred a-year, which he had enjoyed during his prosperity, was stopt, and that there was eight hundred pounds in arrears due upon it. Among the many petitions he preferred to Buckingham for a subsistence, he descended to ask the provostship of Eaton school, and was denied. York-house and his manor of Gorhambury were sold to pay his debts, and himself reduced to take up with a lodging in Gray's Inn, which he inhabited whilst he was a practical lawyer.

(x) This important alteration, with the giving of the seals to a churchman, not bred in the knowledge of the laws, and the doctrine of whose profession taught him implicit obedience to the throne, fully demonstrate an intention in James to subject the civil jurisdiction to royal caprice. All the precedents of bestowing this place to other than a lawyer happened in times when the common law of England was neither so full nor so well established as it was at this period.

(y) Though sir Edward Coke had quoted many precedents to prove that the lower house had in itself the power of punishment, and that judicial, yet the commons for the present waved this pretension, and yielded the point of sentence to the lords. Moreover, it had been ordered, that whatsoever should be delivered by sir Edward Coke should be concealed, upon pain of censure, till the conference with that house was past.

The lords had requested that those members who were the accusers of sir Giles Mompesson should be put upon oath. A long debate ensued upon this demand, in which many strong arguments were urged by sir Edward Coke, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Noy, and others, that it would be against the honour of the house to yield this point to the lords. An apprehension lest a dispute at this critical time should frustrate the desired condemnation, determined the result to be a compliance with the request of the upper house. Mr. Noy moved it should be entered, "It was so ordered by the motion of the parties themselves that were to be sworn, with a protestation hereupon on the message, and for that the cause is of an extraordinary nature, and that they cannot judge of it there, as we here, because we had sir Giles Mompesson present, they have not."

(z) The manner of his degradation was as follows: "He was brought by the sheriffs of London to Westminster Hall; then followed the commissioners for the office of earl marshal; sir Francis Mitchel was brought before these, and his sentence read by a pursuivant; his spurs was hacked in pieces by the servants of the commissioners, and thrown away; his silver sword was taken from his side, broke over his head, and flung away; then he was pronounced no longer to be a knight, but a knave." See Camden's Annals. This person was imprisoned in the gaol at Finsbury Fields, in the same chamber that he had provided for others; the place of his imprisonment was part of his sentence.

(a) "My most noble lords, said he, knowing that my lord of Bucking was ever at his majesty's hand, ready, upon every occasion, to hew me down, out of the honest fear of a servant, not to offend so gracious a master as his majesty hath ever been to me, I did commit them, viz. the silk-men.

"As to the patent of inns, I cannot but herein bemoan my unhappyness, that in the last cause labouring by all means to advance the profit of his majesty, and in this, with the sight almost of my own ruin, to preserve his majesty's honour and the quiet of the people, I am yet drawn in question, as if I had equally dishonoured his majesty in both.

"When sir Giles saw I would not be moved to offend his majesty by his directions, I received a message from Mr. Emerson, sent me by sir Giles, that I would run myself upon the rocks, and that I should not hold my place long, if I did thus withstand the patent of inns, or to that effect. Soon after came sir Giles himself, and like a herald at arms told me, That he had this message to acquaint me with from my lord of Buckingham, that I should not hold my place a month if I did not conform myself in a better manner to the patent of inns, for my lord had obtained it by favour, and would maintain it by his power.

"How could I but startle at this passage? I saw here was a great assuming of power to himself, to place or displace an officer at his pleasure: I saw myself cast upon two main rocks, either treacherously to forsake the standing his majesty had set me on, or else to endanger myself by a bye-blow, and to hazard my fortune.

"I humbly beseech your lordships to think, that nature will struggle, when she sees her place and means of living thus assaulted; for now it was come to this, Whether I would obey his majesty or my lord, if sir Giles spoke true: yet I resolved on this to be as stubborn as Mordecai, not to stoop, or pass those gracious bounds his majesty has prescribed to me.

"Soon after I found the message, in part, made good; for all the profits, almost, of my place were diverted from me, and turned into an unusual channel, to one of my lord's worthies, that I retained little more than the name of an attorney: it was so fatal and so penal, that it became almost the loss of a suit to come to me; my place was but as the seat of winds and tempests.

was so offended at this unexpected attack, that he reprobated the lords for having questioned Yelverton on points foreign to the direct accusation, and demanded satisfaction for the slander thrown by Yelverton upon himself and favourite (b). The lords implicitly obeyed the intention of the king's command; and Yelverton, for the truths he had dared to utter, was fined ten thousand marks to the king, confined to the Tower during his majesty's pleasure, to make a submission and acknowledgement of his fault at the bar, in the king's presence or in his absence, at the king's pleasure; he was fined five thousand marks to the marquis of Buckingham, and to make submission. This judgement being given, Buckingham, either out of compunction or ostentation, remitted the five thousand marks, for which he received Yelverton's thanks in the house. The lords agreed to move the king to mitigate the large fine, and the prince of Wales, who was present (c), offered to undertake that office. Thus far the king and both houses went on with the utmost unanimity, or at least with the appearance of it; but the king now began to grow extremely jealous of those sharers in his authority, and looked upon the sacrifices he had already made as sufficient to deserve an ample reward.

The commons, though they were willing to seize on every opportunity to render even minute services to their country, yet regarded the concessions that had been made by his majesty as trifling in comparison to the corrupt measures that still existed, and that looked with a threatening aspect on the interest and laws of their country, and the religion they were devoted to. To an address they had made the king, not to suffer a large parcel of ordnance that lay yet on the key to be transported to Spain, they received no further satisfaction, than that the king was assured from his brother monarch that these arms were not to be used against the Palatinate.

The speech which was uttered from the throne at the beginning of the session left the discerning part of the nation no room to hope, that the king had dropped the unpopular and mischievous treaty which he had entered upon with the court of Spain; but rather confirmed them in the assurance that his blindness and obstinacy were proof both against the arguments of reason, and the stronger pleadings of natural affection. Considerations like these made them espouse the cause of the palatine-family with a zeal that descended to a captious minuteness. One Edward Lloyd, a Papist, in talking of the king and queen of Bohemia, had made use of the scoffing terms of good-man and good-wife Palsgrave. Trifling as was this charge, and weakly supported, Lloyd was brought into trouble, and the whole house debated on the subject with great virulence, in which there was a strife among the members who should propose the severest punishment. At length, after vehement altercations, it was resolved, that Lloyd should be thrown into a dungeon, be three times placed on the pillory, ride through London, with his face to the tail of the horse, holding the tail in his hand, and a paper in his hat denoting his offence, and that he should be fined one thousand pounds.

The lords were highly offended at this encroachment, as they termed it, of the commons, and the king, who was much displeased with these enlarged pretensions, sent an interposing message, in which he thanked the commons for the concern they had expressed for his family, but desired them to stay proceedings till they had answered these queries. Whether the power of their house extended to examine and punish those who were not members of it? Whether a party denying, as Lloyd did, ought to be censured without an accusation upon oath? The commons made some attempts to get over these objections. It was urged, that the two houses having been formerly in one, and separating only for conveniency, the house of commons retained all the power of the house of lords. Others were for making this case a precedent. But, after many conferences between the two houses, the commons dropped their claim, and the judgement was referred to the lords, who added to the severe sentence of the commons, whipping, branding, and perpetual imprisonment (d). Thus did an indiscreet zeal hurry on the patrons of liberty to an infringement of its sacred laws, by a judgement no less arbitrary than severe. On the conclusion of this affair, the following protestation was drawn up in the name of both houses: "That the proceedings passed in the house of commons against Edward Lloyd be not at any time hereafter drawn or used as a precedent to the enlarging or diminishing of the lawful rights or privileges of either house; but that the rights and privileges of both houses shall remain in the self-same plight as before."

The harmony which had till now appeared to subsist between the three states, was entirely dissolved. James was so disgusted with the high claims of the commons that he could no longer suffer their sitting: the intention of an adjournment was mentioned in the house by secretary Calvert. The commons looked on it to be an expedient to evade passing the bills then depending before them for the redress of grievances, and were so inflamed by the apprehension, that they disputed the king's privilege of adjourning the parliament, and invited the lords to join in a petition against it; the lords acted in their usual manner, and refused to join with them; the king thanked the lords for having refused to concur in the insolent carriage of the commons, and added, "That if they thought it necessary, he would gratify them with a farther sitting for eight or ten days, but he would not now yield to the request of the lower house." The lords obtained this delay to be lengthened to a fortnight longer, but the commons refused the offer, as the time was too short to complete their business, and continued to draw up petitions of grievances (e). They were presented to the king by Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, who performed his part with the spirit of true patriotism. James received these petitions with such distaste that the commons found they had no time to lose, and in all haste drew up a declaration that testified their willingness, upon proper signification of the king's pleasure in parliament, to give all necessary assistance towards the recovery of the Palatinate. The king's commission for an adjournment now came down to the house; the popular members opposed reading it; but the obedient speaker (f) pronounced, according to the commission, the house to be adjourned till the fourteenth of November (g).

The lesser nobility were greatly offended at the multitude of lately-created Scotch and Irish earls and viscounts, to whose titular distinction they were obliged to yield precedency, though they were not peers of England. Thirty-three noblemen preferred a petition to the king, in which they desired to be excused from yielding this point in the common ceremonies of society. During the recess of parliament a cajoling proclamation declared, that the abuses

"Howbeit, I dare say, if my lord of Buckingham had read the articles exhibited in this place against Hugh Despenser; and had known the danger of placing and displacing officers about a king, he would not have pursued me with such bitterness. But, my opposing his lordship in the patent of inns, in the patent of alehouses, in the Irish customs, and in sir Robert Naunton's deputation of his place in the court of wards, have been my overthrow. For these I suffer at this day in my estate and fortune (not meaning to say as I take it, but as I know, for my opposition to his lordship) above twenty thousand pounds." Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 436, &c seq.

(b) After Yelverton's first examination, James wanted to take the cognizance of the cause himself. The lords disputed this point, and James gave it up, but with many cautions of the following sort, That the lords knowing they enjoyed their honours from him, and under him, he doubted not but they would be tender of his honour. Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 431. &c seq.

(c) The prince of Wales, by the special appointment of the king, had been present during all the transactions of this session. Under the guise of a compliment he was placed in this house to over-awe the popular lords.

(d) This Lloyd, thus ignominiously treated, was a man of education, and possessed of a good estate, a lawyer, and a justice of peace in the county of Salop. Immediately after this severe sentence was passed upon him, a bill went through both houses for exempting the gentry of this realm from the servile punishment of whipping.

(e) One of these grievances was the transportation of ordnance. Sir Thomas Roe had told the house, that an hundred guns laying yet on the keys were to be sent to Portugal, and there to be mounted on twelve ships, which were to be employed against the English in the East Indies. The commons immediately deputed a select body to move the king to stay the ordnance. To this petition he returned answer, "That he had assurances from the king of Spain, that they should only be converted against pirates; that he had lately made a new promise, but would, for the time to come, pass a bill to restrain any more transportation."

(f) Serjeant Richardson was speaker. He had received a censure from the house for his irregular behaviour in leaving the chair when the conduct of any of the state-officers was called in question, or mentioned in a manner that was disagreeable to the court. Guthrie, p. 754.

(g) Immediately preceding the adjournment of the two houses, the offence which Dr. Feild, the bishop of Llandaff, had committed, was examined in the house of lords. He was found guilty of a designed breakage in bribery. Neile, bishop of Durham, moved, "That since there was nothing proved against Dr. Feild but an intent, that the consideration of it should be referred to the archbishop of Canterbury, and he to give the bishop an admonition in the convocation-house." The lords agreed to this motion, and sent a message to the lower house concerning the nature of the misdemeanor which had been proved against Dr. Feild. Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p 450, &c seq.

complained

complained of should be redressed by regal authority, that the assistance of parliament was not necessary to reform them, and that they would have been reformed before if they had been known. Lastly, the subjects were assured, that both the king's ears, and those of his privy-council, would be open to their modest and just complaints. Another followed this, which forbid the conversing upon state affairs, and threatened severe penalties both against the concealers and utterers of these speeches.

The parliament, after a second adjournment, re-assembled on the eighth of February. Lord Digby, who had been travelling all over Germany, to persuade the emperor and his partizans to give up the advantages they had gained by their late victories, gave the parliament a full account of his fruitless negociations, so that there remained no covering to hide the folly of James's conduct, or the gross impositions to which his fond credulity had subjected him. Stung by these informations, the commons drew up a petition and remonstrance that expressed their sense of his trifling management, set forth the causes of the increasing hopes of the popish party, the fears and apprehensions of the Protestants, and pointed out the remedies for these growing evils. The commons, in this remonstrance, freely represented all James's unpopular management with Papists, both at home and abroad, offered their advice that a war should be immediately declared and entered upon, and the king's son married to a Protestant princess.

It would be difficult to describe James's extreme indignation on hearing the subject of this remonstrance; all the tender points of prerogative, of which he was so highly tenacious, were here sensibly affected; and a formal attack upon an alliance that was the ultimate object of his hopes and inclinations. Inflamed by such provocations, he assumed a courage foreign to his nature, and ventured to abuse the commons in this fiery letter to the speaker. "We have heard by divers reports, to our great grief, that our distance from the houses of parliament, caused by our indisposition (h) of health, hath emboldened some fiery and popular spirits of some of the house of commons, to argue and debate publicly matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high dishonour, and breach of prerogative-royal. These are therefore to command you to make known, in our name, unto the house, that none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our government, or deep matters of state; and namely, not to deal with our dearest son's match with the daughter of Spain, nor to touch the honour of that king, or any other our friends and confederates; and also not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in our courts of justice. And whereas we hear they have sent a message to sir Edwin Sandys, to know the reason of his late restraint, you shall in our name resolve them, that it was not for any misdemeanor of his in parliament, but to put them out of doubt of any question of that nature that may arise among them hereafter; you shall resolve them in our name, that we think ourselves very free and able to punish any man's misdemeanours in parliament, as well during their sitting as after, which we mean not to spare hereafter upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there, that shall be ministered unto us; and if they have already touched any of these points which we have here forbidden, in any petition of theirs which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure that you shall tell them, that except they reform it, before it comes to our hands, we will not deign the hearing or answering it."

This letter, as might be expected from the temper of the commons, was received and answered with that calmness and steadiness as sufficiently expressed the knowledge they entertained of their own strength and dignity, and the contemptible light in which they viewed their antagonist. They sent back for their former remonstrance, but returned it with another that vindicated their just pretensions, and expressed a sorrow for James's mis-interpretations. To these James returned a copious answer (i), in which the indignant monarch denounced war against all the claims of the commons, and exposed his own illegal view of government. "The difference is no greater," says he, "in your pretending to advise us on our exposing our reasons for demanding a supply, than if a merchant, that we had great need to borrow money from him for raising an army, that thereupon it would follow that we were bound to pursue his advice in the direction of the war, and all things depending thereupon." The whole of this answer breathes the same spirit of despotism, as may be found in this example. It finishes in the following extraordinary manner: "And though we cannot allow of your stile in mentioning your ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished that ye had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for most of them grow from precedents, which shews rather a toleration than inheritance) yet we are pleased to give you our royal assurance, that as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges as any of our predecessors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative; so as your house shall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogatives of the crown, which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges that would pare his prerogative and flowers of his crown." Williams advised that the harshness of this answer should be mitigated, with a letter from the king to the two houses; and James, finding that the commons were determined not to enter on business, followed the advice in some measure, and wrote again to the speaker and secretary Calvert, offering to oblige the commons with the grant of a request they had made for a general pardon; this second letter still insisting that the liberty of the houses was derived from the favour of the king. The commons, however, before they were dissolved, entered this protestation in vindication of their parliamentary rights, on the 18th of December:

"The commons now assembled in parliament, justly occasioned thereunto concerning sundry liberties, franchises, and privileges of parliament, amongst others here mentioned, do make this protestation following:

"That the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the subjects of England, and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the king, state, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England, and the maintenance and making laws, and redress of grievances which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of council or debate in parliament, and that in the handling and proceeding of these businesses every member of the house of parliament hath, and of right ought to have freedom of speech, to propound, treat, and bring to conclusion the same; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty to treat of these matters in such order as in their judgement shall seem fittest; and that every member of the said house hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation, other than by sentence of the house itself, for or concerning any speaking, reasoning, or declaring, any

"But because we conceive that ye couple this war of the palatinate with the cause of religion, we must a little unfold your eyes herein: The beginning of this miserable war, which hath set all Christendom on fire, was not for religion, but only caused by our son-in-law's hasty and harsh resolution, following entirely counsel, to take to himself the crown of Bohemia; and that this is true, himself wrote letters unto us at that time, desiring us to give assurance both to the king and state of Venice, that the accepting of the crown of Bohemia had no reference to the cause of religion, but only by reason of his right of election, as he called it: and we would be sorry that such aspersion should come upon our religion as to make it a ground pretended for disturbing of kings, and usurping their crowns; and we would be loth that our people here should be taught that strange doctrine: no, let us not so far wrong the jesuits as to rob them of their chief policies and practices in that very point. And whereas ye exhort your speaking upon the king of Spain's sacred person of our intentions by you expressed in that point, and yet affirm, that it is without any touch to his honour, we cannot wonder enough that ye are so forgetful both of your words and wits: for in your former petition ye plainly affirm, that he affects the temporal monarchy of the whole earth, than which taxe can be no more malice uttered against any great king, to make all other princes and potentates both envy and hate him; but if ye list, it may easily be tried whether that speech touched him in honour or not, if ye shall ask him the question, Whether he means to assume to himself that title or not: for every king can best judge of his own honour. We omit the particular ejaculations of some four-mouthed orators in your own house against the honour of that king's crown and estate. And touching your excuse of not determining any thing concerning the match of our dearest son, but only to tell your opinion, and lay it down at our feet; first, we desire to know how you could have presumed to determine in that point, without committing of high treason; and next, you cannot deny but your talking of his match after that manner was a direct breach of our commandment and declaration out of our own mouth, where we plainly professed, that we were in treaty of his match with Spain, and wished you to have that confidence in our religion and wisdom, that we would so manage it as our religion should receive no prejudice by it." Parliam. Hist. vol. i. p. 1075, & seq.

matter or matters touching the parliament or parliament-business; and that if any of the said members be complained of and questioned for any thing done or said in parliament, the same is to be shewed to the king, by the advice and assent of all the commons assembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information (k)."

The king, informed of the increasing heats and jealousies in the house, hurried to town, from Newmarket; and immediately upon his arrival sent for the Journals of the House of Commons; after which he struck out, with his own hand, before the council, the above protestation, and ordered his reasons to be inserted in the council book. He was doubly displeased, he said, with the protestation of the lower house, on account of the manner of framing it, as well as of the matter which it contained. After which he dissolved the parliament by proclamation, in which he set forth, "That he was constrained to this act by the undutiful behaviour of the lower house (l)." This premature end of the parliament lost all the bills then depending for the good of the subject (m).

Sir John Bennet, a judge of the prerogative-court at Canterbury, who had been impeached by the commons for bribery and corruption, and bound to appearance for the large sum of nineteen thousand pounds, by this means escaped the punishment his misdemeanours deserved.

Amongst the many motions that were made this session, one of Buckingham's related to an academy for the bringing up of the nobility and gentry of this kingdom. Though this was introduced in the very midst of the enquiries concerning bribery and corruption, the house approved of the motion, and adjourned itself that the matter might be discussed. Another material point took up much time, and occasioned a long debate, at the same important crisis; viz. How to give equality of precedence to the two universities, in the subsidy-bill granted by the laity. On a debate in the committee of the upper house on the customs and privileges of the peers, the opinion of two judges who were appointed to attend the committee was asked; they refused to give an opinion, because the matter proposed touched the king's prerogative: this refusal was very displeasing to the lords; they ordered that both the judges should attend the house to answer for their conduct. A bill passed both houses for confirming an hospital endowed by Thomas Sutton, with a large estate of eight thousand pounds per annum, besides thirteen thousand pounds paid to the earl of Suffolk for the charter-house, and ten thousand pounds laid out on the building. This foundation was for eighty decayed gentlemen and forty boys. It retains the name of the Charter House to the present time (n).

Mr. Shepperd, a young member of parliament, had given so great an offence by opposing, in an intemperate manner, a bill for the better observing the Lord's-day, that he was expelled the house.

The king having now, by his rupture with the commons, with so rash and indiscreet a hand, torn off that sacred veil which had hitherto covered the English constitution, and which threw an obscurity upon it so advantageous to royal prerogative, every man began to indulge himself in political reasonings and inquiries; and the same factions which commenced in parliament were propagated throughout the nation. In vain did James, by reiterated proclamations, forbid the discoursing of state affairs. Such proclamations, if they had any effect, served rather to inflame the curiosity of the public; and, in every company or society, the late transactions became the subject of argument and debate.

All history, said the partizans of the court, as well as the history of England, justify the king's position with regard to the origin of popular privileges; and that, as monarchy is the most simple form of government, it must first have occurred to rude and uninstructed mankind. The other complicated and artificial additions, were, said they, the successive invention of sovereigns and legislators; or, if they were obtruded on the prince by seditious subjects, their origin must appear still more precarious and unfavourable. In England, the authority of the king appears totally absolute and sovereign; nor does the real spirit of the constitution, as it has ever discovered itself in practice, fall much short of these appearances. The parliament is created by his will; by his will it is dissolved. It is his will alone, though at the desire of both houses, which gives authority to laws. To all foreign nations, the majesty of the monarch seems to merit sole attention and regard. And no subject, who has exposed himself to royal indignation, can hope to live with safety in the kingdom; nor can he even leave it, according to law, without the consent of his master. If a magistrate, environed with such power and splendour, should consider his authority as sacred, and regard himself as the anointed of heaven, his pretensions may bear a very favourable construction. Subjects are not raised above that quality, though assembled in parliament. The same humble respect and deference is still due to their prince. Though he indulges them in the privilege of laying before him their domestic grievances, with which they are supposed to be best acquainted, this warrants not their bold intrusion into every province of government. And, to all judicious examiners, it must appear, "That the lines of duty are as much transgressed by a more independent and less respectful exercise of acknowledged powers, as by the usurpation of such as are new and unusual."

Such was the mode of reasoning employed by those who favoured the system of the uncontrolable authority of the kingly office in England; but the lovers of liberty, throughout the nation, reasoned after a different manner. It is in vain, said they, that the king traces up the English government to its first origin, in order to represent the privileges of parliament as dependent and precarious: prescription, and the practice of so many ages, must, long ere this time, have given a sanction to these assemblies, even though they had been derived from an origin no more dignified than that which he assigns them. If the written records of the English nation, as asserted, represent parliaments to have arisen from the consent of monarchs, the principles of human nature, when we trace government a step higher, must show us that monarchs themselves owe all their authority to the voluntary submission of the people. But in fact, no age can be shown, when the English government was altogether an unmixed monarchy: and, if the privileges of the nation have, at any period, been overpowered by violent irruptions of foreign force or domestic usurpation; the generous spirit of the people has ever seized the first opportunity of re-establishing the ancient government and constitution. Though in the style of the laws, and in the usual forms of administration, royal authority may be represented as sacred and supreme; whatever is essential to the exercise of sovereign and legislative power, must still be regarded as equally divine and inviolable. Or, if any distinction be made in this respect, the preference is surely due to those national councils, by whose interposition the exorbitancies of tyrannical power are restrained, and that sacred liberty is preserved, which heroic spirits, in all ages, have deemed more precious than life itself. It is sufficient to say, that if the king founds his authority on arbitrary and dangerous principles, it is requisite to watch him with the same care, and to oppose him with the same vigour, as if he had indulged himself in all the excesses of cruelty and tyranny.

Amidst these disputes, the wise and moderate in the nation endeavoured to preserve, as much as possible, an

(k) The following spirited arguments had been urged in the house for the drawing up this declaration:

Mr. Carew. Our inheritance not matter of grace nor toleration; this of that importance to us, that if we should yield our liberty to be but matter of grace, these walls that have known the holding them these many years would blush. Magna Charta, above thirty times confirmed, confirmeth all our liberties; this, but the confirmation of the common law.

Sir Ed. Coke. The law of England is the subject's best birth-right, because it defendeth all he hath. Magna Charta is nominated Charta Libertatis, because it maketh free men; our privileges in summo gradu, our privileges here are the mother and nurse of all good laws—the censure of great men—the reforming of grievances.

Mr. Glanville. The king is to have the honour of a request for enjoying our privileges, but hath not the power of a refusal. Journ. of the Commons vol. i. p. 665, & seq.

"Howbeit, we are all well satisfied of the good inclination of most part of our house of commons, testified by their ready assent to the speedy payment of a subsidy newly to be granted; yet, upon this occasion, some particular members of that house took such inordinate liberty, not only to treat of our high prerogatives, and of sundry things, that, without our special direction, were no fit subjects to be treated of in parliament; but also, to speak with less respect of foreign princes our allies, than was fit for any subject to do of any anointed king, though in enmity and hostility with us." Parliam. Hist. vol. v. p. 521.

(m) The only acts that passed this session were three entire subsidies granted by the spirituality, and two entire subsidies granted by the temporality. Vid. Statutes at Large.

equitable

equitable neutrality between the opposite parties; and the more they reflected on the course of public affairs, the greater difficulty they found in fixing just sentiments with regard to them. On the one hand, they regarded the very rise of parties as a happy prognostic of the establishment of liberty; nor could they ever expect to enjoy, in a mixed government, so invaluable a blessing, without suffering that inconvenience, which, in such governments, has ever attended it. But when they considered, on the other hand, the necessary aims and pursuits of both parties, they were struck with apprehension of the consequences, and could discover no feasible plan of accommodation between them. From long practice, the crown was now possessed of so exorbitant a prerogative, that it was not sufficient for liberty to remain on the defensive, or endeavour to secure the little ground which was left her: it was become necessary to carry on an offensive war, and to circumscribe, within more narrow, as well as more exact bounds, the authority of the sovereign. Upon such provocation, it could not but happen that the prince, however just and moderate, would endeavour to repress his opponents; and, as he stood upon the very brink of arbitrary power, it was to be feared that he would, hastily and unknowingly, pass those limits, which were not precisely marked by the constitution. The turbulent government of England, ever fluctuating between privilege and prerogative, would afford a variety of precedents, which might be pleaded on both sides. In such delicate questions, the people must be divided: the arms of the state were still in their hands: a civil war must ensue; a civil war, where no party or both parties would justly bear the blame, and where the good and virtuous would scarcely know what vows to form; were it not that liberty, so necessary to the perfection of human society, would be sufficient to bias their affections towards the side of its defenders.

The present distressed state of the Protestants throughout all Christendom, excited a great degree of fearful apprehension, from the abrupt dissolution of the last parliament. In Germany the conquests of the Catholics were marked with the most bloody acts of cruelty and tyranny. The executions which were daily practised amongst the wretched Bohemians, with the distresses of the unfortunate Palatine, deterred their ecclesiastical brethren from attempting any opposition to the formidable designs of the house of Austria. The Protestants in France were in as hopeless a situation: these had been promised assistance from James, and basely deserted; they were now overwhelmed by the united parties of the Catholics with the queen-mother and her son at their head. All their strong towns were at this time besieged or taken. The Catholic cause began even to revive in England; its votaries not only aspired to a toleration, but to an enjoyment of equal privileges with the established church. These were not the dreams of sanguine zealots, but founded on rational hopes drawn from the approaching union of the court of England with the house of Austria. The well-grounded fears and resentment which this state of affairs excited in the minds of British subjects, had been legally expressed by their representatives in parliament; but the insolent and violent carriage it occasioned in their sovereign left them no room to hope that his fatal prejudices would admit of cure. To the dangerous system he had adopted, and steadily adhered to, might be attributed, though from a remote influence, that ruin which threatened all the reformed, and the oppression to which many of them were at present subjected.

Emancipated from the restraint of parliament, James was now at full liberty to pursue his plan of negociation, and settle the affairs of Europe, by the importance of his character, and the splendour of his embassies. But that they had as yet produced little effect in favour of the forsaken king of Bohemia, a letter wrote at this time, from the emperor to Don Balthazar de Zuniga, will shew. The emperor magnifies his own victories, and the distressed state of the Calvinists, with their chief the elector Palatine: "Whom if, by an impious kind of commiseration (writes he) I shall restore, and nourish in my bosom, as a trodden half-living snake, what can I expect less than a deadly sting from him, who, in regard of his guilt, can never be faithful, but will always gape for an occasion to free himself from his fears; and the genius of whose sect will make him an enemy, or an unsound friend, to the house of Austria."

Several members of parliament, who had shewn themselves the most forward in the cause of religion and liberty, were committed to prison. Sir Edward Coke, whose generous temper could not long endure the servility of a court-dependence, was unhappily one of this number. The measure he suffered of unjust persecution was made up to him by an increase of reputation; indeed his abilities never before shone in a light so conspicuously admirable. The drudging lawyer, animated by the brightness of his cause, improved into the persuasive orator; his talents were at this time so remarkable, that it is alledged, the succeeding patriots made his harangues their models of elocution. Such was the malice of offended royalty, and such the infamy of its tools, that two wretches, named Lepton and Goldsmith, were instigated by Bacon, the late chancellor, to charge Coke with eleven articles of misbehaviour as a judge and a lawyer. These facts were judged by the house to be false and frivolous, nor could they be proved in the star-chamber, where Coke was persecuted with the greatest acrimony. His papers were seized after the dissolution of the parliament, himself denied the satisfaction of conversing with his wife or children, and the talk of the courtiers was that his life might be affected (o). Sir Robert Philips, Pym, Selden, and Mallory, were of the number of committed members. Sir Dudley Diggs, sir Thomas Carew, sir Nathaniel Rich, sir James Perrot, joined in commission with others, were sent on frivolous errands into Ireland; sir Peter Hayman and others into the Palatinate. The court at this time assumed the power of employing any man, even without his consent, in any brance of public business. The earls of Oxford and Southampton, sir Edward Hawlly, sir George Leeds, sir Christopher Nevil, and Sutcliff, dean of Exeter, were taken into custody for writing with freedom against the Spanish match. The public was deprived of the services of sir John Saville, a zealous opponent of the court, and knight of the shire for the county of York, by a different method: he was made comptroller of the household, a privy counsellor, and afterwards a baron. This event is memorable, as being the first instance of the practice of buying off individuals, who opposed the measures of the court, which, in the hands of succeeding monarchs, has silently and surely effected what James and his son in vain attempted by clamour and violence. However irregular this practice, it will be regarded by political reasoners, as one of the most early and most infallible symptoms of a regular established liberty.

On the decease of Philip the Third, king of Spain, which happened in the year 1621, lord Digby was sent to the court of Philip the Fourth to renew and conclude the treaty of marriage between the infanta his sister and the prince of Wales. It was at this time in so little forwardness that letters passed between Philip and Olivares, his prime minister, which utterly disclaimed such an intention. That of Philip's is so pertinent and concise that I shall give the whole: "The king my father declared at his death, that his intent never was to marry my sister, the infanta Donna Maria, with the prince of Wales, which your uncle Don Balthazar understood, and so treated this match ever with intention to delay it. Notwithstanding it is now so far advanced, that, considering all the averseness unto it of the infanta, it is time to divert the treaty, which I would have you find out, and I will make good whatsoever it be. But in all other things procure the satisfaction of the king of Great Britain, who hath deserved much, and it shall content me, so as it be not in the match."

Olivares, in his answer to this letter, acknowledges that the ministers who treated of the match never intended to effect it, but, by enlarging the treaties, to make use of the friendship of the king of Great Britain in the affairs of Germany and Flanders. He proposes a double marriage with the emperor's eldest daughter to the prince of Wales, and the second daughter to the elector palatine's son, as a means to satisfy James, and compose the differences in Germany. Things being in this state, it is no wonder that Digby did not meet with that magnificent reception which an ambassador, coming on so friendly, and so seemingly approved an errand, might have expected. He was suffered to stay two or three days at a poor village near the (o) The council debating about the general pardon that was to have passed the last parliament, had considered about the ways of excluding sir Edward Coke from that benefit, either by preferring a bill against him before the publication of the pardon, or by exempting him by name. *Parliam. court, court, without having any civilities paid him, or even necessaries provided for his accommodation.

When lord Digby had desired a cessation of hostilities, he was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Austrian armies; and the duke told him, that it was entirely superfluous to form any treaty for that purpose. "Hostilities are already ceased, said he; and I doubt not but I shall be able to prevent their revival, by keeping firm possession of the Palatinate, till a final agreement shall be concluded between the contending parties." Notwithstanding this insult, James endeavoured to resume with the emperor a treaty of accommodation; and a kind of negociation was opened at Brussels, under the authority of the archduchess, whom the emperor had pretended to have vested with sufficient powers to treat with James concerning the terms of his son-in-law's re-establishment. The terms offered by James were, "That the king of Bohemia should, for himself and his son, renounce all pretence of right and claim to that crown: that he should from henceforth yield all constant due devotion to the imperial majesty, as did other obedient princes electors of the empire: that he should crave pardon on his knees of the imperial majesty: that he should not hereafter, any manner of way, demean himself unfittingly towards the imperial majesty, nor disturb his kingdoms or countries: that he should, upon reasonable terms, reconcile himself to other princes and states of the empire; and that he should do whatever like thing should be judged reasonable and necessary." Sir Richard Weston, a professed Papist, was entrusted with the management of this business, as being more agreeable to the party. Moreover, to gain entirely the favour of the archduchess, James (a Protestant king, of Calvinistical principles, and ruling a Protestant nation,) suffered four thousand men to be raised in England to serve against the Protestants in the Netherlands!

When the commissioners began to treat on the intended negociation, it was objected, that James's ambassador could not produce sufficient powers from the king of Bohemia, and the archduchess was still to be directed by the court of Vienna; and the whole business being only a specious pretext to impose further on the credulity of the king of Great Britain.

While this farce was acting at Brussels, the king of Bohemia, who had entertained no idea of success on the result of James's measures, left the Hague, and joined count Mansfeldt's army in Alsatia. Christian, duke of Brunswick, and the marquis of Baden Dourlach, each at the head of a strong force, declared themselves champions for the Protestant cause; and the duke of Brunswick was possessed of the administratorship of Halderstadt, which he would have been in danger of losing, if the Austrian arms had made further progress in Germany. The ray of hope which now dawned upon Frederic's fortune was soon obscured: prince Baden was defeated by the prince of Anhalt before he could join his allies; and count Tilly, general to the duke of Bavaria, forced Mansfeldt to retreat, and the duke of Brunswick to come to an engagement, in which he cut off all his infantry; the duke fled with his cavalry to Mansfeldt. These accumulated misfortunes induced Frederic to obey James's reiterated injunctions of returning to Holland, there to wait the success of his negociations. The first news that this unfortunate prince heard after the retreat was that Tilly had taken Heidleberg (p) by storm, and besieged Manheim, two towns in the Lower Palatinate. James had prematurely boasted that his son-in-law held that country under his protection. It should be observed, that after the duke of Brunswick and the prince of Baden had been defeated, count Mansfeldt, though much inferior in force to his enemies, still maintained the war; but with no equal supplies of money either from the palatine or the king of England. It was therefore chiefly by pillage and free quarters in the palatinate, that he subsisted his army.

While affairs were in this desperate situation, the treaty still lingered at Brussels, it having been on purpose protracted till Tilly, who no longer met with opposition, had taken both Heidleberg and Manheim. James was entirely satisfied with the Spanish monarch for having, at his desire, sent an order for Manheim to be spared, till a truce could be concluded. It is to be remarked, that this interposition did not preserve Manheim, the order not having been sent till after it had surrendered. Notwithstanding this circumstance, James continued to repose such confidence in the candour and integrity of the Austrian family, that he put Frankendale, the only remaining town of the palatine's dominions, in the hands of the archduchess, to be re-surrendered at the expiration of a truce of eighteen months. One of the articles of the truce was, that the elector should renounce all connections with the duke of Brunswick and count Mansfeldt. James persuaded his son-in-law to disarm, under colour of duty and submission to the emperor: and accordingly count Mansfeldt was dismissed from the palatine's service; and that famous general withdrew his army into the Low Countries, and there received a commission from the states of the United Provinces.

Before the conclusion of the treaty, the emperor had transferred the dignity of the elector palatine to the duke of Bavaria (q), in January, 1623, dismembered both the Palatinates, by giving part of the inferior to the elector of Mentz, and part of the superior to the duke of Newburgh. The elector of Saxony, and several princes, opposed this act, as contrary to the fundamental laws of the empire, which admit not of the disposing of an electorate without the consent of every member of the electoral college. Whilst even Frederic's enemies murmured at the arbitrary severities practised against him, James (r) was so little affected by them, that Gondemar wrote word to Spain, that he had lulled the king of England so fast asleep that he hoped neither the cries of his daughter nor her children, nor the repeated solicitations of his subjects in their behalf, should be able to awaken him (s).

Incongruous as were James's measures to obvious politics, both himself and cabinet plumed themselves much upon them; and, in order to take proper advantages of the lately-concluded truce, and to obtain a confirmation of the marriage before its expiration, the king of Spain was gratified with an order to release all the popish recusants, which had been imprisoned according to the dictates of the law. On a general offence taken at this unlimited indulgence, the lord-keeper Williams wrote a letter to the justices, to vindicate the king's conduct. "As the sun (said he) in the firmament appears to us no bigger than a platter, and the stars are but as so many nails in the pommel of a saddle, because of the enlargement and disproportion between our eye and the object, so is there such an unmeasurable distance between the deep resolution of a prince, and the shallow apprehensions of common and ordinary people." He then declares that the king was at that time a most zealous intercessor for some ease and refreshment to all the Protestants in Europe, which were unreasonable, if he did now execute the rigour of the laws against Roman Catholics. "But to conclude, said he, from the favour done to the English Papists, that the king favours the Romish religion is a composition of folly and malice, little deserved by a gracious prince, who, by word, writing, exercise of religion, and acts of parliament, hath shewed himself so resolved a Protestant."

About this time the following orders were given to restrain popular preachers: "That no preacher, of what title or denomination soever, from henceforth should presume, in any auditory within this kingdom, to declare, limit, or bound out, by way of positive doctrine, the power, prerogative, and jurisdiction of sovereigns, or otherwise meddle with matters of state, and the differences between princes and the people, than as they are instructed and precedented in the homilies of obedience: that no preacher, of what title or denomination soever, shall presume, causelessly or without invitation from the text, to fall into bitter invectives and indecent railing speeches against the persons of either Papists or Puritans."

Whether James began to despair of success from his pacific measures; or whether, more probably, he depend-

(p) The famous library at Heidleberg was sent from thence to Rome.

(q) This was at the diet of Ratisbon. The Spanish ambassador seemingly opposed this transfer; all Europe regarded it as a collusion between the king of Spain and the emperor: Carleton, the English resident at the Hague, represented it in this light to Buckingham.

(r) In one of the emperor's declarations against the elector and his adherents, he urged, that the revolt of the Bohemians had not even met with the approbation of the king of Great Britain. Rushworth.

(s) To shew how little account was made of James's negociations abroad, there is a pleasantry mentioned by most of the historians, which, for that reason, shall have place here. In a farce, acted at Brussels, a courier was introduced carrying the doleful news that the Palatinate would soon be wrested from the house of Austria; so powerful were the succours, which, from all quarters, were hastening to the relief of the despoiled elector: the king of Denmark had agreed to contribute to his assistance a hundred thousand pickled herrings, the Dutch a hundred thousand butter-boxes, and the king of England a hundred thousand ambassadors. On other occasions, he was painted with a scabbard, but without a sword; or with a sword, which nobody could draw, though several were pulling at it.

ed on the credulity of his subjects for the draining of their purses, he demanded at this time a voluntary contribution for the recovery of the Palatinate by the force of arms. Letters were written to the high sheriffs and justices of the peace, to return the names of the contributors, that notice might be taken of those that refused.

Whilst the people of England were thus amused with high language, letters of complaint were continually sent from the king and his minister to the court of Spain. They represented James's strong attachment to the Austrian family, notwithstanding the opposition he met with from the public spirit of the people, and the discouragement he had received from the collusion between their imperial and Catholic majesties, to bubble and abuse him. They complained that, upon the faith of assurances received from Gondemar, the prisons were emptied of popish recusants, and filled with Puritans, and the opposers of the match. They set forth James's merit with the house of Austria, in persuading his son-in-law to throw himself upon the mercy of the emperor; and that, according to that persuasion, count Mansfeldt and the duke of Brunswick had received their dismission; that himself, by the incitements of Spain, had disagreed with France; yet, notwithstanding these graces and concessions, even while he was receiving the strongest assurances of favour to his son-in-law from Madrid and Brussels, Heidelberg had been sacked, and Manheim taken, though garrisoned by English troops.

No motive less considerable than the treaty in agitation could have excited James to confess himself the dupe to the king of Spain. This was not the only mortification which at this time assailed him: he began to apprehend that the purposed delays to which the conclusion of the treaty was subjected by its first article might be drawn on to infinity; stimulated by this fear, he sent Gage as an agent to Rome to sollicit from the pope proper authorities for completing the marriage. This step served but to expose James's extreme anxiety for the alliance, and produced these additions to the already-stipulated articles: "That the Roman Catholics should be allowed a public church in London, besides the infanta's private chapel: that the minister of that church should be a bishop: that the popish ecclesiastics should be subject to the laws of their own superiors only: that the children of the marriage should be educated by the mother, and that some further proposals should be agreed to for the benefit of popery. To these exorbitant demands James returned this answer: "That he was willing to allow the infanta a public chapel, or rather a church, in which a bishop might officiate. To the second article he objected, That there was no example of such an exemption for ecclesiastics, even in popish states. To the third article, that the children should be left, for a limited time, to be fixed by the king of Spain, under the tuition of their mother. To the further indulgencies for popery he said (t), That the articles of religion agreed upon between him and the late king of Spain were accounted so satisfactory, in the judgement of the most learned clergy in Spain, that they declared their opinion, that, upon the offer of such conditions, the pope ought not to withhold the dispensation." This answer was sent to Madrid, that it might not publicly appear that the king treated with the court of Rome. The professions of Spain now grew stronger: Olivares declared, that if the emperor should refuse to restore Heidelberg, or to condescend to such accommodation as should be adjudged reasonable, the king of Great Britain should be infallibly assisted with the arms of his Catholic majesty for restoring the Palatinate. The letters that lord Digby, now made earl of Bristol, wrote, were full of assurances of success.

Whilst this contract took up the whole attention of the court of England, the town of Bergen-op-zoom, which had been besieged by Spinola, since the expiration of the truce between Holland and Spain, was relieved by the duke of Brunswick and count Mansfeldt, who had joined prince Maurice, after their dismission from the king of Bohemia's service.

On the reception of James's favourable answer, in the beginning of 1623, the alliance of the Stuart family with the house of Austria began, even at Madrid, to wear a serious aspect. The king of Spain and his ministers, who had hitherto made use of the treaty as a lure to induce the British monarch to connive at their practices in Germany, found the bait had been swallowed too eagerly to be easily disgorged: the articles of religion, which had been thrown in as plausible impediments, by the unexpected concessions of James, brought the affair to a crisis that could not end in a rupture of the treaty, without reflecting an equal share of infamy on the deceiver and deceived. An epistolary correspondence had been actually begun between James and the pope, who would have thought himself ill-treated if his authority had been used as a pretext to serve the purposes of Spain, who was at present entangled in her own snares. Compunctions of honour operated on the Spanish counsels; or, what is more probable, they began to flatter themselves, that the conversion of Great Britain would be produced by this alliance, and the infanta numbered with the divinities in the popish legends. Some or all of these motives influenced at present so strongly the measures of Philip and his ministry, that the arrival of the dispensation, which was expected from Rome in March or April, was to be followed in four days by a solemnization of the nuptials. The articles of the portion and jointure were already settled. The earl of Bristol wrote word, for he was now fully convinced of the sincerity of the court of Spain, that he should soon bring into England the most accomplished princess in the world, with a portion of two millions of pieces of eight (u). This minister's prospects on the merit of having concluded this desired business, and the interest he had with a family which was on the eve of having an important influence on the court of England, excited in the breast of Buckingham sensations of jealousy; which, with the natural vanity of his disposition, fired him with a desire to introduce himself to the court of Spain. The sole possession of James's favour, who was at present old, and in the decline of life, was no longer the ultimate object of his views.

Ever since the fall of Somerset, Buckingham had governed, with an uncontrolled sway, both the court and nation; and could James's eyes have been opened, he had now full opportunity of observing how unfit his favourite was for the high station to which he was raised. Some accomplishments of a courtier he possessed: of every talent of a minister he was utterly destitute. Headstrong in his passions, and incapable equally of prudence and of dissimulation: sincere from violence rather than from candour; expensive from profusion more than generosity: a warm friend, a furious enemy; but without any choice or discernment in either: with these qualities he had early and quickly mounted to the highest rank; and partook at once of the insolence which attends a fortune newly acquired, and the impetuosity which belongs to persons born in high stations, and unacquainted with opposition.

Among those who had experienced the arrogance of this overgrown favourite, the prince of Wales himself had not been entirely spared; and a great coldness, if not an enmity, had, for that reason, taken place between them. Buckingham, desirous of an opportunity, which might connect him with the prince, and overcome his aversion, and at the same time envious of the great credit acquired by Bristol in the Spanish negociation, bethought himself of an expedient, by which he might at once gratify both these inclinations. He represented to Charles, that persons of his exalted station were peculiarly unfortunate in their marriage, the chief circumstance in life; and commonly received into their arms a bride, unknown to them, to whom they were unknown; not endeared by sympathy, not obliged by service; wooed by treaties alone, by negociations, by political interest: that however accomplished the Infanta, she must still consider herself as a melancholy victim of state, and could not but think with aversion of that day, when she was to enter the bed of a stranger; and, passing into a foreign country and a new family, bid adieu for ever to her father's house and to her native land: that it was in the prince's power to soften all these rigours, and lay such an obligation on her, as would attach the most indifferent temper, as would warm the coldest affections: that his journey to Madrid would be an unexpected gallantry, which would equal all the fictions of Spanish romance, and suiting the amorous and enterprizing character of that nation, must immediately introduce him to the princess under the agreeable character of a devoted lover and daring adventurer: that the negociations with regard to the Palatinate, which had hitherto languished in the hands of ministers, would quickly be terminated by so illustrious an agent, seconded by the mediation and intreaties of the grateful Infanta: that Spanish generosity, moved by that unexampled trust and confidence, would make concessions beyond what could be expected from political views and considerations: and that he would quickly return to the king with the glory of having re-established the unhappy palatine, by the same enterprize which procured him the affections and the person of the Spanish princess.

(t) Rushworth observes, that it appeared here that Spain had concealed from the pope some articles that James had already yielded to. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 66.

(u) That is, about six hundred thousand pounds sterling; a sum four times greater than Spain had ever before given with any princess, and almost equal to all the money which the parliament, during the whole course of this reign, had hitherto granted to the king.

The expedition having been agreed on between the two parties, on the first favourable opportunity, when James was a little elevated by his liquor, and a previous conversation on the expected arrival of the infanta, an assent to their design was so importunately begged by the prince, and seconded by Buckingham, with arguments adapted to the king's inclination, that the easy monarch was at length prevailed on to give his assent. The argument urged on the occasion was, that this piece of gallantry would be followed by the immediate restoration of the Palatinate, as a part of the payment of that vast obligation which the prince would lay on the infanta by such an unusual compliment. When the king's promise had been thus obtained, together with his declaration that he would keep their purpose an inviolable secret, he was further urged for an assent, that they might put their design in immediate execution, without other attendants than two servants, who should be kept in total ignorance till the moment of their departure.

On the first hour of solitude, James revolved in his mind the past consultation: innumerable difficulties presented themselves to his affrighted imagination; his disorder was so great when the prince and Buckingham returned to him for the dispatch, that he fell into a passion of tears, cried out he was undone, and that they would break his heart if they persisted in their resolution. Then, with unusual earnestness, he set before them the evils which must attend the rash enterprize; that besides the inevitable hazard to which the prince's person would be exposed, it must occasion the entire loss of the peoples' affection to himself, and the ruin of the almost-completed match; that on the prince's arrival at Madrid the articles of the treaty would be laid aside, and new matter proposed which had not yet been mentioned, and could never be consented to by him. This and much more he said to the same purpose, conjuring them with sighs, and an increase of tears, that they would no more press him on a thing contrary to his understanding and interest. The suppliant monarch received no answer to the weighty reasons he had insisted on: the prince put him in mind of the promise he had made the day before; which, he added, was so sacred that he hoped he would not violate it; that if he did he would never more think of marriage. Buckingham treated him with the utmost insolence; told him, that his word would never be again believed after his retracting so soon what he had solemnly promised; that he plainly discerned it proceeded from another breach of his word, in communicating with some rascal, who had furnished him with those pitiful reasons, but he doubted not that he should know hereafter who his counsellor had been; that his receding from his promise would be such a disobligation to the prince, that undoubtedly he would never forget it, or forgive the man that had been the cause of it. The importunity of the prince, and the roughness of Buckingham, entirely prevailed over the facile disposition of James, who after having disclaimed, with many oaths, the having communicated the matter to any person living, gave them, a second time, a full leave to follow their inclination. It was agreed, that they should set out in two days, and that sir Francis Cottington, the prince's secretary, and Endymion Porter, one of his gentlemen of the bed-chamber, should attend them (v). James, thinking it proper that the intention should be immediately communicated to them, that all things necessary to the journey might be prepared, sent for sir Francis Cottington, who was at that time in the anti-chamber.

On Sir Francis's appearance, he previously cautioned him concerning the trust he was about to repose in him; telling him it was an affair of the highest importance, which he requested him not, upon his life, to disclose to any man whatever. He then said, "Cottington, here is baby Charles, and Stenie, (which ridiculous appellations he usually gave to the prince and Buckingham,) has a mind to ride post to Spain, to fetch home the infanta; they will have but two more in their company, and have chosen you for one: what think you of the journey?" Cottington, who was a prudent man, and had resided some years in Spain as the king's agent, was struck with all the objections to such an enterprize, and replied, "He could not think well of it, for he believed it would render fruitless all that had hitherto been done in the match." He then went on, representing the same obvious reasons that had already occurred to the king. On Cottington's discourse the king, throwing himself upon a bed, in another passion of sighs, tears, and lamentations, exclaimed, "I told you this before; I am undone! I am undone! and shall lose baby Charles!" Anger and rage appeared in the countenances of the prince and Buckingham: the latter of whom, in the violence of his passion, reproached Cottington with the utmost bitterness; and told him, "That on being asked by the king which was the best way to make the journey, he had had the presumption to give his advice in matters of state, and against his master, without being called to it, which he should repent as long as he lived." These threatenings put the king into a new agony; who cried out, "Nay, by God, Stenie, you are very much to blame to use him so; he answered me directly to the question I asked him, and very honestly and wisely, and yet you know he said no more than I told you before he was called in." It now appeared plainly that the design came originally from Buckingham. James was obliged to yield to his impetuosity, and Cottington had directions given him for the journey.

To the great regret of the dejected king, the prince, with his adviser, his two attendants, and sir Richard Graham, master of horse to Buckingham, set out from London on the 27th of February, 1623; they passed through France in disguise, undiscovered, and reached Madrid in the space of eleven days (w). They had been guilty of the (v) Cottington had been one of Cornwallis's clerks when he was James's resident in Spain, and Endymion Porter had been a menial servant to Buckingham's brother, from thence preferred to his service, and afterwards to be gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince. Wilson, p. 225.

(w) James, who had now recovered from his despondency, wrote the following curious letter to his son and favourite, eighteen days after their departure from England:

"My sweete boys, I wryte this now this sevint letre unto you upon the seventeenth of Mairche, sent in my shippe calld the Adventure, to my two boys adventurers, qwhom God ever blesse; and now to begin with him, à jove principium, I have sent you, my babie, two of your chaplains fittest for this puspose, Mawe and Wren, together with all stuffe and ornaments fitte for the service of God; I have fully instructed thaime, so as all thaire behaviour and service shall, I hoape, prove decent and agreable to the puritie of the primitive church, and yet as neare the Romane forme as can lawfully be done, for itt hath ever been my way to goe with the church of Rome, usque ad aras. All the particulars hereof I remitte to the relation of youre before-named chaplens, I send you also youre roabes of the order, qwhiche you must not forgette to weare upon Saint George's day, and dine together in thaime, if they can come in time, qwhiche I pray God thaye maye, for itt will be a goodlie sight for the Spaniardis to see my two boys dyne in thaime. I send you also the jewells I promeised, both some of myne and such of youres, I meane bothe of you as are worthie the sending, for my babie's presenting his mistresse. I send him an old double crosse of Lorraine, not so riche as awncient, and yet not contemptible for the valew; a goodlie looking-glasse, with my picture in itt, to be hung att her girdle, qwhiche you must tell her ye have caused itt so to be enchawnted by airt magike, as whensoever shee shall be pleased to looke in itt she shall see the fairest ladie that either her brother or youre father's dominions can afforde; ye shall presente her with two faire long diamonts, set lyke an anker, and a faire pendante dyamont hanging att thaime; ye shall give her a goodly roape of pearles; ye shall give her a carquant or coller, threttein great ballas rubeis, and threttein knotes or cinques of pearles; and ye shall give her a head-dressing of two and twenty great peare pearles; and ye shall give her three goodlie peare pendant dyamonts, qwhairof the biggest to be worne at a needle on the middest of her foreheade, and one in everie eare. And for my babie's owin wearing ye have two goode jewells of your owin, youre rounde broache of dyamonts, and your tryangle dyamont, with the great rounde pearle; and I send you for youre wearing the three brethren that ye know full well, but newlie sette, and the mirroure of Frawnce, the fellow of the Portugal dyamont, qwhich I wolde wishe you to weare alone in your hatte, with a little blacke feather; ye have also good dyamont buttons of youre owin to be sett to a doublette or jerkin; as for youre I it may serve for a present to a don. As for thee, my sweete gosseppe, I send thee a faire table-dyamonde, qwhich I wolde once have gevin thee before if thou wolde have taken itt, for wearing on thy hatte, or qwhaire thou plaisis; and if my babie will spaire thee the two long dyamonts in forme of an anker, with the pendant dyamont, itt were fitt for an admirall to weare, and he hath enough better jewells for his mistresse; thou hes of thyne owin thy goode olde jewell, thy three pindars dyamonts, thy picture-case I gave Kate, and the great dyamont-chaine I gave her, qwho wolde have sent thee the least prinne she hadde, if I had not stayed her; if my babie will not spaire the anker from his mistresse, he may well lend thee his rounde broache to weare, and yet he shall haye jewells to weare in his hatte for three great dayes. And now for the form of my babie's presenting of his jewells to his mistresse, I leave that to himselfe, with Stennie's advice, and my lord of Bristolt's, the indiscretion of venturing as spectators at a court-ball at Paris, where Charles had a view of the princess Henrietta, whom he afterwards espoused, and who was at that time in the bloom of youth and beauty. Equally strong was the astonishment, mortification, and confusion of the earl of Bristol, when he saw the travellers alight at his house: nothing, in his opinion, but a demon in the form of the prince of Wales, could have prevented the successful termination of an affair that had cost so much time, pains, and vexation. It was alledged against him by Buckingham, that, on finding the prince's errand was not to turn Papist, as he at first suspected it was, he advised him with earnestness to that step. Nor is this fact improbable, since, in the present circumstances, the minister might rationally conclude, that a contrary resolution would be followed by the rupture of the treaty, and, with it, the disappointment of his future prospects.

When the arrival of the royal visitor was formally made known to the Spanish monarch, the attention of himself and council was totally employed in devising on the occasion a reception as romantically exalted as the occasion itself; nor could the most heated fancy of their own romantic writers describe more pompous ceremonies, or more bombast expressions of respect, than were here practised to delight the imagination of their enamoured guest: the prisons in Spain were thrown open; the sumptuary laws suspended; the privy counsellors waited on him in a body to inform him, that they had express orders to obey him as exactly as the king himself. Nor was he suffered long to languish for the sight of his mistress, who was carried abroad to visit a monastery, that the lover might be gratified with a distant view of her; the Spanish ideas of decency being so strict, as not to allow of any farther intercourse till the arrival of the dispensation. His introduction into the palace was performed with the same parade that attends the kings of Spain at their coronation; Philip took the left hand of him on every occasion, except in the apartments assigned to Charles, for there, he said, the prince was at home; he was constantly served by the grandees and tituladoes; Philip presented him with a golden key, which opened all the royal apartments, that he might, without any introduction, have access to him at all hours; the queen sent him divers presents of rich apparel, perfumes, and other rarities of the country; he was entertained with a variety of shews and triumphs, where, like a successful knight, he often obtained the prize in the presence of his mistress; at a dinner in St. Jerome's monastery several of the chief officers of the crown waited upon him bareheaded: even Olivares himself, though a grandee of Spain, who has the right of being covered before his own king, would not put his hat on in the prince's presence. Wilson asserts that this servile custom was introduced into Spain by Philip the Second, who carried it from England, where he had been thus attended (x).

The point of honour was carried so far by the Spaniards, that no attempt was made, on account of the advantage they had acquired, by having the prince in their possession, of imposing any harder conditions of treaty: their pious zeal only promped them, on one occasion, to desire more concessions in the religious articles; but upon the opposition of the earl of Bristol, accompanied with some reproaches, they immediately desisted. There was one article, however, in which the king promised, that the children should be educated by the princess, till they were ten years of age. This condition could not be insisted on, but with a view of seasoning their minds with Catholic principles, and though so tender an age seemed a sufficient security against theological prejudices, yet the same reason which made the pope insert that article, should have induced the king to reject it.

Whilst this pompous scene was acting at Madrid, the dispensation lingered at Rome. The prime minister Olivares, on his first congratulations to the prince, told him, "That the match would be concluded instantly; that now the kings of Spain and England should divide the world between them, for that he did not question but he came to change his religion." The artful Gondemar, who was at this time at Madrid, did not fail to act his part of the farce, by telling the prince one day, in a jocular manner, "That he had strange news to tell him, which was, that himself, though an Englishman in his heart, had been made that morning a privy counsellor." This was followed by a compliment from Philip, that he had conferred that honour on Gondemar that his highness might be informed of all their resolutions.

Charles at this time received a very civil letter from pope Gregory the Fifteenth: it expresses an assured belief that the prince was come to Spain for the purpose of being received into the bosom of the papal church. As the prince's answer to this letter has been represented by a very ingenious author in the light of a decent compliment, to which there could be no substantial objections, we shall give it at full length (y).

"Most holy father,

"We have received your letter with no less thankfulness and respect than is due to the singular good-will and godly affection wherewith we know it was written. It was most acceptable to us, that the never-enough-renowned examples of our ancestors were proposed to us by your holiness for our inspection and imitation; who, though they often hazarded their lives and fortunes, to propagate the Christian faith, yet did they never more chearfully display the banners of Christ crucified, against his most bitter enemies, than we will endeavour to the utmost, that the peace and union which so long triumphed may be reduced into the Christian world, after a kind of elimination or exile. For since the malice of the father of discords hath sowed such unhappy divisions amongst those who profess the Christian religion, we account this most necessary, thereby to promote with better success the glory of God, and Christ our Saviour. Nor shall we esteem it less honour to tread in their footsteps, and to have been their rivals and imitators in holy undertakings, than to have been descended of them; and we are very much encouraged to this, as well by the known inclination of our lord and father, and his ardent desire to lend a hand to so pious a work, as by the anguish that gnaws his royal breast when he considers what cruel destructions, what deplorable calamities arise out of the dissentions of Christian princes. Your holiness's conjecture of our desire to contract an alliance and marriage with a Catholic family and princess, is agreeable both to your wisdom and charity; for we would never desire so vehemently to be joined in a strict and indissoluble bond with any mortal whatsoever, whose religion we hated. Therefore your holiness may be assured, that we are, and always will be, of that moderation as to abstain from such actions as may testify our hatred against the Roman Catholic religion; we will rather embrace all occasions, whereby, through a gentle and fair procedure, all sinister suspicions may be taken away: that as we all confess one individual Trinity, and one Christ crucified, we may unanimously grow up into one faith; which that we may compass, we little value all labour and watchings, yea, the very hazard of our lives. It remains that we render thanks to your holiness for your letter, which we esteem as a singular present, and wish your holiness all prosperity and eternal happiness (z)". Dated at Madrid, 20 Junii, 1623.

Whilst the prince's passion was tantalized by daily expectations of the dispensation, it at length arrived from Rome, Bristolt's, onlie I would not have thaime presented all att once, but att the more sundrie times the better, and I would have the rarest and richest kept hinmoste. I have also sent four other crosses of meaner valew, with a great pointed dyamont in a ring, qwhich will save charges in presents to dons, according to their qualities; but I will send with the fleete dyvers other jewells for presents for saving of chairges, qwhairof we have soe muche neede; for till my babie's comming away thaire will be no neede of giving of presents to any but to her. Thus you see how as long as I want the sweete comforte of my boyes conversation, I ame forced, yea, and delytes, to converse with thaime by long letres. God blesse you both, my sweete boyes, and sende you, after a successful journey, a joyefull and happie returne in the armis of your deare dade.

(z) To make the comment upon this answer more easy, it must be known that the pope, in his letter, exhorts the prince to follow his ancestors in obedience to the see of Rome. "It was most acceptable to us, returns the prince, that the never-enough-renowned examples of our ancestors were proposed to us by your holiness for our inspection and imitation." The pope proposes no medium, he insists upon a return of obedience to the papal hierarchy: "Yet did they never, says the prince, more chearfully display the banners of Christ crucified, against his most bitter enemies, than we will endeavour to the utmost to restore peace and union to the church." The pope supposes that the prince prosecutes the intended marriage with a design to re-unite himself to the church of Rome: the prince returns answer, "That the pope's conjecture is according to charity and wisdom, for he would never desire to be joined in marriage with Rome, tacked to additional articles in point of religion: but as these were esteemed of great importance, he thought proper to refer them to his father, and sir Francis Cottington was accordingly sent to England on this errand. James was so delighted with the account which Cottington gave of his son's treatment at the court of Spain, that he broke out into frantic expressions of joy, and was heard several times to say, "Now all the devils in hell cannot hinder the match." On his asking his council whether it would be convenient to grant a toleration for Papists, he received a letter from Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, which strongly represented to him how incongruous such a measure was to all his past professions, and how dangerous the attempt to abrogate the laws of the land by his own power, might prove to the welfare of himself and family. This spirited interposition was made by the worthy prelate whilst he lay under disgrace for having killed a park-keeper in an attempt to shoot a deer. His mortification for this unlucky accident had been so great as to petition the king for leave to retire to an alms-house at Guildford, which he had built for the maintenance of the poor. The lord keeper Williams had informed Buckingham, that, by the common law yet in force, the archbishop was made irregular, ipso facto, and therefore suspended from all ecclesiastical functions, until restored by his superior, who was the king's majesty; to this he added, "That though it was against the king's nature to add affliction to the afflicted, yet to leave a man of blood primate and patriarch of all his churches, sounded very harsh in the old councils and canons, and the Papists would not spare to censure it (a). It is very much to James's credit that this advice was rejected, and the archbishop continued in his ecclesiastical dignity.

Sir Francis Cottington was shortly sent back to Spain with the additional articles signed by the king and council, viz.—"That the infanta should take with her her family, and that these shall be nominated by the Catholic king, and afterwards supplied by him: that the election of her priests shall belong to the infanta: that the servants of the family of the lady infanta shall not be obliged to take the oath of allegiance to the king of Great Britain, provided there be any clause contrary to their consciences, and the Roman Catholic religion: that the laws which are, or shall be, against religion, shall not take hold of the said servants, and only the superior ecclesiastic may proceed against ecclesiastical persons, as hath been accustomed by Catholics. And if any secular judge shall apprehend any ecclesiastical person for any offence, he shall forthwith cause him to be delivered to the superior ecclesiastic, who shall proceed against him according to the canon-law: that the nurses who shall give suck to the children of the lady infanta shall be chosen by the lady infanta." To these additional articles, with those already mentioned, the king and privy council swore. Moreover, the king agreed to these private ones, viz. "That particular laws now enacted against Roman Catholics, and even general laws, under which all the subjects are comprized, if they are repugnant to the Roman Catholic religion, shall not at any time hereafter, by any means or chance whatsoever, directly or indirectly, be commanded to be put in execution against the said Roman Catholics; and we will cause that our council shall take the same oath, as far as it pertains to them: that no attempt shall be made with the most renowned lady infanta, Donna Maria, about any thing which shall be repugnant to the Roman Catholic religion, or those things which shall be contained in the treaty of matrimony: that we and the prince of Wales will interpose our authority, and will do as much as in us lie, that the parliament shall ratify the articles capitulated between the most renowned kings in favour of the Roman Catholics by reason of this marriage, and that the said parliament shall revoke and abrogate the particular laws made against Roman Catholics, as likewise the general laws under which all are equally comprehended, if they are repugnant to the Roman Catholic religion; and we will not hereafter consent that the said parliament shall ever at any time enact or write any other new laws against Roman Catholics."

The privy-counsellor's oath was this: "I, A. B. do swear that I will truly and fully observe, as much as belongeth to me, all and every of the articles which are contained in the treaty of marriage between the most gracious Charles prince of Wales, and the most gracious lady Donna Maria, infanta of Spain. Likewise I swear, that I will neither commit to execution, or cause to be executed, either by myself or by any inferior officer serving under, any law made against any Roman Catholic whatsoever, nor will execute any punishment inflicted by those laws, but in all things that belong to me will faithfully observe his majesty's word given in that behalf."

When Cottington carried the ratification to Spain, the prince of Wales engaged on the part of his father, that all the agreed-to particulars should take place in three years, or sooner if possible; that he would intercede that the ten years of the education under the infanta should, according to the desire of the pope, be prorogued to twelve. To this was added an obligation, that, as often as the infanta should require, the prince would give ear to divines or others whom she would please to employ, in matter of the Roman Catholic religion; and for further caution in point of the free exercise of the said religion, the prince engaged, on the word of a king, that the things promised should take effect, and be put in execution, as well in the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as of England.

The belief of a powerful protection to the Catholics in England was at this time so well established, that a titular bishop of Calcedon came privately to London to exercise an episcopal jurisdiction over them. Bonfires and other public rejoicings were made on the success of the treaty; the infanta was stiled princess of Wales; a chapel was building for her at St. James's; a fleet was prepared to convey her to England; and amongst the servile, the curious, and the ignorant, three numerous classes of men, which are the constant flatterers and followers of the humours of the times, her picture was every where to be seen. At this time several noblemen left England to pay their court at Madrid.

In the good humour into which the present situation of affairs had put James, the favourite was not forgotten: a patent for the title of duke was sent to him by Cottington, that he might be upon a footing with the best grandee in Spain. But whilst the self-flattered monarch was enjoying in prospect the accomplishment of his desires, new doubts arose in the council at Madrid. As much or more had been yielded to, it was said, than could have been reasonably expected; but, had the British king and his son power to effect what they had so readily granted? would it not be prudent to make this trial by delaying the solemnization of the nuptials till the full performance of the concessions? On the result of this debate the bishop of Segovia frankly told Buckingham, "That the articles James had assented to in favour of the Roman Catholics, amounted to a toleration; that he had heard something of the estate of England, that the king could not grant a toleration without a rebellion, and he easily believed it, because that the king of Spain was not able in his dominions to effect the like enterprize without incurring the like danger: he therefore concluded, that if the infanta was sent into England before these alterations were established, she might be treated with a rebellion." Gundamore, who had given information to the Spanish council of the measure of influence James had in England, closed in with the bishop of Segovia, and said, "That he did not think it fitting to part with the infanta before the articles were perfectly put in execution."

This new objection, when communicated to James, threw him again into a fit of despair: his promises had been made in secret, and not to be performed but by degrees, and after the marriage, when the power of Spain was united to the power of the crown of England; he was now pressed to expose them to the public, by an abrupt execution, whilst the treaty was yet unconcluded, and, by such a prelude, to fill the minds of his already discontented subjects with dreadful apprehensions of its issue.

To give Spain, however, every possible satisfaction on a subject of so great importance, a full declaration of his intentions was drawn up, and signed by secretary Conway, and several privy counsellors. This fully confirmed the with any one whose religion he hated." It is very apparent, from the whole tenour of the answer, that at this time the love-sick prince was too much rivetted in the desire of the match to let any obstacles in point of religion interpose between him and possession.

(a) Williams, who was at this time indulged with the bishopric of Lincoln, refused to be consecrated by the unfortunate prelate. It may be questioned whether this objection arose from a conscience delicate in trifles, or from a desire to please his patron Buckingham, to whom Abbot was very disagreeable. Laud, who, by the means of that favourite, was at this time appointed bishop of St. David's, had the same scruples.

tenour of all the articles, both public and private; and that it should be lawful for the Spanish ambassadors to assign a discreet person to employ such sufficient lawyers as should be thought fit to take care of the strength, validity, and security of the said articles; and "that his majesty's attorney should have charge to receive and admit the said lawyers to the sight and judgement of the said draughts, and, in any doubts, to give them satisfaction, or to use such legal, necessary, and pertinent words and phrases as he the attorney-general should propound for the security of the Roman Catholics, and sure making of the said grants; and that his majesty's will and pleasure was, that a legal and authentic pardon should be passed under the great seal, wherein should be freely pardoned all the penalties to which the Roman Catholics were liable for matters of conscience, and in which they had been proceeded against, or might be; that a course should be taken that the pardon should not be costly; and that it should be lawful to put as many as was possible in one pardon."

The Spanish ambassadors, not being satisfied with these assurances, the lord-keeper and other commissioners were directed to draw up a pardon of all offences past, with a dispensation for those to come, to be granted to all Roman Catholics obnoxious to any laws against recusants, and then to issue forth two general commands under the great seal of England; the one to all judges and justices of the peace, and the other to all bishops, chancellors, and commissaries, not to execute any statute against them. The pardon was passed full and ample; but Williams, the lord-keeper, represented so strongly the danger of a general discontent and insurrection, should it take place immediately, by the means of so peremptory a prohibition to the judges and bishops, and the greater probability of success were the king's favours enlarged by degrees, that the ambassadors at length consented that the matter should rest till the arrival of the infanta.

To all the important concessions that had been already made by James, this additional clause in the pope's dispensation was still insisted on: "That whereas there were certain articles consented unto by the king of England in favour of the Roman Catholics in his dominions, a security should be given for the performance of those concessions." To this demand James answered, "That he could give no other security than his own and the prince's oath, exemplified under the great seal of England." But this not proving satisfactory, James suffered the mortification of being told, "That his own and the prince's oath was not a sufficient security, unless some sovereign Catholic prince would stand engaged for its performance." Affairs remaining thus embarrassed, the king of Spain proffered to engage himself by oath for a performance of the articles, if, on a consultation with his ghostly fathers, it was determined that he might do it with a safe conscience. A junto of divines were called to a formal consideration; and they at length concluded in the affirmative, and asserted, that in case the king of England should fail to execute what was stipulated, the king of Spain should vindicate his oath by the sword. Thus did his Catholic majesty obtain a kind of right to head a large party in England, which were to appeal to him for redress of grievances in all cases.

The vast acquisitions which had been lately made by the house of Austria, and the prospect of its increase of power by a conjunction with the reigning family on the throne of Great Britain, raised apprehensions in the court of France that occasioned an entire alteration of their late measures. From persecuting their Protestant subjects to the brink of destruction, they condescended to a re-union, on the terms of their possessing all the privileges in point of religion which they had before enjoyed. The state of the mal-contents in Germany was daily more hopeless; and the restoration of the Palatinates had not been mentioned in the late transactions between James and the court of Spain.

In vain had he sacrificed both reputation and interest to the chimerical project of an union with the house of Austria; further obstacles still retarded the accomplishment of his most sanguine wishes. At this particular crisis, when the affair was apparently concluded to the satisfaction of all parties, the death of Gregory the Fifteenth afforded the Spaniards an excuse for delaying the nuptials till the assent of cardinal Barberini, the new pope, who assumed the appellation of Urban the Eighth, had been obtained. The Spanish ministry pretended, that, as the dispensation still lay in the nuncio's hands, and a contract had not been formed upon it, it was by the late pope's death suspended, and a ratification from the new one was become absolutely necessary. This unseasonable objection undoubtedly proceeded from the zeal of the courts of Rome and Spain to complete the prince's conversion before he left Madrid.

The immediate act of the new pope was to begin a correspondence with the king of England and his son: he informs the latter, that the first letters which he received after he was preferred to the apostle's chair, were those sent out of Spain from him the prince to Gregory the Fifteenth, his predecessor, of famous memory: "We lifted up our hands to Heaven," continues he, and gave thanks to the Father of Mercies, when, in the very entry of our reign, a British prince began to perform this kind of obeisance to the pope of Rome."

Charles's patience, as might naturally be expected, began to be exhausted, by the vexatious delays which had successively arisen between him and the possession of his mistress. The Spaniards in effect had, by an over-niceness and too refined a policy, rather starved than cherished his passion; instead of having indulged him with those tender interviews and little favours that swell the expectations, raise the desires, and increase the passion of the sanguine lover, he had been treated with a reserve that amounted to an affected indifference; entertaining his mistress had been no otherwise allowed than in the most formal manner, before a circle of ceremonious spectators. Thus restrained, his passion had been vented in distant glances, which met with a return so cold that it damped the hopes of a mutual inclination. His long stay at Madrid had produced occasions which gave rise to a reciprocal disgust between the favourite Buckingham and the Spanish ministry: that formal people regarded with aversion the manners of the English sycophant—a mixture of Gallic licentiousness and British roughness. The distasteful familiarity that subsisted between him and his master gave great offence to the exalted notions which that ceremonious nation entertained of royalty, and was as incongruous to the equally exalted pretensions of James and his son, as to the romantic conceits of the Spaniards. A contemptible buffoonry was not the most material offence in Buckingham's carriage; his behaviour was lascivious, and his whole conduct compounded of oppositions to Spanish gravity and Spanish delicacy.

From these causes had arose so reciprocal an animosity between the parties, that it produced at several times high and warm altercations. Olivares, in a junto of ministers, had reproached Buckingham with having flattered them with the hopes, that the prince would renounce the Protestant faith; Buckingham told him he lied; the indignant Spaniard resented the affront with spirit, and gave the favourite to understand, that it was the importance of the treaty in agitation that prevented him from insisting on the proper satisfaction for so gross an injury. These and other subjects of disgust alienated Buckingham's affections from the Spanish match. The earl of Bristol, ambassador from James to the court of Spain, whose conduct had been, for the whole series of his negociation, subservient to the view of completing this alliance, was as much approved by the nobility of Spain as Buckingham's was disliked. They shewed so strong a disapprobation of the treaty's having been taken out of the hands of the former, and transferred to the latter, that they testified a doubt of the sufficiency of his power, as it had not been confirmed by the council of England. The high spirit of Buckingham, who, from the commencement of James's absurd affection to him, had never met with the like opposition, was enraged to a degree of resentment that would alone have instigated him to break off the impending treaty. His political reasons were not immaterial ones: there was at this time a large party in the court of England, that, from motives of jealousy, in opposition to his influence, supported the earl of Bristol; Buckingham indeed was now become so noxious to the whole court of Spain, that they declared they would rather bury the infanta than trust her in his hands; his patron James had been rather disobliged by his insolent carriage on the debate of the prince's journey to Madrid. The surest object he had to depend on was his present interest with Charles, and that might be rendered very precarious by the union between him and the infanta, who, it was to be supposed, would have a powerful influence over his young and amorous mind.

Such being the situation of affairs, the catastrophe that immediately followed is not a very surprizing one. Buckingham now employed his whole powers to instil into the prince an aversion for what had till this time been the object of his passionate desire. The present obstinacy of the Spanish ministry, who not only refused to accomplish the marriage till the ratification of the dispensation, but also to deliver up the infanta till the spring, concurred so efficaciously with Buckingham's endeavours, that Charles was persuaded to think that the Spaniards had no sincere inclination to an union with the crown of England, and that himself and his father had been the dupes to a treaty, the completion of which would involve them in inextricable difficulties. These, and other the like insinuations, wrought him up to such a height of resentment, that he listened with eagerness to the project of an abrupt departure, and began to entertain doubts of not being able to effect it. In this despondency he wrote word to his father, "That he must now look upon his sister and her children, never thinking more of him, and forgetting that he had such a son." Buckingham also plied him with letters at the same time, to this effect: "That he had at length discovered the king of Spain's insincerity; that not only he had no inclination to cause the Palatinate to be restored, but also was far from having the least thought of accomplishing the marriage; and that the prince was in danger of being retained in Spain all his life." These and other advices of the same sort put the poor old king into such a fright that he wrote positive orders to Buckingham to bring away the prince if possible; at the same time he sent a fleet of ships to St. Andero in Biscay to escort them home (b). This order was obeyed with alacrity: on pretence of preparing the English navy for the prince's reception, Buckingham departed hastily. He took no ceremonious farewel of the court; but told Olivares bluntly, "That he was obliged to the king, queen, and infanta, in an eternal tie of gratitude; that he would be an everlasting servant to them, and endeavour to do the best offices for concluding the match, and strengthening the amity between the two crowns; but as for himself, he had so far disobliged him, that he could not, without flattery, make the least profession of friendship to him." The departure of the prince was extremely solemn, and the parade of his farewel equal to that which attended his reception. Exalted were the reciprocal compliments: Philip declared, "That the prince had laid him under an everlasting obligation, by placing so high a degree of confidence in him as to trust his person in his hands, a thing unusual with princes." Charles magnified the favours he had received, and added, "That he could not sufficiently express the high degree of estimation they had begot for the worth of the giver." So great appears to have been the respect which Philip bore to Charles, that he even erected a pillar on the spot where they took leave of each other, as a monument of mutual friendship and regard.

Very different from these protestations were the impressions which Buckingham had lately made on his easy ductile mind. It was observed that the first words that he spoke after he was embarked were, "That it was a great weakness and folly in the Spaniards, after they had used him so ill, to grant him a free departure." Before he left the court of Madrid, a procuration to the king of Spain and Don Carlos his brother, to make the espousal in his name, was left in the hands of the earl of Bristol; it had in it a general clause inserted, that it should not be revoked. This proxy, by the particular direction of the prince, was to expire at Christmas, and was not to be delivered into the king of Spain's hands till ten days after the arrival of the dispensation. Immediately on the prince's joining Buckingham, a positive order was sent to Bristol not to deliver it till security was given him that the infanta, after the espousal had taken place, should not betake herself to a monastery, and to inform the prince what security was offered, that he might himself be judge whether it was proper to accept it. At the same time a defeazance of the proxy, in case the dispensation came clogged with any new demands, was sent privately to one Clark, to be produced on a critical occasion; so fearful was this once-ardent lover lest the marriage should be solemnized before he could gain time to persuade his father to reject it.

Charles and his present favourite were no sooner arrived in England than they fully demonstrated to James their present distaste and aversion to an union with Spain; and this unfortunate monarch was a second time obliged to yield to the obstinacy of his son and the intemperate pursuits of his domineering servant. An express was sent to Bristol, to inform him, that a clear restitution of the Palatinate was expected with the solemnization of the nuptials, and a command that he should procure from the king of Spain a punctual answer what course he would take for the restitution of the Palatinate and Electorate; and in case the emperor or duke of Bavaria should oppose any part of the restitution, what assurances of content he would give in that point; to this a direction was added, that the betrothing of the infanta should be on one of the days in Christmas.

This express threw the earl of Bristol into the utmost perplexity: the obstacles which the prince had thrown in his way were in a manner got over; he had attained a full security for the infanta's not taking the veil, and intended, by the support of his public warrant under the great seal of England, to wave the private order, and deliver the proxy on the arrival of the dispensation. James's command could not be so well parried, and the minister's present prospects began to wear a cloudy aspect; he and Buckingham had been at open variance during their mutual abode at Madrid, and the prince was infinitely disobliged by a management that altogether opposed his present inclinations. The rise of fortune he now possessed had been totally owing to the having conducted the treaty to a conclusive period. His interest with James, solely founded on the merit of his negociation, increased in proportion to its fancied success: from this circumstance, during its process, he had been created baron Digby, then earl of Bristol. The increasing good will of his master, and the advantage he had promised himself from the favour of the Catholic king and his ministry, obtained from an obsequious adherence to the manners and interests of the court of Spain, were now lost by this successful counter-act of his antagonist Buckingham, whom he had entertained hopes of overtopping by means of the infanta's power in the court of England. Desperate as were the present circumstances, he did not entirely abandon the hopes of concluding the marriage. Having obtained from Philip a written promise that the Palatinate should be restored, he wrote an answer to James, in which he informed him, "That the dispensation was hourly expected at the court of Madrid, and that letters from the duke of Pastrava certified that the pope had clearly passed it." He then expostulated with him on the direction of having the marriage solemnized on one of the Christmas holidays; assured himself that it was given on want of due information that the powers would be then expired; and adds, that, with the concurrence of sir Walter Aston, he should deliver the said powers when demanded, and pass on to the nominating of a prefixed day for the depossorio's, if he received no orders to the contrary. "I have of purpose," continues he, "dispatched the post with this letter, to the end I may receive your majesty's directions in this particular with all possible speed; which I hope shall be to proceed directly to the marriage, according to the capitulations, and so to order all things for the princess's journey in the spring. And for the Palatinate, your majesty may be confident there shall be diligence used in procuring a good and speedy resolution."

These were not the only endeavours practised by the earl of Bristol to restore this business. Letters had been sent to the prince of Wales, shewing, that though the point of portion was a material one, yet, when the Spanish junto found it, by the papers of the late king, to be no less than two millions of pieces of eight, they resolved to make it good, notwithstanding they alleged that this sum was four times as much as ever was given in money with any daughter of Spain. To these were added arguments from the infanta's rank and personal merits. Moreover, sir Walter Aston, a minister who had been joined by the prince in commission with Bristol for a check upon his forwardness, laboured to reconcile Buckingham to the match,

(b) One of James's letters on the occasion of these desponding messages:

"My sweet boys,

"Your letter by Cottington hath struck me dead; I fear it shall much shorten my days. Alas! I now repent me sore that ever I suffered you to go away: I care for match nor nothing, so I may once have you in my arms again; God grant it! God grant it! God grant it! amen, amen, amen. I protest ye shall be as heartily welcome as if ye had done all things ye went for, so that I may once have you in my arms again. And so God bless you both, my only sweet son, only best sweet servant, and let me hear from you quickly, with all speed, as you love my life. And so God send you a happy joyful meeting in the arms of by insinuating, that if it proceeded, he (Buckingham) would have the honour of it; and the infanta being duly informed, must acknowledge him to be the person to whom she was obliged (c). These attempts were all unsuccessful; the prince and Buckingham were determined against the match, and Bristol was commanded to follow the new instructions; namely, not to deliver the powers till he obtained from the king of Spain a direct engagement for the restitution of the Palatinate and the electoral dignity.

Notwithstanding these proceedings, James had not as yet been prevailed on to disclaim entirely the match, and still flattered himself that he could accommodate the present difference by treaties. With this view he sent a renewal of the powers for a larger time, and tendered these following propositions to his son-in-law, the titular king of Bohemia: To accommodate his broken fortunes by a full submission to the emperor, and an acceptation of the return of the Palatinate to his son, and the administration to himself, with the electoral dignity, after the death of the duke of Bavaria, on the conditions of an union between that son and a daughter of the emperor: the Palsgrave not to have the tuition of his said son, but to give up that charge to the infanta, when she should be princess of Wales. To this disgraceful proposal Frederick returned a very spirited answer: he rejected the humiliating terms advised him by James; shewed that they were only offered by his enemies, with a design to render his cause more desperate, by making him abject in the eyes of the Protestant princes, who were at this time disposed to succour him; he then set forth the fraudulent conduct of the emperor and his allies, with the many gross impositions he had been already obliged to submit to. In describing the present politic state of Germany and Great Britain, he shewed, though in modest terms, that if spirited measures had been pursued by the court of England, James had been in a situation of giving law to the house of Austria, instead of receiving it in so disgraceful a manner; and insisted that Germany would again exert itself, if encouraged by a warlike motion from the king of England.

The enterprizes recommended to James in this answer were strongly seconded by the adversaries of the Spanish match, at this time headed by the prince and Buckingham. This latter had an offer of an union between his son and a daughter of the Palsgrave, on condition of his obtaining a vigorous assistance from England towards the recovery of the Palatinate.

When the ratification of the dispensation arrived at Madrid (d), bonfires were made throughout all Spain; guns were fired, and other demonstrations of public rejoicings exhibited; the infanta took upon her the title of princess of England; her family was settled; and the beginning of March appointed for her journey; the behaviour of the English ambassadors to her was the same as used by courtiers to their sovereign; from the prince's departure she had applied herself to the learning the English language, and had begun the letters of compliment which were to be sent to her husband and father-in-law on the day of her espousals; presents were prepared for their acceptance; the ninth of December was appointed for the marriage-day; all the grandees were invited to the wedding; a gallery leading from the court to the church was erected a quarter of a mile in length, covered with tapestry, to conduct the bride elect, in open view, and with most magnificent solemnity, to the ceremony. Bristol had provided costly equipages, when the whole business was instantly defeated on the opening his farther instructions from England which were, to procure an entire surrender of the Palatinate and Electorate, before he advanced towards finishing the contract (e). To this oddly-timed demand the king of Spain gave answer, "That neither the Palatinates nor the Electorate were in his power to dispose of; but if a treaty was set on foot, and the emperor and the duke of Bavaria would not come to terms of conformity, he would join arms with England to recover them, and was willing to give any security for a due performance." These answers not proving satisfactory, the earl of Bristol was recalled, and the infanta laid down the title of princess of England. Thus ended a treaty in which had been expended in embassies, in the prince's journey, and in presents given at the court of Madrid, as much money as was the destined portion of the infanta, which being in pieces of eight, amounted to the sum of six hundred thousand pounds, as we have before observed.

On Bristol's announcing his orders of revocation, he received from Olivares, in the name of Philip, large proffers of mediation in the court of England, and that his majesty, for the example of his own subjects, and for encouragement to all such as should serve their princes with the like loyalty, had sent him a blank, on which he might set down his own conditions in point of title or fortune. Bristol, not thinking it proper to accept these offers, illustrated his refusal with an answer in which he magnified his own disinterestedness, his fidelity to his master, and his entire confidence in his justice.

To the influence that Buckingham maintained over the weak mind of his prince have most authors attributed the abrupt dissolution of the Spanish treaty. But to the power, not the persuasion, of the favourite, may be more justly ascribed this whimsical and unexpected event. It was neither inclination nor conviction that prevailed on James to disclaim the offered conclusion of that which had been the object of his earnest pursuit for a series of fifteen years; his affections were over-ruled by the impetuous opposition of Buckingham, whose present interest with this prince, and the concurrence of the majority of the nation, detached from him every other support than a precarious assistance from Spain. In this disposition of affairs, the timid monarch, with a painful compliance, submitted to measures that overthrew his hopes in the very crisis of their accomplishment. Nor did the wanton insolence of his pampered servant stop at this point; his private piques must be revenged on Spain, and his pacific master enter as a party in his quarrel; he who, through the course of a long reign, had with a fearful anxiety maintained an uninterrupted peace, must sound to arms, and declare war with a family to whose courted friendship he had before sacrificed every consideration.

As not only the entire rupture of the treaty, but a war with Spain had been agreed on between Charles and Buckingham, Bristol had been recalled, and Henry Rich, earl of Holland, sent into France with proposals of marriage between the prince of Wales, and the princess Henrietta, third daughter to Henry the Fourth. James, on the occasion of the destined war, was obliged to have recourse to the demand of a benevolence from the subject: the measures whereby it was exorted were most injurious. On the refusal of Barnes, a citizen of London, orders were sent from the treasurer, that he must immediately prepare to carry by the post a dispatch into Ireland. The citizen was obliged to compound the matter; and this example deterred every one afterwards from refusing the sum required (f).

Buckingham's impetuosity rose to such a height, as, first, to propose the selling the crown lands for the expence of the war, and then to consult with Dr. John Preston, head of the Puritan party, on the seizing the dean and chapter lands for the use of the crown. He was dissuaded from these undertakings by the lord-keeper Williams (g), nor could he persuade James to countenance them. A select council was appointed to examine into

(c) Buckingham sent a threatening letter to Aston for these offices: he tells him, "That the king had been advised to revoke his commission; that his disgrace will immediately happen, if he does not remove displeasure, by a conduct entirely conformable to the sense of the instructions he received from the prince." Cabala, fol. ed. 1673, p. 127, & seq.

(d) The ambassador that waited on Charles with congratulatory compliments from the king of Spain, on his safe return to England, had been ordered to make known to the princes of Flanders, Germany, and Italy, how near the marriage was to a conclusion. The Polish ambassador at Madrid, whose errand was to solicit a match between the infanta and his master, returned home on the arrival of the dispensation.

(e) This command was confirmed by the dispatches of four several messengers, who arrived at Madrid close at each other's heels.

(f) This is a glaring instance of that gross and pernicious abuse to which every degree of confidence in government is liable.

(g) The manner in which Buckingham was put off from this attempt is as follows: he acknowledged in a conversation with Williams, that for the success of his plan he depended on the disposition of the popular leaders of the Commons'-house, and particularly on sir Edward Coke. Williams managed the contest in such a manner, that Buckingham owned he had been entirely mistaken in the opinion he had formed of the principles of the leading commoners, and desisted from his project. Hacket, who tells us this story, adds that Williams, the day preceding this conference, had waited two hours in the duke's anti-chamber, whilst he was shut up with Preston, without having gained admittance. This usage of Williams shews that it was no uncommon behaviour in Buckingham to subject the lord-keeper with the great seal of England to the mortification of a servile attendance, and gives some authority to Welden's account of the treatment Bacon met with from the same quarter. Bishop Hacket's Life of Williams, oct. ed. 1715, p 79, & seq.

the present situation of affairs with Spain, and into the conduct of that court. This council was very refractory to the impetuous inclinations of Buckingham, who, depending on his present popularity, and the fervour of the people towards a war with the house of Austria, forced the king into the calling of a parliament, that he might appeal from his opposers to that powerful court.

The situation of James, says Rapin, at this time was pitiable: since the return of the prince and the duke he not only ceased to rule, but was obliged to concur in measures that he detested: he was surrounded with people in whom he could put no confidence; his domestics were all of them, either through interest or fear, the creatures of Buckingham; most of them owed their places to this favourite, and the present union that subsisted between him and the prince, strengthened the resentment of former obligations with the hopes of new ones. James's distress was heightened by a paper privately conveyed to him from the marquis Inoiosa, the Spanish ambassador, specifying, "That a conspiracy had been formed by the prince and duke to confine him (the king) to one of his country-houses, and usurp themselves the government." The duke's late conduct was alledged as a leading circumstance to the treachery: according to an intimation in the letter, the ambassador's secretary was admitted to a private discourse. Neither did the written or verbal intelligence occasion the desired alteration in James's conduct: he was observed to grow melancholy, and affected for some time to speak to his son and favourite in a mysterious broken language. At length, on a party with the prince to Windsor, he ordered Buckingham, on a trivial pretence, to remain behind. Buckingham, who looked upon this as a token of uncommon displeasure, besought the king to acquaint him with the cause of this disgrace. The king, with tears in his eyes, returned answer, "That himself was the unhappiest man alive, to be forsaken of those that were most dear to him." By the advice of Williams, Buckingham followed to Windsor, in which place he found means to work so efficaciously on his master's weaknesses, as to effect a seeming, if not a real reconciliation (h).

There had subsisted some time before this a great coolness between Williams and Buckingham: the former had conceived hopes of supplanting his patron, and with this view had united himself to the Spanish faction; but finding, from the timidity and weakness of James's conduct, that the favourite would in the end be victorious, he chimed in with his measures, and not only informed him of every particular circumstance in the late combination carried on by the Spanish ambassador, but drew up a refutation of the whole charge alledged by that minister against him.

The parliament met on the twelfth of February, 1623. The king's speech to this assembly was an echo of the new-adopted sentiments of the favourite, and its contents a direct contradiction to his former doctrines on the like and every other occasion. "The properties and causes of calling a parliament, says he, are to confer with the king and give him advice in matters of the greatest weight and importance." He then tells them, "That the present purport of their meeting is to give him their counsel in the most interesting matter that ever could concern a king; that though he had been upon a treaty with Spain for many years, the situation of his affairs continued doubtful till he sent the prince to Madrid, with the man he most trusted—Buckingham; that on their return he found himself as far disappointed of his end, as if he had been waked out of a dream." He is content that his secretaries, on the information of his son and Buckingham, shall relate unto them all the circumstances of the Spanish management, and what he is likely to obtain, and that when they have heard all, super totam materiam, he shall intreat their good and sound advice. "One particular, says he, I must remember you of, because it hath been much talked of in the country, that I should be slack in my care of religion: my lords and gentlemen all, I pray you judge me charitably, as you would be judged; for I never made public or private treaty, but I always had a direct reservation for the public weal and the cause of religion, for the glory of God and the good of my subjects; I only thought good sometimes to wink and connive at the execution of some penal laws, and not to go on so rigorously as at other times, but not to dispense with any or to forbid or alter any that concern religion, I never promised or yielded; I never did think it with my heart, nor spoke it with my mouth. My lords and gentlemen, adds he, it is not enough, although you are never so willing to give me your advice; for to plant will not serve the turn, if I, like a good gardener, as well as plant do not weed away from the roots, and remove the obstacles that hinder your so-good advice, of which the whole weed and manifest hindrance that can be is your jealousy of me; free me from that, and for my actions I dare avow them before God and his angels; but jealousy hath a deep sting; take away that, and nothing can do me harm: you are my wife, and jealousy is subject to a wife, therefore remove it, and be not jealous of me. For matters of privilege, liberties, and customs, be not over curious; I am your own kindly king, ye never shall find me curious in these things: therefore do what you ought, and no more than your lawful liberties and privileges will permit, and you shall never see me curious to the contrary; I had rather maintain your liberties than alter them in any thing; shew a trust in me, and go on honestly as ye ought to do, like good and faithful subjects; and what you have warrant for go on with, and I will not be curious, unless you give me too much cause. The next thing is, to beware that you take not in hand the maintaining of idle questions among you, which spoil good business: remember, beware of genealogies and curious questions, as St. Paul speaks; and do you keep to the ground and gravity of the great business for which I called you; and next, for all other things that are for the great and good governing of this kingdom. Let not any stir you up to law-questions, debates, quirks, tricks, and jerks, but continue yourselves in that honest modesty whereby you may have my prayers to God for you, and procure the love of me, and a happy end to this parliament. God judge me, I speak as a Christian prince; never man in a dry and sandy desart, where no water is, did thirst more in hot weather for drink, that I do now for a happy conclusion of this parliament. I now hope, after tne miscarriage of the last, that this may prove happy; I am neither curious nor captious enough to prevent it. Eschew all occasions of curious questions, which may hinder you in this great cause for which I have called you, and remember that spending of time is spoiling of business. And I hope in God, and that by a faith in God, that by your actions this parliament I shall clearly see your hearts, and that you are the true representative body of my subjects; for you know in your conscience, that of all the kings that ever were, I dare say, never was king better beloved by his subjects than I am: therefore, be you true glasses and mirrors of their faces; and be sure you yield the true reflections and representations as you ought to do. And this doing, I hope you shall not only find the blessing of God, but also by these actions procure the thanks and love of the whole people, for being such true and faithful glasses. Lastly, you shall never find me desire any thing of you but what shall tend to the common good and weal of the kingdom."

Sir Thomas Crew was chosen speaker to this parliament: he was one of the members who distinguished themselves in the last, and one of those, that, on its dissolution, was sent over on a frivolous errand to Ireland. His speech to the throne was decent and popular; he testified a desire that all the good bills brought in last parliament against monopolies, informers, and concealers, might pass in this; that the good laws for religion might be confirmed; and that the jesuits and seminary priests, by the execution of those good laws, might, like a generation of locusts, with an east wind, be blown over the sea. He expatiated on the excellency of the common law of England; on the advantages of the king's wants being supplied in a legal manner by parliament, rather than by other courses; on the good effects of concord; and called the transactions of the last assembly parliament-nullities. The lord-keeper Williams answered this speech in a manner that shewed it had been little relished by the king and ministry: he vindicated the management used to the Roman Catholics, and the late demanded benevolence; took occasion to extol Buckingham on the subject of the navy, but reprimand-

(h) A letter which bears date after the period of this quarrel, either shews that the reconciliation was real, or that James was a consummate master in the low art of dissembling. In this letter James, after having given Buckingham directions concerning his wife, in expressions fulsomely gross and familiar, adds, "If thou be with me by four in the afternoon, it will be good time; and prepare thee to be a guard to me from keeping my heart unbroken from business, before my going to the progress. And thus God send me a happy and a joyful meeting with my sweet Stenny this evening. Sweet-heart, when thou risest keep thee from importunities of people that trouble thy mind, that at meeting I may see thy white teeth shine upon me." MSS. in British Museum, n. 6987.

ed the speaker "for calling to remembrance the abortives of the late parliament."

The subject on which the king had demanded parliamentary advice was entered upon with great eagerness by both houses, and Buckingham was called upon to lay before them a compleat account of the whole of his negociation in Spain: this he did in a very artful manner. The general particulars of his narrative were much the same as have been given before in this history. To these were added many circumstances favourable to his own conduct, and blackening to that of the earl of Bristol; some were exaggerated; others softened, as they tended to these purposes. Though these circumstances were afterwards strongly refuted by the accused minister, they were at this time affirmed by the prince, who was called upon by Buckingham to vouch for their authenticity.

The Spanish ambassadors were so irritated at the reproaches thrown upon his Catholic majesty in the course of Buckingham's narration, that they publicly complained of the insult, with an assertion, that if a subject of their master's had spoken in the like disrespectful terms of the king of England, he would not have escaped with impunity. This appeal was looked upon by both houses as an insolent attack on their privileges, and an address was immediately sent up to the king, declaring the duke free from the aspersions thrown upon him by the said ambassadors; that he had delivered nothing in his narration but what he was led unto by the matter itself, wherein he was so far from transgressing, that he deserved thanks and honour.

The present popular conduct of the favourite, and the colourings he had thrown upon his negociations at the court of Madrid, gained him so much real or seeming good-will of the patriot members, that he was stiled in the house of commons the Saviour of the nation. An address was sent up to the throne from both houses, signifying, "That the treaties could not be longer continued, either with the honour of his majesty, the safety of his people, the welfare of his children, or the security of his ancient allies and confederates." James gave the parliament to understand, "That if they obliged him to enter into a war, the whole burthen of it must fall upon the people, his own estate being not sufficient to defray the ordinary expences of government." This representation was answered by a declaration of the lords and commons, in which the king was assured, "That on the dissolution of the treaties they would be ready to assist him in a parliamentary manner, both with their persons and abilities." James now thought of making his advantage of the present cordiality that subsisted between him and his subjects, and at once demanded the enormous sum of five subsidies and ten fifteenths for the war; and one subsidy and two fifteenths yearly till he had cleared himself of his debts; or if they would make it six subsidies and twelve fifteenths for the war, he would drop the last demand. To this was affixed a condition that the money granted for the war should be put into the hands of commissioners appointed by parliament (i).

But the commons were not so intoxicated with their zeal for a rupture with Spain, or so satisfied with the plausible terms of the supply, as to abate aught of their carefulness in parting with the money of the subject. They entered into a long debate on the demand: sir Edward Coke, in a speech upon the occasion, produced a calculation of the whole which such a grant would amount to; he estimated it at nine hundred thousand pounds, a larger sum, he said, than all England could raise with any conveniency. The resolution of the debate was an offer of three subsidies and three fifteenths, as the first fruits of their good will (k), with a promise of a further assistance, if, in the course of the war, it should become necessary. James's affairs were at present too much embarrassed to make a retreat. He accepted of the three subsidies and the three fifteenths, on the same terms he had offered for six; and a messenger was dispatched to Madrid with his resolution to break off further correspondence with that court (l).

The commons, who had by this time intimations of the new treaty of marriage that was carrying on at the court of France, drew up a severe petition against the Papists, and voted that a return should be made to their house of all the names of popish recusants throughout England, who were in offices of profit, trust, or power (m). Buckingham, who feared that if James was made desperate he might break through his trammels and dissolve the parliament, prevailed on the popular leaders in both houses to moderate it before it was sent up to the throne (n).

These

(i) The insincerity, however, of the king's intention towards the parliament in this business, in which he promised to be guided wholly by their advice, may be seen in a letter Buckingham wrote to him on the occasion of his fluctuating conduct.

"Dear dad and gossip,

"Having more business than it was fit to speak to you within a letter, I was once resolved to have waited on you myself, but presently came to me the news of the Spanish ambassador's going to you, which hath diverted my resolution at this time; because I will not encrease that in you which I have always found too much, and that I will not let the ambassadors think you are distrusted, though this gives enough and too much to your people. I have, to ease your labour, writ some things to Aran, by whom I likewise expect an answer; only I will trouble yourself with this, that I beseech you to send me your plain and resolute answer, whether if your people resolve to give you a royal assistance, to the sum of six subsidies and * * * fifteenths, with a promise in case of necessity to assist you afterwards with their lives and fortunes, whether then you will not accept it, and their counsel to break the match, with the other treaties; and whether or no, to bring them to this, I may not assure some of them underhand (because it is feared when your turns are served you will not call them together again, to reform abuses and grievances, and the making of laws for the good government of the country) that you will be so far from that, that you will rather win them, desiring nothing more than their love and happiness, wherein your own is included. Sir, I beseech you think seriously of this, and resolve once constantly to run one way; for as long as you waver between the Spaniard and your own subjects, to make your advantages of both, you are sure to do it with neither. I should for my own contentment, though I am sure I do you some service here, and would be able, if you would do openly and heartily with me, do you more, and wait on you oftener; but that you go in two ways, and myself in one, it occasions so much disputes, that till you be once resolved, I think it of more comfort and ease to you, and safer for me, that I bide away; for to be of your opinion would be flattery, and not to speak humbly my own would be treachery: therefore I will at this time, with all the industry of my mind, serve you here, and pray for the good success of that, and the lengthening your days, with all the affections of his soul that will live and die in love with you,

Your majesty's most humble slave and dog,

Guthrie, p. 804. Stenny."

(k) Four entire subsidies were granted by the clergy.

(l) When this was publicly known, the city of London testified their approbation by bonfires, ringing of bells, and other demonstrations of joy. Rushworth.

(m) On the report of this petition, James dispatched the following letter to secretary Conway:

"I doubt not but you have heard what a stinging petition against the Papists the lower house hath sent to the higher house this day, that they may jointly present it to me. You know my firm resolution not to make this a war of religion; and seeing I would be loth to be coney-catched by my people, I pray you stay the post that is going into Spain, till I meet with my son, who will be here to-morrow morning. Do it upon pretext of some more letters you are to send by him. And if he should be gone, hasten after him to stay him, upon some such pretext; and let none living know of this as ye love me; and before two in the afternoon to-morrow you shall, without fail, hear from me. Farewell. April 3, 1624." Rushworth, vol. i. p. 140, & seq.

(n) To bring the commons to this moderation, the prince affected an intire similarity of sentiment; and professed, under the bond of an oath, "That whensoever it should please God to bestow upon him any lady that was popish, she should have no farther liberty but for her own family, and no advantage to the recusants at home." The following is the petition which was presented to the king:

"May it please your most excellent majesty,

"It having pleased your majesty, upon our humble suit and advice, to dissolve both the treaties, to our great joy and comfort, we, your majesty's most faithful and loyal subjects the lords and commons assembled in parliament, do in all humbleness offer to your sacred majesty these two petitions following.

"First, that, for the more safety of your realms, and better keeping of your subjects in their due obedience, and other important reasons of state, your majesty will be pleased, by some such course as your majesty shall think fit, to give present order, that all the laws be put in due execution that have been made and do stand in force against Jesuits and seminary priests, and all others that have taken orders by authority derived from the see of Rome, and generally against all popish recusants; and as for disarming them, that it may be according to the laws, and according to former acts and directions of state in the like case; and yet that it may appear to all the world the favour and clemency your majesty useth towards all your subjects, of what condition soever; and to the intent the Jesuits and priests now in the realm may not pretend to be surprized that a speedy and certain day may be prefixed by your majesty's proclamation, before which day they shall depart out of your realm, and all other your highness's dominions; and neither they, nor any other, to return or come hither again, upon the severest penalties of the laws now in force against them; and that all your majesty's subjects may be thereby also admonished not to receive, entertain, comfort, or conceal, any of them, upon the penalties and forfeitures which by the laws may be imposed upon them.

"Secondly, seeing we are thus happily delivered from that danger which these treaties now dissolved, and that use which your ill-affected subjects made thereof, would certainly have drawn upon us, and yet cannot but foresee and fear lest the like may hereafter happen, which will inevitably bring such perils into your majesty's kingdoms, we are most humble suitors to your gracious majesty, to secure the hearts of your good subjects by the engagement of your royal word unto them, that, upon no occasion of marriage or treaty, or other requisite in that behalf, from any foreign prince or state whatsoever, you will take away or slacken the execution of your laws against Jesuits, priests, and popish recusants.

"To which our humble petitions, proceeding from our most loyal and

These are the king's protestations in his answer to this petition: "For my part, I protest before God that my heart hath bled when I have heard of the increase of popery; God is my judge that it hath been such a great grief to me, that it hath been as thorns in my eyes and pricks in my sides; and, my lords and gentlemen, you shall be my confessors, that if I knew one way better than another to hinder the growth of popery, I would take it: for knowing what I do, and being persuaded what I am, I could not be an honest man and do otherwise." To this James added, "That he would not only grant the substance of what was desired in the petition, but add something more of his own; that he would take order for the shameful disorder of the resorting of his subjects to all foreign ambassadors, and consider of a method to reform the education of children born of popish parents."

Every circumstance of the peoples' grievances, either in point of foreign trade or domestic impositions, were at this time, with unrestrained liberty, canvassed in the lower house. A private pique entertained by the prince and the favourite against Lionel Cranfield, earl of Middlesex, the present lord-treasurer, induced them to encourage inquiries, to which he was the destined victim. In a conference between the two houses, sir Edward Coke laid open a charge against him for bribery and various misdemeanors in the execution of his offices. At this conference he claimed for the commons the right of being the inquisitors-general of the grievances of the kingdom, and shewed that they were so appointed by the wisdom of the state for three several causes: "I. Because they have best notice from all parts thereof: II. Because it is not the nobility, but the weakest commons, that go to the wall: III. As in a natural body not the disease, but the neglect of cure, killeth, so the long delay of grievances; and this would happen if they were not found out by the commons."

After a tedious trial the accused was found guilty of malversation in the several offices of, master of the wardrobe, master of the court of wards, and treasurer. The following sentence was passed against him by the lords: "That he should be deprived of all the offices which he held in the kingdom: that he should be fined fifty thousand pounds for the king's use (o): that he should be incapacitated from holding any office, place, or employment, in the state or commonwealth: that he should be imprisoned in the Tower of London during the king's pleasure: that he should never sit more in parliament; and, that he should never come within the verge of the court (p).

The earl of Middlesex had been brought up to trade; he had received most of his education in the custom-house, and was from thence introduced to Somerset as a man of a projecting head, and who, from an acquired knowledge in the customs, might be serviceable towards the forming and executing of plans to encrease the king's revenue. He made himself so useful to Buckingham, that he was by that favourite promoted to the highest offices, at length married to one of his kinswomen, and obtained the titles of baron Cranfield and earl of Middlesex; he had rendered himself very agreeable to James by a seeming assiduity in his service; and this circumstance, with the affluence of his fortune, made him throw off that humble carriage to his patron which was exacted from all his creatures. He incurred likewise the displeasure of Buckingham by refusing some demands of money, during the prince's residence in Spain; the favourite therefore vowed revenge, and employed all his credit among the commons to procure an impeachment of the treasurer. The king was extremely dissatisfied with this measure, and prophesied to the prince and duke, that they would live to have their fill of parliamentary prosecutions. Hence arose the animosity which produced his disgrace. The prosecution was an invidious one, and the charge brought against him not very material: but the commons were actuated with a laudable zeal of rendering exemplary, and sacrificing to justice, those harpies in office who prey upon the vitals of the commonwealth.

It was not without grounds that Cranfield flattered himself with a powerful protection from his master: James had the inclination, but not the ability, to serve him; he not only lamented his fate, but endeavoured to form a party in his favour, and gave directions to Williams to make interest among the members to this purpose. These efforts were fruitless (q); as fruitless were his expostulations to his son and to his insolent minion on the madness of their present conduct.

A charge was now sent up by the commons against Samuel Harsnet, bishop of Norwich; it contained sundry articles of divers extortions and superstitious ceremonies practised by himself, and exacted from others, in the government of his diocese. The lords excused themselves from entering on this affair, and referred the examination of it to the high-commission court, with a promise to give judgement after they had heard their report. Harsnet had preached a sermon at Whitehall that gave great offence to the commons, from the scripture-text, "Give unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." He insisted that goods and money were Cæsar's (the king's), and therefore could not righteously be denied him. James appeased the anger of the commons by telling both houses, "That the bishop failed in not adding, that goods were Cæsar's according to the laws and customs of the land" (r).

The commons, on hearing that the king intended to put an end to the sessions in three or four days, sent a message to the lords to the following effect: "That the difficulties attending the subsidy-bill had prevented their finishing many matters of weight then depending, for which reason they entreated their lordships to join in a petition to his majesty for a longer term." The prince of Wales, who was present when the message was delivered, undertook to move the king to grant the request. By means of this intercession, James was prevailed on to prolong the session from Saturday the 22nd of May, to Saturday the 29th, on condition that neither of the houses would entertain any new matter. A list of all the popish recusants in offices of profit, trust, or power, with a petition affixed to it, was sent up from the commons to the lords, with an invitation to join with them in a representation on that subject to the king (s). The lords excused themselves from the ungracious task by alledging it as a kind of judgement and condemnation of the party before the hearing the defence; which, they added, would affect their reputation as a court of judicature. Before the end of the session the lords came to these laudable resolutions concerning the extent of their privileges in the freedom of their servants and followers from arrest; viz. "That this freedom should continue but twenty days before and after every session; that all the lords for the future be very careful in this point, and remember the ground of this privilege, which was only in regard that they should not be distracted by the trouble of their servants from attending the serious affairs of the nation; that therefore they will not pervert that privilege to the public injustice of the kingdom, which was given them chiefly that the whole realm might, in this high court, draw the clear light of justice from them, in which case every one ought rather to keep far within than any way exceed their due limits; that hereafter before any person be sent for in this kind the lord whom he serves shall, either by himself or by message, certify the house, upon his honour, that the perdutiful affections towards your majesty, our care of our country's good, and our own confident persuasion that these will much advance the glory of Almighty God, the everlasting honour of your majesty, the safety of your kingdoms, and the encouragement of all your good subjects, we do most humbly beseech your majesty to vouchsafe a gracious answer." Parliam. Hist. vol. vi. p. 128, & seq.

(o) This fine was afterwards remitted by the prince, when he mounted the throne.

(p) On the first complaint that was made against the earl of Middlesex in the lower house, he offered to justify himself by his counsel: this created a jealousy in the lords, that it might trench deep into their privileges, for a member of their house to answer an accusation in the house of commons. On the lord-treasurer's request they waved this formality? but an order was made, "That hereafter no member of the lords'-house should, without licence, answer any complaint in the house of commons, either in person or by his counsel." Parliam. Hist. vol. vi. p. 133.

(q) The regard to justice influenced some against him, and the awe of the prince and duke, others; so that Williams could obtain but one vote in his favour.

(r) This certain path to preferment, the bishop's flattering doctrine, conducted him at length to the possession of the see of York.

(s) In this list were sixty known or suspected Papists, and twenty-nine whose wives, children, and servants, were Papists. The petition affixed to it ends thus: "Now, in consideration of the great countenance hereby given to popery, the great grief and offence to all your best-affected, true, and loving subjects, the apparent danger of the whole kingdom, by putting the power of arms into such hands as, by former acts of your majesty's council, are adjudged persons justly to be suspected, and themselves fit to be disarmed: your said loyal and faithful subjects do most humbly beseech your majesty graciously to vouchsafe that the said lords and gentlemen above-named, for these important reasons, and for the greater safety of your majesty, and of your realm and dominion, may be removed from all your majesty's commissions of great charge and trust, commissions of lieutenancy, oyer and terminer, and of the peace, and from all offices and other places of trust." Parliam. Hist. vol. vi. p. 322, & seq.

son arrested is within the limits of the privileges before expressed: and for the particulars, they must be left to the judgement of the house, as the case shall come in question; wherein the house wants no means, as well by oath as without, to find out the true nature of the servant's quality in his lord's service; thereupon if it be adjudged by the house contrary to the true intent, any member whatsoever must not think it strange if, in such a case, both himself suffer reproof, as the house shall think fit, and his servant receive no benefit from the privilege, but pay the fees; because the justice of the kingdom must be preferred before any personal respect, and none to be spared that shall offend after so fair a warning." The lords seemed now to resent the severe precedent against the members of their house, in the case of the late treasurer. After having heard the report of their committee concerning judicature, they ordained, "That in all cases of moment the defendant should have copies of all depositions, both pro and contra, after the publication, a convenient time before hearing, to prepare themselves; and that on demand they should have learned counsel to assist them in their defence (t). Likewise that it should be considered on the next meeting at what time and for what causes a member of that house should be brought to the bar." On the 29th of May, 1624, the parliament was prorogued to the 2nd of November following. The commons had made ready to pass the royal assent all the depending bills, and for this one time they parted with the king in seeming good humour.

James's condescension in permitting the parliament to be their own treasurers turned out to be a piece of gross king-craft: on accepting the subsidies he made the following declaration: "I desire you to understand, said he, that I must have a faithful secret council of war, that must not be ordered by a multitude, for so my designs may be discovered before-hand. One penny of this money shall not be bestowed but in sight of your committees: but whether I shall send two thousand or ten thousand, whether by sea or by land, East or West, by diversion or otherwise, by invasion upon the Bavarian or the emperor, you must leave that to your king." Thus, though the parliament had appointed their receivers, and their council of war, yet, as these commissioners were to answer all money-draughts made upon them by the crown, the power was nothing more than nominal, and a device of Buckingham's to cajole the commons into a liberal grant.

The jealousy which the lords conceived lest the lower house should get an increase of privileges by this joint power, and the want of precedent for the drawing up such a bill, made it a work of time and difficulty, notwithstanding the judges had given it as their opinion, "that there was nothing in this act which could impeach or blemish the privileges of the higher house, or add to those of the lower, save in the case in question." The lords entered a protestation, "that no word, matter, or thing, in this act, should be construed hereafter to make any alteration in the jurisdiction, power, privilege, or authority, of either house." So active was this aristocratical assembly, in all these points of partial privilege.

The states of the United Provinces were, at this time, governed by Maurice; and that aspiring prince, sensible that his credit would languish during peace, had, on the expiration of the twelve years' truce, renewed the war with the Spanish monarchy. His great capacity in the military art would have compensated the inferiority of his forces, had not the Spanish armies been commanded by Spinola, a general equally renowned for conduct, and more celebrated for enterprize and activity. In such a situation, nothing could be more welcome to the republic than the prospect of a rupture between James and the Catholic king; and they flattered themselves, as well from the natural union of interests between them and England, as from the influence of the present conjuncture, that powerful succours would soon march to their relief. It might reasonably have been expected, that, as religious zeal had made the recovery of the Palatinate appear a point of such vast importance in England; the same effect must have been produced in France, by the force merely of political views and considerations. While that principality remained in the hands of the house of Austria, the French dominions were surrounded on all sides by the possessions of that ambitious family, and might be invaded by superior forces from every quarter. It concerned the king of France, therefore, to prevent the peaceable establishment of the emperor in his new conquests; and both by the situation and greater power of his state, he was much better enabled than James to give succour to the distressed palatine. But though these views escaped not Louis, nor cardinal Richlieu, who now began to acquire an ascendant in the French court; that minister was determined to pave the way for his enterprizes by first subduing the Hugonots, and thence to proceed, by mature counsels, to humble the house of Austria.

The proposal of a marriage between the prince of Wales and the princess Henrietta, had been received by the French court with evident marks of extreme satisfaction. Their natural jealousy of the house of Austria was at this time much augmented by some late attempts of Philip upon the boundaries of France (u), and the additional strength which this formidable neighbour was on the point of attaining, by an union with a naval power, gave them the most alarming apprehensions. Besides these considerations, which engaged the French monarch to wish the dissolution of the late treaty between the crowns of Spain and England, an alliance with the latter was much to be coveted by himself: his Protestant subjects could never be totally extirpated, if properly supported by their brethren in England, and the offered union with the Stuart family would probably deprive them of such an assistance. This being the opinion and disposition of the French ministry, it is no wonder that James's ambassador met with the most cordial reception: amongst many high compliments, Louis told him, "That he had rather have the prince of England for his brother-in-law than any man in the world; that in the terms of this desired union he should not be directed by the pope, but agree to such as did consist with reason."

Spain at this time had not given up all thoughts of renewing the interrupted treaty. A juncture thus favourable might have enabled James, with any degree of penetration, to have concluded the alliance on safe and honourable terms; but his vehemence was so apparent that the French court altered their tone, and told his ambassador, the earl of Holland, to whom the earl of Carlisle was at this time joined in commission, "That the same favourable articles for the Roman Catholics were expected as had been before yielded to Spain." No interruption of the negociation followed these new and high demands. They were immediately complied with by the ambassadors, with these only exceptions: That a toleration should not be granted in the public articles, nor a church in London allowed to the Roman Catholics. To balance this, the children were to be brought up under the care and inspection of the princess Henrietta till the age of thirteen; and three private articles were agreed to: that the Catholics, both ecclesiastic and temporal, imprisoned since the last proclamation which followed the breach with Spain, should be all set at liberty: that the English Catholics should be no more searched after, nor molested for their religion: that the goods of the Catholics, as well ecclesiastic as temporal, that were seized on since the afore-mentioned proclamation, should be restored to them.

Equally high were the demands of France in regard to the temporal articles of jointure and fortune (v), and equally abject were the concessions of James.

The whole negociation on the side of Louis was conducted by the artful minister cardinal Richlieu, who about this time was introduced into the French councils through the (t) These indulgencies had been denied in the case of the earl of Middlesex.

(u) This was the Valteline, which country had been seized upon by Spain.

(v) Henrietta's jointure was to be sixty thousand crowns a-year. If she was left a widow without children, her whole portion, which was eight hundred thousand crowns, was to be returned to her, to be disposed of as she pleased, she still enjoying her dower; in case of children, two-thirds were to be restored, the other third to remain to the children; the two-thirds restored to the mother to revert to them in case she died unmarried, or without children by a second marriage; in the case of children by a second marriage, these children of the second bed to divide the two-thirds with those of the first; in the case of her dying before the prince, without issue, half of the portion was to be paid back to the king of France; that the king of Great Britain should present her on her marriage fifty thousand crowns' worth of jewels, which jewels were to be her own property; her jointure to be assigned her in lands, castles, and houses, one whereof to be made fit for her to reside in, and furnished suitably to a princess of her quality; that she should have the free disposal of the offices and benefices of the said lands, part of which lands were to have the title of duchy or earldom; that she should have liberty, whether she had children or not, to return to France with her household goods, jewels, diamonds, and portion, as specified in the articles above; and in this case the king of England to conduct her to Calais at his charge. Somers's Third Collection of Tracts, 1751, vol. i. p. 262, & seq.

interest

interest of the queen-mother. By his advice the archbishop of Ambrun was sent as a secret agent to intercede for the Catholics, but in effect to sound James's inclination towards the popish faith. This prelate gained from certain partizans of the church of Rome, who were upon a footing of familiarity with James, such useful intelligence that he soon found means to attain the highest degree of favour and confidence: conferences grew frequent between them. One of these having turned upon a full toleration to the Catholics in England, and on the desire which James had of living in a strict union with the king of France, the archbishop acquitted himself so well, that the king, giving him a squeeze by the hand, told him, "That he perceived he was the man sent to him from God, to whom he might open freely his mind." After this, he went upon the chimerical project with which he had long been infected, for the uniting all Christians to one form of worship (w); and on an intention he had of calling an assembly of divines, both foreign and English, to be held at Boulogne or Dover, to the end of settling proper means to carry his project into execution. With this he put into the archbishop's hands a memorial on the subject, that being thus provided, he might begin the negociation with the pope and the king of France, whilst himself undertook to deal with the king of Denmark and the Protestant princes of Germany.

Ambrun's narrative appears to be of the same nature as the impertinent schemes and conceited opinions of James. He seems to have regarded religion in no other light than as a proper instrument to effect passive obedience in subjects: for this reason he treated the material points of faith that distinguish the Roman Catholic and reformed religions as mere school-questions, too insignificant to make a schism in the church, the best suited for the arbitrary purposes of princes, except in the one tenet of superior allegiance to the pope. This doctrine he ardently wished to instil into the minds of all sovereigns, and to form a kind of fraternal league, in which they should oblige the pope to give up this claim, and yield each other mutual assistance in quelling the rebellious opinions of their subjects (x). It was with a view of such support from the Austrian family that he had pushed on that alliance with all its disgraceful dangerous conditions. James was at this time actuated by the same expectations in the present treaty with France, and assumed so much upon them as to permit the archbishop of Ambrun to administer public confirmation in the French ambassador's house to all that should apply: the number was so great that the magistrates of London complained of it; the king owned that it was done by his permission. This was immediately after the strong declaration he had made to the parliament against such a practice! He was indeed at this time so exalted with an expectation of brotherly friendship from the king of France, that he told the lords of the council, with a kind of transport, that Louis was so much his friend as to offer to assist him in person if ever he should desire him: "Truly, adds he, he has gained so much upon me by this kindness, that in any thing that shall concern him I will employ not only my peoples' lives, but my own; and whatsoever of his subjects shall rise against him, either Catholics or others, shall find me a party for him."

The English ambassadors who were now negociating the treaty of marriage in France, had orders to propose to that court a league against the house of Austria: Louis's ministers listened to this proposal; but at the same time, like wise politicians, told the ambassadors, "That the league and marriage were two distinct things, that could not be negociated together; but that after the conclusion of the marriage they would treat of the league."

The aid granted to the king the last parliament was computed to be considerable enough to send five-and-twenty thousand men into the Palatinate: six thousand, under the command of the earls of Oxford, Southampton, Essex, and the lord Willoughby, were immediately embarked for Holland to join the army of the states. Though the united corps of Dutch and English made a considerable army, yet the prince of Orange could not prevent the town of Breda from falling into the hands of Spinola. During the siege of Breda, many of the English died by sickness: this was the fate of the gallant earl of Oxford, who was one of the volunteers that opposed the Spanish forces in the Palatinate. Other troops were levied to be under the command of Mansfeldt, who with these was to open a passage into the Palatinate: according to this resolution Mansfeldt came into England, and Louis was pressed farther on the subject of the league, or at the least to grant a free passage to the English troops through his dominions. Evasive answers were taken as certain promises, and Mansfeldt set out at the head of twelve thousand men, to make his passage through France into Germany. Preparatory to this march a demand was made of the city of Frankendale to the infanta Isabella, who, according to the treaty at London, was to deliver it up on the 26th of October. At the same time was demanded a free passage through the German territory for the troops that were to be sent to garrison it. The infanta answered, "That she would freely surrender the town on the day appointed to such as should produce a power from the king of England; that she would grant a passage through her own and the king of Spain's dominions, according to the words of the treaty; but to procure a passage for the British troops through the empire, she declared was not in her power, nor was she obliged to do it." To compleat this farce, on the 26th of October, the day on which Frankendale was to be re-delivered, Spinola with his troops marched out of the town, and finding none of James's forces ready to take possession, he instantly re-entered, pulled down the arms of the king of England, and set up those of the king of Spain. The twelve thousand men under the command of Mansfeldt were embarked for the French coast in the month of December, the very depth of winter. When they arrived at Calais, no orders had yet arrived for their admission, therefore they were not suffered to land; after much time was spent in messages backward and forward between them and the court, the king of France positively asserting he had never promised to grant them a passage, they were forced to sail to Zealand (y), where they met with the same difficulty as they had just experienced at Calais; for here also it had been neglected to concert proper measures for their disembarkation. The Zealanders likewise excused themselves from receiving such a number of unexpected guests, on the pretence of a deficiency of provisions. During a tedious negociation, in which messengers were sent to the Hague and afterwards to London, a pestilential distemper crept in among the English forces, who had been so long cooped up in narrow vessels. Above two-thirds of the army died while on board; and of the few that escaped the sickness some deserted and some enlisted themselves among their countrymen in the service of the States.

Thus, in the beginning of 1625, ended this ill-concerted and fruitless expedition; and thus was exemplified the utility of James's proviso, that the conduct and direction of the war must be left to the king. This refusal of receiving his troops was the second barbarous insult which he had received from the Dutch republic. In the islands of Molucca, Banda, and Amboyna, from whence the Portuguese and Spaniards had been driven by the States, the English, according to treaty, concluded in 1619, between England and the United Provinces, were to enjoy one-third part of the trade, and the Dutch the other two-thirds; of the English factories settled in those parts, a few families lived at Amboyna under the protection of a Dutch establishment; according to the nature of rivalship, an ill correspondence soon subsisted between the two people: a plot was trumped up against the English, in February, 1623, as if they had formed a design to destroy the Dutch settlement, and to seize their fort of Amboyna; all of them were seized, examined, and put to a variety of tortures that exceeded every diabolical invention of the kind that had been before known: those that purchased relief by confession retracted it with their dying breath; the greater part retained their fortitude, and expired under their tortures; a few that survived these cruelties were (w) Cornwallis gives us the account of a long conversation he had with the duke of Lerma on this subject of a general uniformity in the mode of Christian worship. Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 461, & seq.

(x) He openly professed the following reason for abandoning the Palsgrave's cause: that there is an implicit tie among kings which obligeth them, though there be no other interest or particular engagement, to stick to and right one another upon an insurrection of subjects; therefore he had more reason to be against the Bohemians than to adhere to them, in the deposition of their sovereign prince. Howel's Familiar Letters.

(y) The prince of Wales and the duke of Buckingham, who were at present the sole managers of the affairs of state, looked upon the assistance of France as a thing to be depended upon, Louis being in a manner bound by the ties of friendship and interest. A dispute then subsisting between him and the king of Spain concerning the Valteline, the view of these shallow politicians was not comprehensive enough to take in the bigoted prepossessions that actuated this monarch, the arbitrary designs of his minister, or the variety of capricious principles which influence the measures of a court.

sent out of the island to other English plantations. Thus the whole factory was destroyed, and the Dutch remained sole masters of the spice trade (z).

This dreadful catastrophe happened at the time when James had given up all hopes of the Spanish alliance, and when he was pushed on by the violent measures of his favourite to a rupture with that state. This being his situation, the friendship of the Dutch was too valuable to be hazarded by an ill-timed resentment; he was obliged to accept of their excuses, and to put up with this flagrant breach of faith, without exacting any kind of atonement. However, about thirty years afterwards, in 1654, Oliver Cromwell made the Dutch pay three hundred thousand pounds upon account of that massacre. Humiliating as were these accumulated disgraces, the domestic ones sustained by James at this time he much more impatiently resented: such was the tyranny exercised over him by Buckingham, that, on the earl of Bristol's arrival, he was constrained to send a command to him, to confine himself to his own house. According to repeated solicitations of the accused, commissioners were appointed to examine into the nature of his offence: after a minute interrogation they declared, that they could find nothing blameable in his conduct. Notwithstanding this, his confinement was continued, and himself given to understand by Buckingham, "That he was much mistaken if he imagined that his answers were satisfactory to the king, the prince, or to him (the duke); that his only way of regaining favour was to make the confession he had sent him." James exclaimed against such a treatment, and told Buckingham, "It was an horrible tyranny to make an innocent man declare himself guilty." Notwithstanding this, he could not obtain leave to admit him to his presence, as the offered terms had been refused, though he had solemnly promised such a permission.

The king seems to have resigned himself to the present necessity with an intention of breaking from his thraldom on the first favourable opportunity. He was sensible that the authority which his insolent minion maintained over him was entirely owing to circumstances arising from the familiarity that had subsisted between them, and from a temporary popularity, unsupported by character, by principle, or by capacity; an occasion would undoubtedly offer to throw him off, when he was again become the object of public odium; in this attempt he was certain of having assistance from men whose abilities were infinitely superior to those of his ungrateful servant, men by whom Buckingham was detested, partly from motives of envy, but mostly from the insolence of his carriage: of these none were more inveterate than the lord-keeper Williams, who had been long upon ill terms with his patron, on his attempt to undermine him in James's favour, and his opposition to him in council on the rupture with Spain. He had lately endeavoured to eradicate from his mind unfavourable impressions, by the most abject submission and affected zeal for his service; these endeavours had been fruitless, and Buckingham had shewn him such a strong testimony of his ill will, as to have preferred accusations against him in the house of commons the last session; but the complaints were thought too frivolous and too ill-grounded to bear an impeachment. In this situation Williams's safety was incompatible with Buckingham's power, who had likewise a dangerous enemy in the earl of Bristol, on account of the strong evidence he could produce of his absurd conduct at Madrid, and his gross impositions on the nation by a false detail to the parliament of the transactions at the court of Spain (a). Such a concurrence of circumstances could not fail to crush him at some period; of this he was very sensible, when the unexpected death of the king at once dispelled his fears, and fixed his tottering situation.

About the middle of March, 1625, James was seized with a tertian ague, which terminating in a fever, put an end to his life at Theobald's, on the 27th of the same month, after a reign over England of twenty-two years and a few days, and in the fifty-ninth year of his age. During the course of his illness he was so closely beset by Buckingham and his family, that the rest of the courtiers were not permitted to see him till he was in the last agonies. Without the knowledge of his physicians they applied a plaister to his side, and gave him a potion whose operation was followed by the fever, which terminated his days. These circumstances, added to the criticalness of his decease, gave rise to suspicions of the darkest nature. The duke was afterwards impeached by the commons, not for poisoning the king, but for daring to apply remedies without the advice of his physicians; but the prosecution was timely put an end to by the authority of Charles, and the affair consigned to an eternal uncertainty.

James was of a middle stature, of a fair complexion, and a soft skin; his person plump but not corpulent, his eyes large and rolling, his beard thin, his tongue too big for his mouth, his countenance disagreeable, his air awkward, and his gait remarkably ungraceful, from a weakness in his knees that hindered him from walking without assistance; he was tolerably temperate in his diet, but drank of little else than rich and strong wines.

The character of James, from the variety of grotesque qualities which compose it, is not easily to be delineated: the virtues he possessed were so loaded with a greater proportion of their neighbouring vices, that they exhibit no lights to set off the dark shades; his principles of generosity were tainted by such a childish profusion that they left him without means of paying his just obligations, and subjected him to the necessity of attempting irregular, illegal, and unjust methods of acquiring money. His friendship (b), not to give it the name of vice, was directed by so puerile a fancy, and so absurd a caprice, that the objects of it were ever contemptible, and its consequence attended with such an unmerited profusion of favours, that it was perhaps the most exceptionable quality of any he possessed. His distinctions were formed on principles of selfishness; he valued no person for any endowments that could not be made subservient to his pleasures or his interest, and thus he rarely advanced a man of real worth to preferment (c). His familar conversation, both in writing and in speaking, was stuffed with vulgar and indecent phrases. Though proud and arrogant in his temper, and full of the importance of his station, he descended to buffoonery, and suffered his favourites to address him in the most disrespectful terms of gross familiarity (d). Himself affected a sententious wit, but rose no higher in these attempts than to quaint, and often hackneyed conceits. His education had been a more learned one than is commonly bestowed on princes; this, from the conceit it gave him, turned out a very disadvantageous circumstance, by contracting his opinions to his own narrow views. His pretences to a consummate knowledge in divinity, politics, and the art of governing, exposed him to a high degree of ridicule, not only in this country, but on the continent; his conduct shewing him more than commonly deficient in all these points. His romantic notions of the natural rights of princes caused him publicly to avow pretensions that impressed on the minds of the people an incurable jea-

(z) It is very probable that the late behaviour of the Zealanders arose from the fear of admitting so large a body of English troops, lest they might have fallen upon some method of revenging the massacre at Amboyna. James had been upon ill terms with the Dutch for some time; in the year 1609 he issued a proclamation for preventing the promiscuous fishing of strangers on the British coast: the Dutch refused to comply with this proclamation, and defended their fishing vessels with a naval force. These spirited republicans had entertained a strong jealousy on the intended connection between the English and the Spanish courts: they resented the neglect James had shewn to the Protestant cause, in the base desertion of his son-in-law, the elected king of Bohemia. This, with the contempt they had for his person and government, occasioned them to commit continual infringements in the treaty that subsisted between them and the state of England: they molested the English in their East-India trade, and in Greenland, where the citizens of London had eighteen ships employed in the whale-fishery; these crews were surprized and murdered by the Dutch, on pretence that they had an exclusive privilege of fishing on that coast. Guthrie. Carleton's Letters.

(a) While Buckingham was giving to the house an account of the transactions in Spain, he frequently turned round to the prince, who was present, and asked him whether what he was relating was not true; to which the prince did not fail to answer, "Yes, it is true," or to that effect.

(b) All his letters to his favourite Villiers are written in a style fulsomely familiar, many of them indecent, with very unusual expressions of love and fondness.

(c) His want of gratitude to the memory of his preceptor Buchanan, who had taken great pains to form his tender mind to virtue, and to teach him true policy and magnanimity, is one instance of his disregard to worth.

(d) The following familiar epistle is from Buckingham to king James: "Were it not that you might think me an incroacher upon your goodness, I should make a proposition for you to stay ten days at Theobalds, by which doing you might have the company of your sweet son, without whom we should neither play at cards, goffe, nor sit up for does at Huntingdon; whereas, if you stay at Theobalds but these ten days, you might have to wait on you not only a sound son, but a servant within and without as clean as a shilling. But if these reasons were not, I pray your sowship how can you spend these ten days better in any other place." MSS. in British Museum, fol. 6987, n. 106.

lousy; this, with an affectation of a profound skill in the art of dissimulation, or of king-craft, as he termed it, rendered him the object of fear and distrust; when at the same time he was himself the only dupe to an impertinent and useless hypocrisy. If the laws and constitution of England received no prejudice from his government, it was owing to his want of ability to effect a change suitable to the purpose of an arbitrary sway. Stained with these vices, and sullied with these weaknesses, if he is ever exempt from the hatred of mankind, the exemption must probably arise from motives which border on contempt!

Despicable as he appears through the whole period of his Britannic government, his behaviour when king of Scotland was in many points unexceptionable; but, intoxicated with the power he received over a people whose privileges were but feebly established, and who had been long subjected to civil and ecclesiastical tyranny, he at once flung off that moderation which had hid his deformities from the common eye.

It is alledged that the corruption he met with in the court of England, and the time-serving genius of the English noblemen, were the great means that drew him aside from his circumspect conduct. Among the most forward of this worthless tribe was Cecil, afterwards earl of Salisbury (e), who told him on his coming to the crown, "That he should find his English subjects like asses, on whom he might lay any burden, and should need neither bit nor bridle but their asses' ears."

CHAP. II.

Observations on the Civil Government of England during this Period—Ecclesiastical Government—Manners—Finances—Navy—Commerce—Manufactures—Colonies—Agriculture---Learning and Arts.

IT may not be improper, at this period, to make a pause; and to take a survey of the state of the kingdom, with regard to its government, manners, finances, arms, trade, learning. Where a just notion is not formed of these particulars, history can be but little instructive, and will often be totally unintelligible.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT OF ENGLAND.

To enable the reader to form just and proper notions concerning the interesting transactions which brighten the following period of English history, it may not be out of place to enter into a detail of the state of the kingdom in regard to government at the accession of the Scottish line. It must be owned that in many respects it was extremely arbitrary, and that the liberties of the subject were neither accurately defined, nor apparently defended. The ecclesiastical faction that broke out in this kingdom during the administration of the Tudors had enabled that family to make pernicious encroachments on the legal rights of the subjects, stipulated by Magna Charta; time had given strength to these usurpations, and opposition in the people to the will of the sovereign was unauthorized by examples of modern date. The universal simplicity of manners that subsisted during the early periods of the English history, and continued till the latter end of the sixteenth century, rendered the wiles of power less intricate; but at the same time it occasioned in the people an aptness to put a dangerous confidence in their princes. Thus, when the violence of Henry VIII. had wrested the ecclesiastical jurisdiction over this country from the Roman pontiff, the people readily submitted to the king's being vested with that large addition of prerogative; and regal authority attained without difficulty the supreme power in all affairs relative to the government of the church, and the conscience of the subject.

We may therefore safely pronounce, that the English government, at the accession of the Scottish line, was much more arbitrary than it is at present. Without mentioning other particulars, the courts alone of high commission and star-chamber were sufficient to lay the whole kingdom at the mercy of the prince.

The court of high commission had been erected by Elizabeth, in consequence of an act of parliament, passed in the beginning of her reign: by this act, it was thought proper, during the great revolution of religion, to arm the sovereign with full powers, in order to discourage and suppress opposition. All appeals from the inferior ecclesiastical courts were carried before the high commission; and, of consequence, the whole life and doctrine of the clergy lay directly under its inspection. Every breach of the act of uniformity, every refusal of the ceremonies, was cognizable in this court; and during the reign of Elizabeth, had been punished by deprivation, by fine, confiscation, and imprisonment. James contented himself with the gentler penalty of deprivation; nor was that punishment inflicted with rigour on every offender. Archbishop Spotswood tells us, that he was informed by Bancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, several years after the king's accession, that not above forty-five clergymen had then been deprived. All the Catholics too were liable to be punished by this court, if they exercised any act of their religion, or sent abroad their children or other relations, to receive that education which they could not procure for them in their own country. Popish priests were thrown into prison, and might be delivered over to the law, which punished them with death; though that severity had been sparingly exercised even by Elizabeth herself, and never almost by James. In a word, that liberty of conscience, which we so highly and so justly value at present, was totally suppressed; and no exercise of any religion, but the established, was permitted throughout the kingdom. Any word or writing, which tended towards heresy or schism, was punishable by the high commissioners or any three of them: they alone were judges what expressions had that tendency: these inquisitions were not limited to proceed by legal information, but upon rumour, suspicion, or according to their discretion: they administered an oath, by which the party cited before them, was bound to answer any question which should be propounded to him, even though it might tend to his own crimination: whoever refused

(e) In a speech which James made to the parliament in 1620, he excuses himself for his former conduct in that assembly, and says, that he was led by the counsellors of the late queen.

The servile tools that James had raised to the highest preferments in the state bestowed the same tribute of absurd flattery to his memory that they had fed him with during his life. The following is the fulsome character drawn of him by Williams, in a sermon that he preached at his funeral:

"I dare presume to say, you never read in your lives of two kings more fully paralleled amongst themselves, and better distinguished from all other kings than king James and king Solomon. King Solomon is said to be unigenitus coram matre sua, the only son of his mother, so was king James; Solomon was of a complection white and ruddy, so was king James; Solomon was an infant king, puer parvulus, a little child, so was king James a king at the age of thirteen months; Solomon began his reign in the life of his predecessor, so, by the force and compulsion of that state, did our late sovereign king James; Solomon was twice crowned and anointed a king, so was king James; Solomon's minority was rough, through the quarrels of the former sovereign, so was that of king James; Solomon was learned above all the princes of the East, so was king James above all the princes in the universal world; Solomon was a writer in prose and verse, so, in a very pure and exquisite manner, was our sweet sovereign king James; Solomon was the greatest patron we ever read of to church and church-men, and yet no greater (let the house of Aaron now confess) than king James; Solomon was honoured with ambassadors from all the kings of the earth, and so you know was king James; Solomon was a main improver of his home-commodities, as you may see in his trading with Hiram, and God knows it was the daily study of king James; Solomon was a great maintainer of shipping and navigation, a most proper attribute to king James; Solomon beautified very much his capital city with buildings and waterworks, so did king James; lastly, before any hostile act we read of in history, king Solomon died in peace, when he had lived about sixty years, and so you know did king James; and as for his words and eloquence you know it well enough,—it was rare and excellent in the highest degree—Solomon, speaking of his own faculty in this kind, divides it into two several heads, a ready invention, and an easy discharge and expression of the same,—God hath granted me to speak as I would, and to conceive as it is meet for the things spoken of,—and this was eminent in our late sovereign: his invention was as quick as his first thoughts, and his words as ready as his invention; he would first wind up the whole substance of his discourse into one solid and massy conception, and then spread it and dilate it to what compass he pleased, "Profluenti & quæ principem deceret eloquentia," (as Tacitus said of Augustus) in a flowing and a princely kind of elocution; those speeches of his in the parliament, star-chamber, council-table, and other public audiences of the state (of which, as of Tully's orations, "Ea semper optima quæ maxima," the longest still was held the best) do prove him to be the most powerful speaker that ever swayed the sceptre of this kingdom; in his style you may observe the Ecclesiastes, in his figures the Cantieles, in his sentences the Proverbs, and in his whole discourse reliquum verborum Solomonis, all the rest that was admirable in the eloquence of Solomon; how powerfully did he charge the prince with the care of religion and justice, the two pillars (as he termed them) of his future throne? how did he recommend unto his love the nobility, the clergy, and the commonalty in general? how did he thrust, as it were, into his inward bosom, his bishops, his judges, his near servants, and (f) disciple of his whom he so loved in particular? and concluded with that heavenly advice to his son concerning that great act of his future marriage, to marry like himself, and marry where he would; but if he did marry the daughter of that king, he should marry her person, but not her religion."

fused this oath, though he pleaded ever so justly, that he might thereby be brought to accuse himself or his dearest friend, was punishable by imprisonment; and, in short, an inquisitorial tribunal, with all its terrors and iniquities, was erected in the kingdom. Full discretionary powers were bestowed with regard to the inquiry, trial, sentence, and penalty inflicted; excepting only that corporal punishments were restrained by that patent of the prince, which erected the court, not by the act of parliament, which empowered him. By reason of the uncertain limits which separate ecclesiastical from civil causes, all accusations of adultery and incest were tried by the court of high commission; and every complaint of wives against their husbands was there examined and discussed (g). On like pretences, every cause which regarded conscience, that is, every cause, could have been brought under their jurisdiction.

But there was a sufficient reason, why the king would not be solicitous to stretch the jurisdiction of this court: the star-chamber possessed the same authority in civil matters; and its methods of proceeding were equally arbitrary and unlimited. The origin of this court was derived from remote antiquity (h); though it is pretended, that its power had first been carried to the greatest height by Henry VII. In all times, however, it is confessed, it enjoyed authority; and at no time was its authority circumscribed, or method of proceeding directed, by any law or statute.

We have had already, or shall have sufficient occasion, during the course of this history, to mention the dispensing power, the power of imprisonment, of exacting loans (i) and benevolence, of pressing (k) and quartering soldiers, of altering the customs, of erecting monopolies. These branches of power, if not directly opposite to the principles of all free government, must, at least, be acknowledged dangerous to freedom in a monarchical constitution, where an eternal jealousy must be preserved against the sovereign, and no discretionary powers must ever be entrusted to him, by which the property or personal liberty of any subject can be affected. The kings of England, however, had almost constantly exercised these powers; and if, on any occasion, the prince had been obliged to submit to laws enacted against them, he had ever, in practice, eluded these laws, and returned to the same arbitrary administration. During almost three centuries before the accession of James, the regal authority, in all these particulars, had never once been called in question.

We may also observe, that the principles in general which prevailed during that age, were so favourable to monarchy, that they bestowed on it an authority almost absolute and unlimited, sacred and indefeasible.

The meetings of parliament were so precarious; their sessions so short, compared to the vacations; that, when men's eyes were turned upwards in search of sovereign power, the prince alone was apt to strike them as the only permanent magistrate, invested with the whole majesty and authority of the state. The great complaisance too of parliaments during so long a period, had extremely degraded and obscured those assemblies; and as all instances of opposition to prerogative must have been drawn from a remote age, they were unknown to a great many, and had the less authority even with those who were acquainted with them. These examples, besides, of liberty had commonly in ancient times been accompanied with such circumstances of violence, convulsion, civil war, and disorder, that they presented but a disagreeable idea to the inquisitive part of the people, and afforded small inducement to renew such dismal scenes. By a great many, therefore, monarchy, simple and unmixed, was conceived to be the government of England; and those popular assemblies were supposed to form only the ornament of the fabric, without being in any degree essential to its being and existence. The prerogative of the crown was represented by lawyers as something real and durable; like those eternal essences of the schools which no time or force could alter. The sanction of religion was by divines called in aid; and the Monarch of Heaven was supposed to be interested in supporting the authority of his earthly vicegerent. And though it is pretended that these doctrines were more openly inculcated and more strenuously insisted on during the reign of the Stuarts, they were not then invented, though they were carried to a great length; they were, however, thought by the court to be more necessary at that period, by reason of the opposite doctrines which began to be promulgated by the puritanical party.

In consequence of these exalted ideas of kingly authority, the prerogative, besides the articles of jurisdiction founded on precedent, was by many supposed to possess an inexhaustible fund of latent powers, which might be exerted on any emergence. In every government, necessity, when real, supersedes all laws and levels all limitations: but in the English government, convenience alone was conceived to authorize any extraordinary act of regal power, and to render it obligatory on the people. Hence the strict obedience required to proclamations, during all periods of the English history; and if James has incurred blame on account of his edicts, it is only because he too frequently issued them at a time when they began to be less regarded, not because he first assumed that exercise of authority. Of his maxims in a parallel case, the following is a pretty remarkable instance.

Queen Elizabeth had appointed commissioners for the inspection of prisons, and had bestowed on them full discretionary powers to adjust all differences between prisoners and their creditors, to compound debts, and to give liberty to such debtors as they found honest, and insolvent. From the uncertain and undefined nature of the English constitution, doubts sprang up in many, that this commission was contrary to law; and it was represented in that light to James. He forbore therefore renewing the commission till the fifteenth year of his reign; when complaints rose so high, with regard to the abuses practised in prisons, that he thought himself obliged to overcome his scruples, and to appoint new commissioners invested with the same discretionary powers which Elizabeth had formerly conferred (l).

Upon the whole, we must conceive that monarchy, on the accession of the house of Stuart, was possessed of a very extensive authority: an authority, in the judgement of all, not exactly limited; in the judgement of some, not limitable. But, at the same time, this authority was founded merely on the opinion of the people, influenced by ancient precedent and example. It was not supported either by money or by force of arms. And, for this reason, we need not wonder that the princes of that line were so extremely jealous of their prerogative; being sensible that, when those claims were ravished from them, they possessed no influence by which they could maintain their dignity, or support the laws. By the changes which have since been introduced, the liberty and independence of individuals has been rendered much more full, entire, and secure; that of the public more uncertain and precarious. And it seems a necessary, though perhaps a melancholy truth, that in every government, the magistrate must either possess a large revenue and a military force, or enjoy some discretionary powers, in order to execute the laws and support his own authority.

Passive obedience to princes, that notion which, through the darker ages of the world, had been efficaciously inculcated into the minds of the subject, began to be treated with a scepticism that produced an entire revolution in the opinions of the intelligent. Elizabeth saw and felt this change; and had life and empire continued, she would undoubtedly have sustained the mortification of beholding an entire alteration in the conduct of the commons, who had hitherto servilely complied with her imperious will. The short-sighted James was unable to account for the inconsistence he found between the theoretical and practical government of England; whilst the servility of the nobles confirmed him in the idea that he was actually in possession of a despotic power, the determined opposition of the commons prevented him from bringing that idea to reality; a small degree of accuracy would perhaps have reconciled the seeming contradiction. Even in that early period it might have been discerned that noble principles had taken deep root in the minds of the English people, that the progress of more enlightened reason would bring these to perfection, and the harvest of such fruit would infallibly produce an important change in the manner and constitution of government.

(k) We find a very extraordinary act of power exercised by James: on the erecting a new wall at his palace at Theobalds in Hertfordshire, a commission was given to a certain number of domestics to press into his service as many workmen as should be sufficient to complete the work in a short time, and to seize by force bricks, carts, tools, and every necessary material. Rymer's Fœdera.

ECCLESIASTICAL GOVERNMENT.

We have had occasion to remark in so many instances, the bigotry which prevailed in that age, that we can look for no toleration among the different sects. Two Arians, under the title of heretics, were punished by fire during this period; and no one reign since the reformation had been free from like barbarities. Stowe says, that these Arians were offered their pardon at the stake, if they would merit it by a recantation. A madman who called himself the Holy Ghost was, without any indulgence for his frenzy, condemned to the same punishment. Twenty pounds a month could by law be levied on every one who frequented not the established worship. This rigorous law, however, had one indulgent clause, that the fines exacted should not exceed two-thirds of the yearly income of the person. It had been usual for Elizabeth to allow those penalties to run on for several years; and to levy them all at once, to the utter ruin of such Catholics as had incurred her displeasure. James was more humane in this, as in every other respect. The Puritans formed a sect which secretly lurked in the church, but pretended not to any separate worship or discipline. An attempt of that kind would have been universally regarded as the most unpardonable enormity. They maintained, that they themselves were the only pure church; that their principles and practices ought to be established by law; and that no others ought to be tolerated. So far indeed was James from granting a toleration to this sect, that such of the clergy as refused to comply with the legal ceremonies, were deprived of their livings, and sometimes in Elizabeth's reign were otherwise punished. Lord Bacon contended, that uniformity in religion was absolutely necessary to the support of government, and that no toleration could with safety be given to sectaries (m); therefore the Puritans were rather harshly treated. Nothing but the imputation of idolatry, which was thrown on the Catholic religion, could justify, in the eyes of many, the schism made by the Hugonots and other Protestants who lived in popish countries.

In all former ages, not wholly excepting even those of Greece and Rome, religious sects and heresies and schisms, had been esteemed dangerous if not pernicious to civil government, and were regarded as the source of faction, and private combination, and opposition to the laws (n). The magistrate, therefore, applied himself directly to the cure of this evil as of every other; and naturally attempted by penal statutes to suppress those separate communities, and punish the obstinate innovators. But it was found by fatal experience, and after spilling an ocean of blood in those theological quarrels, that the evil was of a peculiar nature, and was both enflamed by violent remedies, and diffused itself more rapidly throughout the whole society. Hence, though late, arose the salutary practice of toleration.

The liberty of the press was incompatible with such maxims and such principles of government as then prevailed, and was therefore quite unknown in that age. Besides employing the two terrible courts of star-chamber and high commission, whose powers were unlimited, queen Elizabeth exerted her authority by restraints upon the press. She passed a decree in her court of star-chamber, that is, by her own will and pleasure, forbidding any book to be printed in any place but in London, Oxford, and Cambridge (o): and another, in which she prohibited, under severe penalties, the publishing of any book or pamphlet "against the form or meaning of any restraint or ordinance, contained, or to be contained, in any statute or laws of this realm, or in any injunction made or set forth by her majesty or her privy-council, or against the true sense or meaning of any letters patent, commissions or prohibitions under the great seal of England (p)." James extended the same penalties to the importing of such books from abroad (q). And to render these edicts more effectual, he afterwards inhibited the printing of any book without a licence from the archbishop of Canterbury, the archbishop of York, the bishop of London, or the vice-chancellor of one of the universities, or of some person appointed by them (r).

In tracing the coherence among the systems of modern theology, we may observe, that the doctrine of absolute decrees has ever been intimately connected with the principles of Calvin; as that doctrine affords the highest subject of joy, triumph, and security to those who are of the number of the elect. All the first Reformers adopted these principles; and the Jansenists in France have ever embraced them. As the Lutheran establishments were subjected to episcopal jurisdiction, their enthusiastic genius gradually decayed. The king, though at this time his Calvinistic education had rivetted him in the doctrine of absolute decrees, yet, being a zealous partizan of episcopacy, was insensibly engaged, towards the end of his reign, to favour the theological tenets of Arminius. Even in so great a doctor, the genius of the religion prevailed over its speculative tenets; and with him the whole clergy gradually dropped the more rigid principles of absolute reprobation and unconditional decrees: some noise was at first made about these innovations; but being drowned in the fury of factions and civil wars which ensued, the scholastic arguments made an insignificant figure amidst those violent disputes about civil and ecclesiastical power with which the nation was agitated. And at the restoration, the church, though she still retained her old subscriptions and articles of faith, was found to have totally changed her speculative doctrines, and to have embraced tenets more suitable to the genius of her discipline and worship, without its being possible to assign the precise period in which the alteration was produced.

It may be worth observing, that James, from his great desire to promote controversial divinity, erected a college at Chelsea for the entertainment of twenty persons, who should be entirely employed in refuting the Papists and Puritans (s). It is rather singular that a Calvinist should establish a college, to maintain persons who were to be employed in endeavouring to overturn those principles which he wished it to be understood he professed himself: if so changeable and weak a person as James could have any fixed principles at all. All the efforts of Bacon could not procure an establishment for the cultivation of natural philosophy: even to this day, no society has been instituted for the polishing and fixing of our language. The only encouragement which the sovereign in England has ever given to any thing that has the appearance of science, was this short-lived establishment of James; an institution quite superfluous, considering the propension which at that time so universally prevailed in the nation for polemical theology.

The manners of the nation were agreeable to the monarchical government which prevailed; and contained not that strange mixture which at present distinguishes England from all other countries. Such violent extremes were then unknown of industry and debauchery, frugality and profusion, civility and rusticity, fanaticism and scepticism. Candour, sincerity, modesty, are the only qualities which the English of that age possessed in common with the present.

High pride of family then prevailed; and it was by a dignity and stateliness of behaviour, that the gentry and nobility distinguished themselves from the common people. Great riches, acquired by commerce, were more rare, and had not as yet been able to confound all ranks of men, and render money the chief foundation of distinction. Much ceremony took place in the common intercourse of life, and little familiarity was indulged by the great. The advantages which result from opulence are so solid and real, that those who are possessed of them need not dread the near approaches of their inferiors. The distinctions of birth and title, being more empty and imaginary, soon vanish upon familiar access and acquaintance.

The expences of the great consisted in pomp and show, and a numerous retinue, rather than in convenience and true pleasure. The earl of Nottingham, in his embassy to Spain, was attended by five hundred persons: the earl of Hertford, in that to Brussels, carried three hundred gentlemen along with him. Lord Bacon has remarked, that the English nobility in his time maintained a larger retinue of servants than the nobility of any other nation, except, perhaps, the Polanders (t).

Civil

Civil honours, which now hold the first place, were at that time subordinate to the military. The young gentry and nobility were fond of distinguishing themselves by arms. The fury of duels too prevailed more than at any time before or since (u). This was the turn that the romantic chivalry for which the nation was formerly so renowned, had lately taken.

Liberty of commerce between the sexes was indulged; but without any licentiousness of manners. The court was very little an exception to this observation. James had rather entertained an aversion and contempt for the females; nor were those young courtiers, of whom he was so fond, able to break through the established manners of the nation.

The first sedan chair seen in England was in this reign, and was used by the duke of Buckingham; to the great indignation of the people, who exclaimed, that he was employing his fellow creatures to do the service of beasts.

The country life prevails at present in England beyond any cultivated nation of Europe; but it was then much more generally embraced by all the gentry. The increase of arts, pleasures, and social commerce, was just beginning to produce an inclination for the softer and more civilized life of the city. James discouraged as much as possible this alteration of manners. "He was wont to be very earnest," as lord Bacon tells us, "with the country gentlemen to go from London to their country seats. And sometimes he would say thus to them: Gentlemen, at London, you are like ships in a sea, which show like nothing; but in your country villages you are like ships in a river, which look like great things (v)."

He was not content with reproof and exhortation. As queen Elizabeth had perceived with regret the increase of London, and had restrained all new buildings by proclamation; James, who found that these edicts were not exactly obeyed, frequently renewed them; though a strict execution seems still to have been wanting. He also issued reiterated proclamations in imitation of his predecessor; containing severe menaces against the gentry who lived in town (w). The short-sighted James could not perceive that this policy is contrary to that which has ever been practised by all princes who studied the increase of their authority. To allure the nobility to court; to engage them in expensive pleasures or employments which dissipate their fortune; to increase their subjection to ministers by attendance; to weaken their authority in the provinces by absence: these have been the common arts of arbitrary governments. But James, besides that he had certainly laid no plan for extending his power, had no money to support a splendid court, or bestow on a numerous retinue of gentry and nobility. He thought too, that by their living together, they became more sensible of their own strength, and were apt to indulge too curious researches into matters of government. To remedy the present evil, he was desirous of dispersing them into their country-seats; where, he hoped, they would bear a more submissive reverence to his authority, and receive less support from each other. But the contrary effect soon followed. The riches amassed during their residence at home rendered them independent. The influence acquired by hospitality made them formidable. They would not be led by the court: they could not be driven: and thus the system of the English government received a total and sudden alteration in the course of less than forty years.

The first rise of commerce and the arts had contributed, in the preceding reigns, to scatter those immense fortunes of the barons which rendered them so formidable both to king and people. The farther progress of these advantages began during this reign to ruin the small proprietors of land; and, by both events, the gentry, or that rank which composed the house of commons, enlarged their power and authority. The early improvements in luxury were seized by the greater nobles, whose fortunes, placing them above frugality, or even calculation, were soon dissipated in expensive pleasures. These improvements reached at last all men of property; and those of slender fortunes, who at that time were often men of family, imitating those of a rank immediately above them, reduced themselves to poverty. Their lands, coming to sale, swelled the estates of those who possessed riches sufficient for the fashionable expences; but who were not exempted from some care and attention to their domestic œconomy.

The gentry also of that age were engaged in no expence, except that of country hospitality. No taxes were levied, no wars waged, no attendance at court expected, no bribery or profusion required at elections (x). Could human nature ever reach happiness, the condition of the English gentry under so mild and benign a prince, might merit that appellation.

Finances.

The amount of the king's revenue, as it stood in 1617, is thus stated (y): of crown lands eighty thousand pounds a-year; by customs and new impositions, near one hundred and ninety thousand; by wards and other various branches of revenue, beside purveyance, one hundred and eighty thousand. The whole amounting to four hundred and fifty thousand. The king's ordinary disbursements, by the same account, are said to exceed this sum thirty-six thousand pounds (z). All the extraordinary sums which James had raised by subsidies, loans, sale of lands, sale of the title of baronet, money paid by the States, and by the king of France, benevolences, &c. were in the whole about two millions two hundred thousand pounds: of which the sale of lands afforded seven hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds. The extraordinary disbursements of the king amounted to two millions; beside above four hundred thousand pounds given in presents. Upon the whole, a sufficient reason appears, partly from necessary expences, partly for want of œconomy, why the king, even early in his reign, was deeply involved in debt, and found great difficulty to support the government.

Farmers, not commissioners, levied the customs. It seems, indeed, requisite, that the former method should always be tried before the latter, though a preferable one. When men's own interest is concerned, they fall upon a hundred expedients to prevent frauds in the merchants; and these the public may afterwards imitate in establishing proper rules for its officers.

The customs were supposed to amount to five per cent. of the value, and were levied upon exports as well as imports. Nay, the imposition upon exports, by James's additions, is said to amount in some few instances to twenty-five per cent. This practice, so hurtful to industry, prevails still in France, Spain, and most countries of Europe. The customs in 1604 yielded one hundred and twenty-seven thousand pounds a-year (a): they rose to one hundred and ninety thousand towards the end of the reign.

Interest, during this reign, was at ten per cent. till 1624, when it was reduced to eight, by an act of parliament. This high interest is an indication of the great profits and small progress of commerce.

The extraordinary supplies granted by parliament during this whole reign amounted not to more than six hundred and thirty thousand pounds; which, divided among twenty-one years, makes thirty thousand pounds a-year. We do not include those supplies, amounting to three hundred thousand pounds, which were given to the king by his last parliament. These were paid in to their own commissioners; and the expences of the Spanish war were much more than sufficient to exhaust them. The distressed family of the palatine was a great burthen on James, during part of his reign. The king, it is pretended, possessed not frugality proportioned to the extreme narrowness of his revenue. Splendid equipages, however, he did not affect, nor costly furniture, nor a luxurious table, nor prodigal mistresses. His buildings too were not sumptuous; though the banqueting-house must not be forgotten, as a monument which does honour to his reign. Hunting was his chief amusement, the cheapest pleasure in which a king can indulge himself. His expences were the effects of liberality, rather than of luxury.

It is said, that one day, while he was standing amidst some of his courtiers, a porter passed by loaded with money, which he was carrying to the treasury. The king observed, that Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, one of his handsome agreeable favourites, whispered something to one standing near him. Upon inquiry, he found that Rich had said, "How happy would that money make me!" Without hesitation James bestowed it all upon him though it amounted to three thousand pounds. He added, "You think yourself very happy in obtaining so large a sum; but I am more happy in having an opportunity of obliging a worthy man, whom I love." The generosity of James was more the result of a benign humour or light fancy, than of reason or judgement. The objects of it were such as could render themselves agreeable to him in his loose hours; not such as were endowed with great merit, or who possessed talents or popularity which could strengthen his interest with the public.

The same advantage, we may remark, over the people, which the crown formerly reaped from that interval between the fall of the peers and the rise of the commons, was now possessed by the people against the crown, during the continuance of a like interval. The sovereign had already lost that independent revenue by which he could subsist without regular supplies from parliament; and he had not yet acquired the means of influencing those assemblies. The effects of this situation, which commenced with the accession of the house of Stuart, soon rose to a great height, and were more or less propagated throughout all the reigns of that unhappy family.

Subsidies and fifteenths are frequently mentioned by historians; but neither the amount of these taxes nor the method of levying them have been well explained. It appears, that the fifteenths formerly corresponded to the name, and were that proportionable part of the moveables (b). But a valuation having been made in the reign of Edward III., that valuation was always adhered to, and each town paid unalterably a particular sum, which the inhabitants themselves assessed upon their fellow-citizens. The same tax in corporate towns was called a tenth; because, there it was at first a tenth of the moveables. The whole amount of a tenth and a fifteenth throughout the kingdom, or a fifteenth as it is often more concisely called, was about twenty-nine thousand pounds (c). The amount of a subsidy was not invariable, like that of a fifteenth. In the eighth of Elizabeth a subsidy amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand pounds: in the fortieth it was not above seventy-eight thousand (d). It afterwards fell to seventy thousand; and was continually decreasing (e). The reason is easily collected from the method of levying it. We may learn from the subsidy bills (f), that one subsidy was given for four shillings in the pound on land, and two shillings and eight-pence on moveables throughout the counties; a considerable tax, had it been strictly levied. But this was only the ancient state of a subsidy. During the reign of James, there was not paid the twentieth part of that sum. The tax was so far personal that a man paid only in the county where he lived, though he should possess estates in other counties; and the assessors formed a loose estimation of his property, and rated him accordingly. To preserve, however, some rule in the estimation, it seems to have been the practice to keep an eye to former assessments, and to rate every man according as his ancestors, or men of such an estimated property were accustomed to pay. This was a sufficient reason why subsidies could not increase, notwithstanding the great increase of money and rise of rents. But there was an evident reason why they continually decreased. The favour, as is natural to suppose, ran always against the crown; especially during the latter end of Elizabeth, when subsidies became numerous and frequent, and the sums levied were considerable, compared to former supplies. The assessors, though accustomed to have an eye to ancient estimations, were not bound to observe any such rule; but might rate anew any person according to his present income. When rents fell, or part of an estate was sold off, the proprietor was sure to represent these losses, and obtain a diminution of his subsidy; but where rents rose, or new lands were purchased, he kept his own secret, and paid no more than formerly. The advantage, therefore, of every change was taken against the crown; and the crown could obtain the advantage of none. And to make the matter worse, the alterations which happened in property during this age were in general unfavourable to the crown. The small proprietors, or twenty pound men, went continually to decay; and when their estates were swallowed up by a greater, the new purchaser increased not his subsidy. So loose indeed is the whole method of rating subsidies, that the wonder was not how the tax should continually diminish; but how it yielded any revenue at all. It became at last so unequal and uncertain, that the parliament was obliged to change it into a land tax.

The price of corn during this reign, and that of the other necessaries of life, was rather higher than at present, considering the difference of the valuation of money. By a proclamation of James, establishing public magazines, whenever wheat fell below thirty-two shillings a quarter, rye below eighteen, barley below sixteen, the commissioners were empowered to purchase corn for the magazines (g). These prices then are to be regarded as low. At present (March 1811,) the price of wheat is a hundred shillings a quarter, rye forty shillings, barley thirty-six. The usual bread of the poor was at this time made of barley (h). The best wool, during the greater part of James's reign, was at thirty-three shillings a tod (i). At present it is not above two-thirds of that value; though it is to be presumed, that our exports in woollen goods are somewhat increased. The finer manufactures too, by the progress of arts and industry, have rather diminished in price, notwithstanding the great increase of money. In Shakespeare, the hostess tells Falstaff, that the shirts she bought him were holland at eight shillings a-yard; a high price at this day, even supposing, what is not probable, that the best holland at that time was equal in goodness to the best that can now be purchased. In like manner, a yard of velvet, about the middle of Elizabeth's reign, was valued at two-and-twenty shillings. It appears from Dr. Birch's life of prince Henry (k), that that prince, by contract with his butcher, paid near a groat a-pound throughout the year for all the beef and mutton used in his family (l). Besides, we must consider, that the general turn of that age, which no laws could prevent, was the converting of arable land into pasture. We have a regulation of the market with regard to poultry and some other articles very early in Charles I.'s reign (m); and the prices are high. A turkey-cock four shillings and sixpence, a turkey hen three shillings, a pheasant cock six, a pheasant hen five, a partridge one shilling, a goose two, a capon two and sixpence, a pullet one and sixpence, a rabbit eight pence, a dozen of pigeons six shillings (n). We must consider, that London at present is more than three times more populous than it was at that time: a circumstance which much increases the price of poultry, and of every thing that cannot conveniently be brought from a distance: not to mention that these regulations by authority are always calculated to diminish, never to increase the market-prices. The contractors for victualling the navy were allowed by government eight pence a day for the diet of each man when in harbour, seven pence halfpenny when at sea (o). The chief difference in expence between that age and the commencement of the present king's reign, consists in the imaginary wants of men, which have since extremely multiplied (p).

Arms.

The public was entirely free from the danger and expence of a standing army. While James was vaunting his divine vicegerency, and boasting of his high prerogative, he possessed not so much as a single regiment of guards to maintain his extensive claims: a sufficient proof that he sincerely believed his pretensions to be well grounded, and a strong presumption that they were at least built on what were then deemed plausible arguments. The militia of England, amounting to one hundred and sixty thousand men (q), was the sole defence of the kingdom. It is pretended that they were kept in good order during this reign (r). The city of London procured officers who had served abroad, and who taught the trained bands their exercises in Artillery Garden; a practice which had been discontinued since 1588. All the counties of England, in emulation of the capital, were fond of showing a well-ordered and well-appointed militia. It appeared that the natural propensity of men towards military shows and exercises will go far, with a little attention in the sovereign, towards exciting and supporting this spirit in any nation. The very boys at this time, in mimickry of their elders, inlisted themselves voluntarily into companies, elected officers, and practised the discipline, of which models were every day exposed to their view (s). Sir Edward Harwood, in a memorial composed at the beginning of the subsequent reign, says, that England was so unprovided with horses fit for war, that two thousand men could not possibly be mounted throughout the whole kingdom (t). At present the breed of horses is so much improved, that almost all those which are employed either in the plough, waggon, or coach, might me made fit for that purpose.

The disorders of Ireland obliged James to keep up some forces there, and put him to great expence. The common pay of a private man in the infantry was eight pence a-day, a lieutenant two shillings, an ensign eighteen pence (u). The armies in Europe were not near so numerous during that age; and the private men, we may observe, were drawn from a better rank than at present, and approaching nearer to that of the officers.

In the year 1583 there was a general review made of all the men in England capable of bearing arms; and these were found to amount to one million one hundred and seventy two thousand men, according to Raleigh (v). It is impossible to warrant the exactness of this computation; or, rather, we may fairly presume it to be somewhat inaccurate. But if it approached near the truth, England has probably, since that time, increased in populousness. The growth of London, in riches and beauty, as well as in numbers of inhabitants, has been prodigious. From 1600 it doubled every forty years (w); and consequently, in 1680, it contained four times as many inhabitants as at the beginning of the century. It has ever been the centre of all the trade in the kingdom; and almost the only town that affords society and amusement. The affection which the English bear to a country life makes the provincial towns be little frequented by the gentry. Nothing but the allurements of the capital, which is favoured by the residence of the king, and by being the seat of government, and of all the courts of justice, can prevail over their passion for their rural villas.

London at this time was almost entirely built of wood, and in every respect was certainly a very ugly city. The earl of Arundel first introduced the general practice of brick buildings (x).

The navy of England was esteemed formidable in Elizabeth's time, yet it consisted only of thirty-three ships, besides pinnaces (y): and the largest of these would not equal our fourth-rates at present. Raleigh advises never to build a ship of war above six hundred tons (z). James was not negligent of the navy. In five years preceding 1623, he built ten new ships, and expended fifty thousand pounds a-year on the fleet, beside the value of thirty-six thousand pounds in timber, which he annually gave from the royal forests (a). The largest ship that had ever come from the English docks was built during this reign. She was only one thousand four hundred tons, and carried sixty-four guns (b). The merchant ships, in cases of necessity, were instantly converted into ships of war. The king affirmed to the parliament, that the navy had never before been in so good a condition (c).

Commerce.

Every session of parliament during this reign, we meet with grievous lamentations concerning the decay of trade, and the growth of popery. The king himself was deceived by these popular complaints, and was at a loss to account for the total want of money, which he heard so much exaggerated (d). It may, however, be affirmed, that during no preceding period of English history, was there a more sensible increase than during the reign of this monarch, of all the advantages which distinguish a flourishing people. Not only the peace which he maintained (whether through pusillanimity or a pacific disposition) was favourable to industry and commerce: and trade being yet in its infancy, all additions to it must have been the more evident to every eye, which was not blinded by melancholy prejudices.

By an account (e) which seems judicious and accurate, it appears that all the seamen employed in the merchant service amounted to ten thousand men, which does not amount to the fifth part of their present number, in time of peace; but unhappily the long continuance of the present struggle with France, (1811) has had a very dreadful effect on our foreign trade. Sir Thomas Overbury says, that the Dutch possessed three times more shipping than the English, but that their ships were of inferior burden to the latter (f). Sir William Monson computed the English naval power to be little or nothing inferior to the Dutch (g), which is surely an exaggeration. The Dutch at this time traded to England with six hundred ships; England to Holland with sixty only (h).

Manufactures.

A catalogue of the manufactures, for which the English were then eminent, would appear very contemptible, in comparison of those which flourish among them at present. Almost all the more elaborate and curious arts were only cultivated abroad, particularly in Italy, Holland, and the Netherlands. Ship-building, and the founding of iron cannon, were the sole in which the English excelled. They seem, indeed, to have possessed alone the secret of the latter; and great complaints were made every parliament against the exportation of English ordnance.

Nine tenths of the commerce of the kingdom consisted in woollen goods (i). Wool, however, was allowed to be exported, till the nineteenth of the king. Its exportation was then forbidden by proclamation, though that edict was never strictly executed. Most of the cloth was exported raw, and was dyed and dressed by the Dutch; who gained, it is pretended, seven hundred thousand pounds a year by this manufacture (k). A proclamation issued by the king against exporting cloth in that condition, had succeeded so ill during one year, by the refusal of the Dutch to buy the dressed cloth, that great murmurs arose against it; and this measure was retracted by the king, and complained of by the nation, as if it had been the most impolitic in the world. It seems indeed to have been premature.

In so little credit was the fine English cloth even in England, that the king was obliged to seek expedients by which he might engage the people of fashion to wear it (l). The manufacture of fine linen was at this time totally unknown in the kingdom (m).

The company of merchant-adventurers, by the patent which had been granted them, possessed the sole commerce of woollen goods, though the staple commodity of the kingdom. An attempt was made during the reign of Elizabeth to lay open this important trade, which had been attended with bad consequences for a time, by a conspiracy of the merchant-adventurers, not to make any purchases of cloth; and the queen immediately restored them their patent.

It was the groundless fear of a similar accident that enslaved the nation to those exclusive companies, which confined so much every branch of commerce and industry. The parliament, however, annulled, in the third of the king, the patent of the Spanish company; and the trade to Spain, which was at first very insignificant, soon became the most considerable in the kingdom. It is strange that they were not thence encouraged to abolish all the other companies, and that they went no farther than obliging them to enlarge their bottom, and to facilitate the admission of new adventurers.

A board of trade was erected by the king in 1622 (n). One of the reasons assigned in the commission, is to remedy the low price of wool, which begat complaints of the decay of the woollen manufactory. It is more probable, however, that this fall of prices proceeded from the increase of wool. The king likewise recommends it to the commissioners to inquire and examine, whether a greater freedom of trade, and an exemption from the restraint of exclusive companies, would not be beneficial. Men were then fettered by their own prejudices; and the king was justly afraid of embracing a bold measure, whose consequences might be uncertain. The digesting of a navigation act, of a like nature with the famous one executed afterwards by the republican parliament, is likewise recommended to the commissioners. The arbitrary powers then commonly assumed by the privy council, appear evidently through the whole tenour of the commission.

The silk manufacture had no footing in England: but, by James's direction, mulberry-trees were planted, and silk-worms introduced (o). The climate seems unfavourable to the success of this project. The planting of hops increased much in England during this reign.

Greenland is thought to have been discovered about this period; and the whale fishery was carried on with success: but the industry of the Dutch, in spite of all opposition, soon deprived the English of this source of riches. A company was erected for the discovery of the north-west passage; and many fruitless attempts were made for that purpose.

The passage to the East-Indies had been opened to the English during the reign of Elizabeth; but the trade to those parts was not entirely established till this reign, when the East-India company received a new patent, enlarged their stock to one million five hundred thousand pounds (p), and fitted out several ships on these adventures. In 1609 they built a vessel of twelve hundred tons, the largest merchant ship that England had ever known. She was unfortunate, and perished by shipwreck. In 1611, a large ship of the company, assisted by a pinnace, maintained five several engagements with a squadron of Portuguese, and gained a complete victory over forces much superior. During the following years the Dutch company was guilty of great injuries towards the English, in expelling many of their factors, and destroying their settlements: but these violences were resented with a proper spirit by the court of England. A naval force was equipped under the earl of Oxford (q), and lay in wait for the return of the Dutch East-India fleet. By reason of cross winds, Oxford failed of his purpose, and the Dutch escaped. Some time after, one rich ship was taken by vice-admiral Merwin; and it was stipulated by the Dutch to pay seventy thousand pounds to the English company, in consideration of the losses which that company had sustained (r). But neither this stipulation, nor the fear of reprisals, nor the sense of that friendship which subsisted between England and the States, could restrain the avidity of the Dutch company, or render them equitable in their proceedings towards their allies. Impatient to have the sole possession of the spice trade, which the English then shared with them, they assumed a jurisdiction over a factory of the latter in the island of Amboyna, in 1623; and on absurd pretences, seized all the factors, with their families, and put them to death with the most inhuman tortures; an account of which we have given before.

The exports of England from Christmas 1612 to Christmas 1613 are computed at two million four hundred and eighty-seven thousand four hundred and thirty-five pounds: the imports at two million one hundred and forty-one thousand one hundred and fifty-one: so that the balance in favour of England was three hundred and forty-six thousand two hundred and eighty-four (s). But in 1622 the exports were two million three hundred and twenty thousand four hundred and thirty-six pounds; the imports two million six hundred and nineteen thousand three hundred and fifteen; which makes a balance of two hundred and ninety-eight thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine pounds against England (t). The coinage of England from 1599 to 1619 amounted to four million seven hundred and seventy-nine thousand three hundred and fourteen pounds thirteen shillings and four pence (u): a proof that the balance in the main was considerably in favour of the kingdom. As the annual imports and exports together rose to near five millions, and the customs never yielded so much as two hundred thousand pounds a-year, of which tonnage made a part, it appears that the new rates affixed by James did not, on the whole, amount to one shilling in the pound, and consequently were still inferior to the intention of the original grant of parliament. The East-India company usually carried out a third of their cargo in commodities (v). The trade to Turkey was one of the most gainful to the nation (w). It appears that copper half-pence and farthings began to be coined in this reign (x). Tradesmen had commonly carried on their retail business chiefly by means of leaden tokens. The small silver penny was soon lost, and at this time was no where to be found.

Colonies.

What chiefly renders the reign of James memorable, is the commencement of the English colonies in America; colonies established on the noblest footing that has been known in any age or nation. The Spaniards, being the first discoverers of the new world, immediately took possession of the precious mines which they found there; and, by the allurement of great riches, they were tempted to depopulate their own country, as well as that which they conquered; and added the vice of sloth to those of avidity and barbarity, which had attended their adventurers in those renowned enterprizes. That fine coast was entirely neglected, which reaches from St. Augustin to Cape Breton, and which lies in all the temperate climates, is watered by noble rivers, and offers a fertile soil, but nothing more, to the industrious planter. Peopled gradually from England by the necessitous and indigent, who at home increased neither wealth nor populousness, the colonies which were planted along that tract, promoted the navigation, and encouraged the industry, of their mother-country. The spirit of independency, which was reviving in England, here shone forth in its full lustre, and received new accession from the aspiring character of those who, being discontented with the established church and monarchy, had sought for freedom amidst those savage deserts.

Queen Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the continent of Virginia; and after her planting one feeble colony, which quickly decayed, that country was entirely abandoned. But when peace put an end to the military enterprizes against Spain, and left ambitious spirits no hopes of making any longer such rapid advances towards honour and fortune, the nation began to second the pacific intentions of its monarch, and to seek a surer, though slower expedient, for acquiring riches and glory. In 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a settlement; which the company erected by patent for that purpose in London and Bristol, took care to supply with yearly recruits of provisions, utensils, and new inhabitants. About 1609, Argal discovered a more direct and shorter passage to Virginia, and left the tract of the ancient navigators, who had first directed their course southwards to the tropic, sailed westward by means of the trade-winds, and then turned northward, till they reached the English settlements. The same year, five hundred persons under sir Thomas Gates and sir George Somers were embarked for Virginia. Somers's ship meeting with a tempest, was driven into the Bermudas, and laid the foundation of a settlement in those islands. Lord Delawar afterwards undertook the government of the English colonies: but notwithstanding all his care, seconded by supplies from James, and by money raised from the first lottery ever known in the kingdom, such difficulties attended the settlement of these countries, that in 1614 there were not alive more than four hundred men, of all that had been sent thither. After supplying themselves with provisions more immediately necessary for the support of life, the new planters began the cultivating of tobacco; and James, notwithstanding his antipathy to that drug, which he affirmed to be pernicious to men's morals as well as their health (y), gave them permission to enter it in England; and he inhibited by proclamation all importation of it from Spain (z). By degrees, new colonies were established in that continent, and gave new names to the places where they settled, leaving that of Virginia to the province first planted. The island of Barbadoes was also planted in this reign.

Many reasoners, during that age, raised numberless objections to the planting of those remote colonies; and foretold that, after draining their mother-country of inhabitants, they would soon shake off her yoke, and erect an independent government in America. England, however, maintained the sovereignty of the North American provinces till 1775, when a war took place between the mother-country and the colonies; the result of which was, that the Americans were declared independent in 1782.

AGRICULTURE.

Agriculture was anciently very imperfect in England. The sudden transitions so often mentioned by historians, from the lowest to the highest price of grain, and the prodigious inequality of its value in different years, are sufficient proofs that the produce depended entirely on the seasons, and that art had as yet done nothing to fence against the injuries of the heavens. During this reign considerable improvements were made, as in most arts, so in this, the most beneficial of any. A numerous catalogue might be formed of books and pamphlets treating of husbandry, which were written about this time. The nation, however, was still dependent on foreigners for daily bread; and though its exportation of grain sometimes forms a considerable branch of its commerce, notwithstanding its probable increase of people, there was in that period a regular importation from the Baltic, as well as from France; and if it ever stopped, the bad consequences were sensibly felt by the nation. Sir Walter Raleigh in his observations computes, that two millions went out at one time for corn. It was not till the fifth of Elizabeth, that the exportation of corn had been allowed in England; and Camden observes, that agriculture from that moment received new life and vigour.

The endeavours of James, or, more properly speaking, those of the nation, for promoting trade, were attended with greater success than those for the encouragement of learning. Though the age was by no means destitute of eminent writers, a very bad taste in general prevailed during that period; and the monarch himself was not a little infected with it, as appears from several extracts given in the foregoing history of his reign.

LEARNING AND ARTS.

On the origin of letters among the Greeks, the genius of poets and orators, as might naturally be expected, was distinguished by an amiable simplicity, which, whatever rudeness may sometimes attend it, is so fitted to express the genuine movements of nature and passion, that the compositions possessed of it must ever appear valuable to the discerning part of mankind. The glaring figures of discourse, the pointed antithesis, the unnatural conceit, the jingle of words; such false ornaments were not employed by early writers; not because they were rejected, but because they scarcely ever occurred to them. An easy, unforced strain of sentiment runs through their compositions; though at the same time we may observe, that amidst the most elegant simplicity of thought and expression, one is sometimes surprized to meet with a poor conceit, which had presented itself unsought for, and which the author had not acquired critical observation enough to condemn (a). A bad taste seizes with avidity these frivolous beauties, and even perhaps a good taste, ere surfeited by them: they multiply every day more and more in the fashionable compositions: nature and good sense are neglected: laboured ornaments studied and admired: and a total degeneracy of style and language prepares the way for barbarism and ignorance. Hence the Asiatic manner was found to depart so much from the simple purity of Athens: hence that tinsel eloquence which is observable in many of the Roman writers, from which Cicero himself is not wholly exempted, and which so much prevails in Ovid, Seneca, Lucan, Martial, and the Plinys.

On the revival of letters, when the judgement of the public is yet raw and unformed, this false glitter catches the eye, and leaves no room, either in eloquence or poetry, for the durable beauties of solid sense and lively passion. The reigning genius is then diametrically opposite to that which prevails on the first origin of arts. The Italian writers, it is evident, even the most celebrated, have not reached the proper simplicity of thought and composition; and in Petrarch, Tasso, Guarini, frivolous witticisms and forced conceits are but too predominant. The period during which letters were cultivated in Italy, was so short as scarcely to allow leisure for correcting this adulterated relish.

The more early French writers are liable to the same reproach. Voiture, Balzac, even Corneille, have too much affected those ambitious ornaments, of which the Italians in general, and the least pure of the ancients, supplied them with so many models. And it was not till late, that observation and reflection gave rise to a more natural turn of thought and composition among that elegant people.

A like character may be extended to the first English writers; such as flourished during the reigns of Elizabeth and James, and even till long afterwards. Learning, on its revival in this island, was attired in the same unnatural garb which it wore at the time of its decay among the Greeks and Romans. And, what may be regarded as a misfortune, the English writers were possessed of great genius before they were endowed with any degree of taste, and by that means gave a kind of sanction to those forced turns and sentiments which they so much affected. Their distorted conceptions and expressions are attended with such vigour of mind, that we admire the imagination which produced them, as much as we blame the want of judgement which gave them admittance. To enter into an exact criticism of the writers of that age would exceed our present purpose. A short character of the most eminent, delivered with the same freedom which history exercises over kings and ministers, may not be improper. The national prepossessions, which prevail, will perhaps render the former liberty not the least perilous for an author.

If Shakespear be considered as a MAN, born in a rude age, and educated in the lowest manner, without any instruction, either from the world or from books, he may be regarded as a prodigy: if represented as a POET, capable of furnishing a proper entertainment to a refined or intelligent audience, we must abate somewhat of this eulogy. In his compositions, we regret, that many irregularities, and even absurdities, should so frequently disfigure the animated and passionate scenes intermixed with them; and at the same time, we perhaps admire the more those beauties, on account of their being surrounded with such deformities. A striking peculiarity of sentiment, adapted to a single character, he frequently hits, as it were by inspiration; but a reasonable propriety of thought does not appear to have been at any time upheld. Nervous and picturesque expressions as well as descriptions abound in him; but it is in vain we look either for purity or simplicity of diction. His total ignorance of all theatrical art and conduct, however material a defect; yet, as it affects the spectator, rather than the reader, we can more easily excuse, than that want of taste which often prevails in his productions, and which gives way only by intervals to the irradiations of genius. A great and fertile genius he certainly possessed, and one enriched equally with a tragic and comic vein; but he ought to be cited as a proof, how dangerous it is to rely on these advantages alone for attaining an excellence in the finer arts (b). He died in 1616, aged fifty-three years.

JOHNSON possessed all the learning which was wanting to Shakespear, and wanted all the genius of which the other was possessed. Both of them were equally deficient in taste and elegance, in harmony and correctness. A servile copyist of the ancients, Johnson translated into bad English the beautiful passages of the Greek and Roman authors, without accommodating them to the manners of his age and country. His merit has been totally eclipsed by that of Shakespear, whose rude genius prevailed over the rude art of his contemporary. The English theatre has ever since taken a strong tincture of Shakespear's spirit and character; and thence it has proceeded, that the nation has undergone from all its neighbours, the reproach of barbarism, from which its valuable productions in some other parts of learning would otherwise have exempted it. Johnson had a pension of a hundred marks from the king, which Charles afterwards augmented to a hundred pounds. He died in 1637, aged sixty-three.

(a) The name of Polynices, one of Oedipus's sons, means in the original much quarrelling. In the altercations between the two brothers, in Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, this conceit is employed; and it is remarkable, that so poor a conundrum could not be rejected by any of those three poets, so justly celebrated for their taste and simplicity. What could Shakespear have done worse? Terence has his inseptio est amentium, non amantium. Many similar instances will occur to the learned. It is well known, that Aristotle treats very seriously of puns, divides them into several classes, and recommends the use of them to orators.

FAIRFAX has translated Tasso with an elegance and ease, and at the same time with an exactness, which for that age are surprising. Each line in the original is faithfully rendered by a correspondent line in the translation. Harrington's translation of Ariosto is not likewise without its merit. It is to be regretted that these poets should have imitated the Italians in their stanza, which has a prolixity and uniformity in it that displeases in long performances. They had otherwise, as well as Spenser, who went before them, contributed much to the polishing and refining of English versification.

In DONNE's satires, when carefully inspected, there appear some flashes of wit and ingenuity; but these are totally suffocated and buried by the hardest and most uncouth expression that is any where to be met with.

If the poetry of the English was so rude and imperfect during that age, we may reasonably expect that their prose would be liable to still greater objections. Though the latter appears the more easy, as it is the more natural method of composition; it has ever in practice been found the more rare and difficult; and there scarcely is an instance in any language, that it has reached a degree of perfection, before the refinement of poetical numbers and expression. English prose, during the reign of James, was written with little regard to the rules of grammar, and with a total disregard to the elegance and harmony of the period. Stuffed with Latin sentences and quotations, it likewise imitated those inversions which, however forcible and graceful in the ancient languages, are entirely contrary to the idiom of the English. We may indeed venture to affirm, that whatever uncouth phrases and expressions occur in old books, they were chiefly owing to the unformed taste of the author; and that the language spoken in the courts of Elizabeth and James was very little different from that which we meet with at present in good company. Of this opinion the little scraps of speeches which are found in the parliamentary journals, and which carry an air so opposite to the laboured orations, seem to be a sufficient proof; and there want not productions of that age which, being written by men who were not authors by profession, retain a very natural manner, and may give us some idea of the language which prevailed among men of the world. We shall particularly mention sir John Davis's Discovery, Throgmorton's, Essex's, and Nevil's letters. In a more early period, Cavendish's life of cardinal Wolsey, the pieces that remain of bishop Gardiner, and Anne Boleyn's letter to the king, differ little or nothing from the language of the present day.

The great glory of literature in this island during the reign of James, was lord Bacon. Most of his performances were composed in Latin; though he possessed neither the elegance of that, nor of his native tongue. If we consider the variety of talents displayed by this man; as a public speaker, a man of business, a wit, a courtier, a companion, an author, a philosopher; he is justly the object of great admiration. If we consider him merely as an author and philosopher, the light in which we view him at present, though very estimable, he was yet inferior to his contemporary Galilæo, perhaps even to Kepler. Bacon pointed out at a distance the road to true philosophy: Galilæo both pointed it out to others, and made himself considerable advances in it. The Englishman was ignorant of geometry: the Florentine revived that science, excelled in it, and was the first that applied it, together with experiment, to natural philosophy. The former rejected, with the most positive disdain, the system of Copernicus: the latter fortified it with new proofs, derived both from reason and the senses. Bacon's style is stiff and rigid: his wit, though often brilliant, is also often unnatural and far-fetched; and he seems to be the original of those pointed similies and long-spun allegories which so much distinguish the English authors: Galilæo is a lively and agreeable, though somewhat a prolix writer. But Italy, not united in any single government, and perhaps satiated with that literary glory which it has possessed both in ancient and modern times, has too much neglected the renown which it has acquired by giving birth to so great a man. That national spirit which prevails among the English, and which forms their great happiness, is the cause why they bestow on all their eminent writers, and on Bacon among the rest, such praises and acclamations as may often appear partial and excessive. He died in 1626, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

If the reader of Raleigh's history can have the patience to wade through the Jewish and Rabbinical learning which compose the half of the volume, he will find, when he comes to the Greek and Roman story, that his pains are not unrewarded. Raleigh is the best model of that ancient style which some writers would affect to revive at present. He was beheaded in 1618, aged sixty-six years.

CAMDEN's history of queen Elizabeth may be esteemed good composition, both for style and matter. It is written with simplicity of expression, very rare in that age, and with a regard to truth. It would not perhaps be too much to affirm, that it is among the best historical productions which have yet been composed by any Englishman. It is well known that the English have not much excelled in that kind of literature. He died in 1623, aged seventy-three years.

We shall mention the king himself at the end of these English writers; because that is his place, when considered as an author. It may safely be affirmed, that the mediocrity of James's talents in literature, joined to the great change in national taste, is one cause of that contempt under which his memory labours. It is remarkable how different from ours were the sentiments of the ancients with regard to learning. Of the first twenty Roman emperors, counting from Cæsar to Severus, above the half were authors; and though few of them seem to have been eminent in that profession, it is always remarked to their praise, that by their example they encouraged literature. Not to mention Germanicus, and his daughter Agrippina, persons so nearly allied to the throne, the greater part of the classic writers, whose works remain, were men of the highest quality. As every human advantage is attended with inconveniences, the change of men's ideas in this particular may probably be ascribed to the invention of printing; which has rendered books so common, that even men of slender fortunes can have access to them.

That James was but a middling writer may be allowed: that he was a contemptible one, can by no means be admitted. Whoever will read his Basilicon Doron, particularly the two last books, the true law of free monarchies, his answer to cardinal Perron, and almost all his speeches and messages to parliament, will confess him to have possessed some share of genius. If he wrote concerning witches and apparitions; who in that age did not admit the reality of these fictitious beings?

Such a superiority do the pursuits of literature possess above every other occupation, that even he who attains but a mediocrity in them, merits the pre-eminence above those that excel the most in the common and vulgar professions. The speaker of the house of commons is usually an eminent lawyer; yet the harangue of his majesty will always be found much superior to that of the speaker, in every parliament during this reign.

Every science, as well as polite literature, must be considered as being yet in its infancy. Scholastic learning and polemical divinity retarded the growth of all true knowledge. Sir Henry Saville, in the preamble of that deed by which he annexed a salary to the mathematical and astronomical professors in Oxford, says, that geometry was almost totally abandoned and unknown in England (c). The best learning of that age was the study of the ancients. Casaubon, eminent for this species of knowledge, was invited over from France by James, and encouraged by a pension of three hundred pounds a-year, as well as by church preferments (d). The famous Antotonio di Dominis, archbishop of Spalatro, no despicable philosopher, came likewise into England, and afforded great triumph to the nation, by their gaining so considerable a proselyte from the Papists. But the mortification followed soon after: the archbishop, though advanced to some ecclesiastical preferments (e), received not encouragement sufficient to satisfy his ambition: he therefore returned to Italy, where he afterwards died in confinement.

CHAP. III.

CHARLES I.

NO sooner had death closed the eyes of James the First, than his son Charles, invested with the reins of government, began his career with an impetuosity that left unregarded the forms of filial piety, or that decent shew of sorrow commonly practised on the joyful occasion of succession. He ascended the throne on the 27th of March, 1625; and he shewed an extreme impatience to assemble the great council of the nation; indeed he would gladly, for the sake of dispatch, have called together the same parliament which had sitten under his father, and which lay at that time under prorogation. But being told that this measure would appear unusual, he issued writs for summoning a new parliament on the 7th of May; and it was not without regret that the arrival of the princess Henrietta, whom he had espoused by proxy (f), obliged him to delay, by repeated prorogations, their meeting till the 18th of June, when they assembled at Westminster for the dispatch of business. This young prince, unexperienced and impolitic, regarded as sincere all the praises and caresses with which he had been loaded, while active in procuring the rupture with the house of Austria. Beside labouring under great necessities, he hastened with alacrity to a period when he might receive the most undoubted testimony of the attachment of his subjects.

In his speech on this occasion Charles told the commons, "that he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel; and therefore there was no doubt but he would be a keeper and maintainer of the true religion." He represented to the parliament the necessity he thought he lay under to grant a large supply for carrying on the war in Germany. This was further urged by the lord-keeper Williams, who pointed out that the king's principal reason for calling the parliament was to remind them of the great engagements for the recovery of the Palatinate which had been imposed on his majesty by the late king his father, and by themselves, who broke off the treaties with Spain; to let them understand that the succeeding treaties and alliances, the armies sent into the Low Countries, the repairing of forts, and the fortifying of Ireland, did all meet in one centre, the Palatinate; and that the subsidies granted in the last parliament for these purposes were already spent, with as much more of the king's own revenue. Though the commons dwelt upon the grievances, which were yet unredressed, and demanded an account of the last money granted by parliament for the recovery of the Palatinate, yet the danger of keeping long together, (by reason of the plague which then raged, and which carried off more inhabitants than that which happened in the year 1603, at the accession of James,) and an unwillingness to give a total denial to the request of their young king, determined them to grant two subsidies, which amounted to one hundred and twelve thousand pounds. They then petitioned a recess from parliament, on account of the sickliness of the season: therefore they were adjourned, to meet on the first of August at Oxford.

It is evident from the smallness of their supply at a period so peculiarly interesting, that the commons had already entertained a strong jealousy of the present government, or that they perceived the same errors in Charles, that had given rise to the numerous grievances of the last reign; and they apprehended that the bad qualities of the son might be more active than the like vices were in the disposition of the father. No change had appeared in the administration since the death of James: Charles had the same favourite, the same council, the same ministers, and all the offices of the kingdom continued in the hands of Buckingham's creatures, whose favour with the late monarch had been little in comparison to what he enjoyed with the present. Charles, at his accession to the crown, found his coffers empty, a large debt upon his revenue, with the additional burthen of an expensive war. Notwithstanding these circumstances, he entertained the idea of subduing that spirit of liberty which had already formed a strong party in the nation, and of settling on firm foundations a more unlimited authority than had been practised by any of his predecessors.—Money was necessary for such an undertaking: this he imagined could be easily obtained from the commons, by the pretence of so popular a cause as the Palatine-war. But he had to deal with an assembly composed of individuals, aptly chosen for the important charge of defending the rights of humanity. It was with astonishment and indignation that they heard their king call upon them for the performance of engagements, the conditions of which had been notoriously violated by himself and father. It was well understood, that the commons of England had no national antipathy to Spain; tyranny, and its supporter popery, were the objects they engaged themselves to oppose; for this reason they had joined with the favourite in breaking the connections with that court. They now found that the zeal of Charles and Buckingham sprung from a particular pique towards Spain; that they had contracted an alliance with a court equally noxious, and from which more was to be apprehended on account of its vicinity; that the public appearance of priests in their vestments, and the dispensation of penal laws against recusants, realized the evils which they only apprehended from the Spanish match (g). Nor was it without a disdainful resentment that the commons found their understandings insulted by an unexperienced king, and a contemptible minister. The mean collusion practised by the crown in the last parliament, to obtain an extraordinary supply, and the bad management of its first military attempt, convinced the house that the ministry were not to be entrusted with so important a business as war; and the speech of the lord-keeper, which represented that not only the subsidies were already spent, but the revenue in debt, contributed to confirm them in this opinion.

But at the very time when Charles was pleading necessity to the commons, he was launching out into profuse expences: his ambassadors, Carlisle and Holland, were maintained at a great charge, to vie with the magnificence of the French; and the parade with which the queen was conducted home by Buckingham, suited rather the circumstances of an Eastern monarch, than those of a limited king.

The moderation the commons shewed this session, in circumstances thus provoking and interesting, is a remarkable instance of that policy, temper, and sagacity, with which the councils of this assembly were directed. But before their re-meeting at Oxford an incident had happened which would have rendered this moderation a base desertion of the particular interest of their country, and the more general cause of liberty and religion. The French ministry had cajoled James into a promise to furnish Louis with one ship of war and seven armed merchant-ships, to be employed against the Genoese. Buckingham, who was at this time warmly attached to the court of France, prevailed on Charles to lend these ships to be used at the siege of Rochelle, where they were to be filled with French soldiers and mariners, to be commanded by the duke de Montmorency (h). No sooner was this intention known than the whole crew were inflamed (i). Vice-admiral Pennington, who had received particular orders from the favourite, would not apprehend them as mutineers; notwithstanding repeated menaces and promises from the French, he refused to deliver up the ships, and sailed back to the Downs. The Rochellers were alarmed, and sent over agents to solicit their detention; but Charles, taking the whole affair upon himself, sent express orders to Pennington to deliver up his own ship, and all the merchant-ships, with their furniture, to the French king's ministers. Authority alone was not sufficient to engage the commanders in an action so repugnant to conscience and honour; Buckingham had recourse to art and deceit: a rumour was spread that peace had been concluded between the French king and his Protestant subjects. On the discovery of the fraud, the captains of the merchant-ships maintained that the king had no right to dispose of their property, and prepared to sail away; but Pennington, who could no longer plead a misunder-

(i) That race of men, who are at present both careless and ignorant in matters of religion, were at that time only ignorant. They drew up a remonstrance to Pennington their commander; and signing all their names in a circle, lest he should discover the ringleaders, they laid it under his prayer-book. Pennington declared he would rather be hanged in England for disobedience of orders, than fight against his brother Protestants in France.

standing of his orders, fired to bring them to (k). The brave sir Ferdinando Gorges broke through, and returned to England. The remaining ships were delivered to the French; all the officers and sailors, notwithstanding great offers were made them, immediately deserted; not an individual amongst a crew of that licentious class of men, one gunner excepted, was found dissolute enough to serve against their distressed brethren the French Hugonots. He was afterwards killed in charging a cannon before Rochelle: this just and opportune incident, though a frivolous one, gave satisfaction to the whole nation. This transaction entirely dissipated that fond popularity which every monarch obtains from the common people in the beginning of his government.

On the first of August, according to the appointed time of their adjournment, the parliament met at Oxford. The commons renewed their complaints against the illegal screening of recusants. Sir Edward Giles produced a list of six priests, for whom, he said, he had seen a pardon, bearing date July the twelfth, the very day after his majesty had, as well by his own mouth as by the lord-keeper's, vouchsafed to return them such an answer to a petition for the suppressing of popery, as gave them assurance for his performance thereof. This complaint, in a conference (l) between the two houses, was answered by Williams; who affirmed, that he had received the pardon long before its date, but that he had deferred sealing it, in hopes that on the departure of the ambassadors, it might have been stopped; but that he having received a second command, sealed it at the next general seal. Williams likewise added, "That he wished a petition might be presented to the king to stay the like pardons hereafter." Charles, seeing that the commons were engaged on the inexhaustible topic of grievances, without shewing any inclination to enter into the only business for which they had been summoned, sent for them to the great hall at Christ Church, where he again insisted on their engagements to give their utmost assistance towards the carrying on the war with vigour. Lord Conway and sir John Cook, the two secretaries, enlarged upon this subject; withal acquainting the houses of the past and present state of continental affairs, with the money the crown had already expended on the war; that the charges of an army had appeared in parliament to be seven hundred thousand pounds a-year; besides Ireland was to be fortified; the forts here repaired, and the navy reinstated. Then the lord-treasurer (m) added, that the late king, when he died, was indebted to the city of London one hundred and twenty thousand pounds besides interest; for Denmark and the Palatinate one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, for his wardrobe forty thousand pounds; that these debts lay upon his present majesty, who is indebted unto London seventy thousand pounds, that he hath laid out for his navy, and for count Mansfeldt forty thousand pounds, for mourning and funeral expences forty-two thousand pounds, for expences concerning the queen forty thousand pounds, and the navy would require to set it forth in the equipage that was requisite for the great design his majesty had in hand three hundred thousand pounds (n). When the house proceeded to take into consideration the king's speech, and the subsequent accounts, the officers of the crown alone moved for a supply; the rest of the assembly fell into high debates. Sir S. Weston moved to enquire into the cause of the supply desired, and the enemy against whom the preparations were destined; that the estates of the Papists who contributed to the enemy might be specially respected to supply the king. Sir Francis Seymour moved for a select committee to draw a petition to the king, comprehending the heads of those things which the house should think proper to inform him in. Sir Edward Coke urged, that the necessities of the crown came by improvidence; that there was a leak in the government, of which leak such as these were the causes: frauds in the customs, treaty about the Spanish match, new-invented offices with large fees, old unprofitable offices which the king might justly take away with the love of his people and his own honour, the presidentship of York and Wales, multiplicity of offices in one man, new tables kept in the king's household, made the leakage the greater, voluntary annuities and pensions, which ought to be stopped till the king was out of debt, and able to pay; lastly, that all unnecessary charges, costly diet, apparel, building, &c. increased the leakage; that understanding officers should be employed in the king's house to reduce it to its ancient form; that the great offices for the defence of the kingdom should be put into the hands of able men, that have experience, such as admiralty-places, and others.

Sir Nathaniel Rich said, "That they ought not to refuse to give; but before they gave to represent their wants to the king: first, for religion, to have his majesty's answer in full parliament, and then enrolled: next, to know the enemy against whom war was to be made; the necessity of an advised council for governing the great affairs of the kingdom; the necessity of looking into the king's revenue; to have his majesty's answer concerning impositions on wines: and though the time was not now fit for the decision of all these points, yet a select committee to be appointed to set down the heads of them, and then to have the king's answer to them in parliament. The doing of this, added he, is no capitulation with his majesty, but an ordinary parliamentary course, as in 22 Edward III. and without it the commonwealth can neither supply the king, nor subsist."

In this debate sir Robert Cotton made a long speech, in which he quoted the examples of past times to shew that want of œconomy in the crown had ever met with a severe censure from the parliament, and that those ministers who had helped to waste the public treasure had never escaped with impunity: "I am glad, concluded he, that we have neither just cause, nor undutiful dispositions, to appoint the king a council to redress those errors in parliament, as in the 42 Edward III. &c. &c. We only in loyal duty offer up our humble desires, that since his majesty hath, with advised judgement, elected wise, religious, and worthy servants, to attend him in his high employment, he will be pleased to advise with them together a way of remedy for those disasters in state brought on by long security and happy peace, and not to be led by young and single counsel."

Sir George More pressed for a committee; alleged that they were all bound in duty not to graft subsidy upon subsidy in one parliament. Sir George Goring moved that the duke of Buckingham might be of the committee to give satisfaction on any aspersions that might be cast upon him. Others argued against granting any supply before grievances were redressed; that the ordinary revenue ought to defray the ordinary expence of the crown; that the king ought to contribute to help the Palatinate's cause with his own estate; that the time of year was too far spent for the fleet to go out to service; that enquiry ought to be made whether the duke broke not the match with Spain out of spleen and malice to the condé Olivares, whether he made not the match with France upon harder terms, and whether the ships employed against Rochelle were not maintained with the subsidies given for the Palatinate (o)? that an enquiry be made to know by what counsels the present designs are begun, where the fleet is to go? and sir Robert Mansel (p) to give his opinion of the intended expedition. Many reflections past upon the miscarriages of the duke in his several offices (q). The resolutions of the house were, that religion should have the first place in their debates, next the kingdom's safety, and then supplies. In consequence of this resolution a long petition was sent up, setting forth the dangerous state of religion, and the remedies for the increasing evil. Charles gave a gracious answer to every clause of the petition, with large promises that all the grievances complained of should be redressed; and Buckingham, who imagined that the heat of opposition would be allayed by this condescension, made a long and florid speech, in which he represented the present state of the war, and answered the several objections which had been flung out by the commons. The lord-treasurer (r) then produced a paper in which he had set down the conditions of the king's estate;

(k) In a letter from secretary Conway he was commanded to use all forcible means to compel them, even to sinking.

(l) On this conference the commons ordered, "That, as the speaker and the whole house went up, if the lords kept bare, to do the same; if they covered, then the speaker and the rest to do the same." Parliam. Hist. vol. vi. p. 373.

(o) Some of these severe hints are only to be found in Rushworth; but there is no doubt of their having been made use of in parliament, as they are all noticed in the duke of Buckingham's long speech.

(p) Sir Robert Mansel was a sea-commander of reputation, and had been employed with success in the naval expeditions in James's time.

(q) It was complained that pirates infested the seas, and that the protection of commerce was neglected.

(r) To the objection that the eight ships lent to the French king were paid with the subsidy-money, and employed against the Rochellers, he answered estate; 1. his debts, 2. the estate the king now stands in, 3. how it will be for the future.

"His debts to the city of London, and some gentlemen, borrowed upon privy seals and lords bonds, were one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, to the wardrobe forty thousand pounds, to the king of Denmark seventy-five thousand pounds and the interest; arrears for pensions a large sum; to his household a large sum. The anticipations made by the late king before they were due came to fifty thousand pounds. His engagements were for the pay of six thousand foot in the Low Countries; of ten thousand foot under count Mansfeldt; and for the rigging, victualling, and providing the navy, not the like in the memory of this time. Concerning the estate of the king, as it now stands, his father's debts, anticipations, and engagements laid ill upon him; his own debts, as prince, came to seventy thousand pounds at the least. The king's estate, for the future, as in charges of continuance, consisted of ten articles: 1. of debts unpaid, and interest; 2. old anticipations, of fifty thousand pounds; 3. anticipations of new, two hundred thousand pounds taken up by himself; 4. to the king of Denmark thirty thousand pounds; 5. to count Mansfeldt twenty thousand pounds; 6. to the Dutch eight thousand pounds; 7. to Ireland two thousand six hundred pounds; 8. the queen's allowance and diet thirty-seven thousand pounds; 9. to the king and queen of Bohemia twenty thousand pounds per annum; 10. preparations for the defence of the realm, and seconding the navy."

After reading this account the lord-treasurer asserted, that certain sums were omitted because they were not yet calculated; that no total was cast up, because he had no auditor: he promised that himself or his subordinate officers should be ready to give satisfaction to all or any of the particulars. This minute detail demonstrated to the commons the folly of a Spanish war at this juncture; and, by exposing the extreme necessities of the crown, pointed out the favourable opportunity of limiting the exorbitant power it had assumed, by constitutional methods. They had shewn great satisfaction at the king's answer to their petition on religious grievances; yet, in the essential matter of supply, they were so little swayed by empty promises, that though Charles condescended to ask two-fifteenths, the value of forty thousand pounds, the commons peremptorily refused to set so bad a precedent as to give twice in one session of parliament. Sir Robert Philips said, that the arguments for giving were honour, necessity, and safety, not honourable actions grounded upon sound counsels; that necessity had been the continual argument for supply in all parliaments. Sir Francis Seymour said, it was strange that the commons should be called together only for a supply of forty thousand pounds; it shewed the king's necessities; that one hundred and forty thousand pounds had been raised by places of honour sold, places of justice were sold, and serjeant places sold. Sir Thomas Wentworth said, he feared the passing of this precedent for so small a sum was to take advantage of it for a greater hereafter. Mr. Rolle argued, that if the necessity of money was so great, now was the time to press for a redress of grievances. Sir Edward Coke quoted precedents of punishment inflicted on evil counsellors; said, it was malum consilium to press more subsidies, when two had been already given; and added, that he would rather give one thousand out of his own estate, than to grant any subsidy now.

On the day after this debate, the house went upon a complaint against Sir Francis Stewart, an admiral, for suffering a pirate to take an English ship before his face; that to some merchants, who had desired him to go out and chace the pirate, he answered, his commission was not to go on the French coast, where he conceived the pirate lay; that in conclusion, though he was offered great sums of money, or half the goods in the ship, he still refused to go. On this report sir Francis Seymour said, that the lord-admiral Buckingham had the care of these things, therefore the default must needs be in him and his agents, and moved for a committee to consider of the causes thereof, and where the default lay. Mr. Lister mentioned the wrongs done to the English trade by Dunkirkers; and therefore moved, that the committee to be appointed, might in a general way consider of this, and the safety of all the sea ports. This being agreed to, a committee of the whole house was appointed to take these matters into consideration, and they to have power to name a sub-committee.

The nation was but little accustomed at that time to the burden of taxes, and had never opened their purses in any degree for supporting their sovereign. Even Elizabeth, notwithstanding her vigour and frugality, and the necessary wars in which she was engaged, had reason to complain of the commons in this particular; nor could the authority of that princess, which was otherwise almost absolute, ever extort from them the requisite supplies. The sinking likewise of the value of subsidies was a loss to the king; but the parliament would not augment their number in the same proportion.

The puritanical party, though disguised, had a great authority over the kingdom; and many of the leaders among the commons had secretly embraced the tenets of that sect. All these were disgusted with the court, both by the prevalence of the principles of civil liberty essential to their party; and on account of the restraint under which they were held by the established hierarchy. In order to fortify himself against the resentment of James, Buckingham had affected popularity, and entered into the cabals of the Puritans; but being secure of the confidence of Charles, he had since abandoned this party; and was therefore the more exposed to their hatred and resentment. Though the religious schemes of many of the Puritans appeared of little moment, we are not thence to imagine that they were pursued by none but persons of weak understandings. Some men of the greatest parts and most extensive knowledge that the nation at this time produced, could not enjoy any peace of mind, because obliged to hear prayers offered up to the Divinity by a priest covered with a white linen vestment.

To these and other causes we must yet add another of considerable moment. The house of commons, we may observe, was almost entirely governed by a set of men of the most uncommon capacity and the largest views: men who were now formed into a regular party, and united, as well by fixed aims and projects, as by the hardships which some of them had undergone in prosecution of them. Among these, we may mention the names of sir Edward Coke, sir Edwin Sandys, sir Robert Philips, sir Francis Seymour, sir Dudley Digges, sir John Elliot, sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Selden, and Mr. Pym. Animated with a warm regard to liberty, these generous patriots saw with regret an unbounded power exercised by the crown, and were resolved to seize the opportunity which the king's necessities offered them, of reducing the prerogative within more reasonable compass. Though their ancestors had blindly given way to practices and precedents favourable to kingly power, and had been able, notwithstanding, to preserve some small remains of liberty; it would be impossible, they thought, when all these pretensions were methodized and prosecuted by the increasing knowledge of the age, to maintain any shadow of popular government, in opposition to such unlimited authority in the sovereign. It was necessary to fix a choice: either to abandon entirely the privileges of the people, or to secure them by firmer and more precise barriers than the constitution had hitherto provided for them. In this dilemma, men of such aspiring geniuses and such independent fortunes could not long deliberate: they boldly embraced the side of freedom, and resolved to grant no supplies to their necessitous prince without extorting concessions in favour of civil liberty. The end, they esteemed beneficent and noble: the means, regular and constitutional. To grant or refuse supplies was the undoubted privilege of the commons. And as all human governments, particularly those of a mixed frame, are in continual fluctuation, it was as natural in their opinion, and allowable, for popular assemblies to take advantage of favourable incidents, in order to secure the subject; as for monarchs, in order to extend their own authority. With pleasure they beheld the king involved in a foreign war, which rendered him every day more dependent on the parliament; while at the same time the situation of the kingdom, even without any military preparations, gave it sufficient security against all invasion from foreigners.

However natural all these sentiments might appear to the country-party, it is not to be supposed that Charles answered, "That those eight ships were maintained at the charge of the French king;" and added, "It is not always fit for kings to give account of their councils;—judge the thing by the event." This answer, which owns that both courts were in the secret that the ships were to serve against Rochelle, greatly inflamed the resentment the commons had conceived against the ministry.

would entertain the same ideas. Strongly prejudiced in favour of the duke, whom he had heard so highly extolled in parliament, he could not conjecture the cause of so sudden an alteration in their opinions. And when the war which they themselves had so earnestly solicited, was at last commenced, the immediate desertion of their sovereign could not but seem very unaccountable. Even though no farther motive had been suspected, the refusal of supply in such circumstances would naturally to him appear cruel and deceitful: but when he perceived that this measure proceeded from an intention of incroaching on his authority, he failed not to regard these claims as highly criminal and traitorous. Those lofty ideas of monarchical power which were very commonly adopted during that age, and to which the ambiguous nature of the English constitution gave so plausible an appearance, were firmly riveted in Charles: and, however moderate his temper, the natural and unavoidable prepossessions of self-love, joined to the late uniform precedents in favour of prerogative, had made him regard his political tenets as certain and uncontroverted. Taught to consider even the ancient laws and constitution more as lines to direct his conduct, than barriers to withstand his power; a conspiracy to erect new ramparts in order to straiten his authority appeared but one degree removed from open sedition and rebellion.

The extreme rage against popery was a sure characteristic of puritanism. The house of commons discovered other infallible symptoms of the prevalence of that party. They petitioned the king for replacing such able clergy as had been silenced for want of conformity to the ceremonies. They also erected laws for the strict observance of Sunday.

Charles, understanding at length by the arguments and resolutions adopted by the house, that is, was determined not to grant him any fresh supply without an effectual reformation in the government, he with a rash impetuosity dissolved the parliament, adding thereby to the distaste of the people, who were before strongly disgusted with his unpopular management. The commons, who had been made acquainted with the intentions of the court, formed themselves into a grand committee, and before they would suffer the king's messenger to be introduced, drew up a protestation of their honest alacrity to do their utmost endeavour to discover and reform the abuses of the state, and in like sort to afford all necessary supply to the just occasions and designs of the crown.

A prosecution against one Montague, a court chaplain, had been pursued by the commons this parliament with some eagerness. The business appeared of a trifling nature, but it carried with it some important consequences that sufficiently justify the warmth with which it was pursued. Montague had published a book tending to Arminianism; for which he had been rewarded by court-preferment, notwithstanding the parliament, in the latter end of James's reign, had questioned his conduct, and afterwards referred it to the archbishop of Canterbury, from whom he had received an admonition. Montague, who now found himself powerfully protected, published another book, filled with the same doctrines, and entitled, "An Appeal to Cæsar." For this contempt of the former censure of the house he was re-questioned, and ordered to give bail of two thousand pounds for his appearance at the next session. Charles interfered, and pleaded an exemption for Montague, as being his chaplain in ordinary, and therefore asserted that the house had no right to molest him. This gave vigour to the fire already kindled, which would have terminated in an impeachment, if the business had not been diverted by the prosecution of a more glaring and more pernicious offender.

Though the Arminian tenets had in them no natural relation to high-church or monarchical principles (s), yet being repugnant to neither, the same political end, viz. screening themselves under the protection of party, which had forced them to an union with the republicans of Holland, connected them closely to the abettors of arbitrary power in England; and they became the warmest partizans for tyrannical principles in church and state. As such, they were always treated with animosity by the adverse faction, and the pretensions of Charles to exempt the individuals in his service from the national jurisdiction, turned the particular case of Montague to a dispute of importance. The bishops had also interfered in this cause, representing it as an affair that the king alone, by his delegates, had a right to judge of, and that matters of differences in the church ought only to be determined by the king and the bishops (t). The only circumstance that carries the appearance of an unjustifiable exertion in the commons in these prosecutions, is the tyrannical restraint they seemed desirous to lay on literature. But it must be considered that the freedom of the press, necessary to the existence of liberty, was a privilege unknown in this age; and whilst the crown possessed the power of suppressing the publication of every argument that clashed with its pretensions, the commons endeavoured to attain the same means of circumscribing the venomous doctrine broached by its creatures and dependants.

Before the dissolution of the parliament, the plague had already infected the city of Oxford, and there was great murmuring that the court should bring them together in so sickly a season, when its avowed design was only to extort money from the subject. The commons had expressed great sense of their danger at the session at Westminster, and it was remarked in the house, that the bell was tolling every minute that they were speaking. Strong as were these apprehensions, the patriot members kept their ground, and with exemplary resolution gave so constant an attendance that their antagonists could never obtain the advantages of an undefended cause, or a scattered party.

To supply the want of parliamentary aids, Charles issued privy-seals, on the 12th of August, for borrowing money from his subjects. The advantage reaped by this expedient was a small compensation for the disgust which it occasioned: by means, however, of that supply, and by other expedients, he was enabled to equip his fleet about the beginning of October. It consisted of eighty vessels great and small; and carried on board an army of ten thousand men. Sir Edward Cecil, lately created viscount Wimbleton, was intrusted with the command. He sailed immediately for Cadiz, and found the bay full of Spanish ships of great value. He either neglected to attack these ships, or attempted it preposterously. The army was landed and a fort taken: but the undisciplined soldiers, finding store of wine, could not be restrained from the utmost excesses. Farther stay appearing fruitless, they were reimbarked; and the fleet put to sea with an intention of intercepting the Spanish galleons. But the plague having seized the seamen and soldiers (u), they were obliged to abandon all hopes of this prize, and they returned to England in November. Loud complaints were made against the court for intrusting so important a command to a man like Cecil, whom, though he possessed great experience, the people, judging by the event, esteemed of slender capacity.

Charles, having failed of so rich a prize, was obliged again to have recourse to a parliament, which he summoned to meet in the beginning of 1626. Though the ill success of his enterprizes diminished his authority, and showed every day more plainly the imprudence of the Spanish war; though the increase of his necessities rendered him more dependent, and more exposed to the encroachments of the commons; he was resolved to try once more that regular and constitutional expedient for supply. Perhaps too, a little political art, which at that time he practised, was much trusted to. He had named four popular leaders, sheriffs of counties; sir Edward Coke, sir Robert Philips, sir Thomas Wentworth, and sir Francis Seymour; and, though the question had been formerly much contested (v), he thought that he had by that means incapacitated them from being elected members. But his intention

intention being so evident, rather put the commons more upon their guard. Enough of patriots still remained to keep up the ill humour of the house; and men needed but little rhetoric to recommend to them practices which increased their own importance and consideration. The weakness of the court also could not more evidently appear than by its being reduced to use so ineffectual an expedient, in order to obtain an influence over the commons.

The views of the last parliament were immediately adopted; as if the same men had been every where elected, and no time had intervened since their meeting. When on the 6th of February the king laid before the house his necessities, and requested a supply, they immediately voted him three subsidies and three fifteenths; and though they afterwards added one subsidy more, the sum was little proportioned to the urgency of the occasion, and ill fitted to promote those views of success and glory for which the young prince in his first enterprize so ardently wished. But this circumstance was not the most disagreeable one. The supply was only voted by the commons. The passing of that vote into a law was reserved till the end of the session (w). A condition was thereby made, in a very undisguised manner, with their sovereign. Under colour of redressing grievances they were to proceed in regulating and controlling every part of government which displeased them: and if the king either curtailed them in this undertaking, or refused compliance with their demands, he must not expect any supply from the commons. Great dissatisfaction was expressed by Charles at this treatment; which he deemed harsh and undutiful (x). But his necessities obliged him to submit.

The duke of Buckingham, formerly hateful to the public, became every day more unpopular, by the symptoms which appeared both of his want of temper and prudence, and of the uncontrolled ascendency which he had acquired over his master (y). Two violent attacks he was obliged this session to sustain; one from the earl of Bristol, another from the house of commons.

So long as James lived, Bristol, secure of the concealed favour of that monarch, had expressed all duty and obedience; in expectation that an opportunity would offer of re-instating himself in his former credit and authority. Even after Charles's accession, he despaired not. He submitted to the king's commands of remaining at his country-seat, and of absenting himself from parliament. Many trials he made to regain the good opinion of his master; but finding them all fruitless, and observing Charles to be entirely governed by his favourite Buckingham, his implacable enemy, he resolved no longer to keep any measures with the court. A new spirit, he perceived, and a new power, was arising in the nation; and to these he was determined for the future to trust for his security and protection.

When the parliament was summoned, Charles, by a stretch of prerogative, had given orders that no writ, as is customary, should be sent to Bristol. That nobleman applied to the house of lords by petition; and craved their good offices with the king for obtaining what was his due as a peer of the realm. His writ was sent him, but accompanied with a letter from the lord-keeper, sir Thomas Coventry, commanding him in the king's name to absent himself from parliament. This letter Bristol conveyed to the lords, and asked advice how to proceed in so delicate a situation. The king's prohibition was withdrawn, and Bristol took his seat. Provoked at these repeated instances of vigour, which the court denominated contumacy, Charles ordered his attorney-general to enter an accusation of high treason against him. By way of recrimination, Bristol accused Buckingham of high treason. Both the earl's defence of himself and accusation of the duke remain; and, together with some original letters still extant, contain the fullest and most authentic account of all the negociations with the house of Austria. From the whole, the great imprudence of the duke evidently appears, and the sway of his ungovernable passions.

The house, after having voted upon some queries of Dr. Turner's, "that common fame was a sufficient ground of accusation by the commons," proceeded to frame regular articles against Buckingham. They accused him of having united many offices in his person; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the seas, insomuch that many merchant-ships had fallen into the hands of the enemy; of delivering ships to the French king in order to serve against the Hugonots; of being employed in the sale of honours and offices; of accepting extensive grants from the crown; of procuring many titles of honour for his kindred; and of administering physic to the late king without acquainting his physicians. A material charge against him was, that he had extorted a sum of ten thousand pounds from the East-India company, and that he had confiscated some goods belonging to French merchants, on pretence of their being the property of Spanish. The impeachment never came to a full determination; so that it is difficult for us to give a decisive opinion with regard to these articles.

It is remarkable that the commons never adopted Bristol's accusation, or impeached the duke for his conduct in the Spanish treaty, the most blameable circumstance in his whole life. He had reason to believe the Spaniards sincere in their professions; yet, in order to gratify his private passions, he had hurried his master and his country into a war pernicious to the interests of both. But so riveted throughout the nation were the prejudices with regard to Spanish deceit and falsehood, that very few of the commons seem as yet to have been convinced that they had been seduced by Buckingham's narrative.

While the commons were warmly engaged against Buckingham, the king seemed desirous of embracing every opportunity by which he could express a contempt and disregard for them. No one was at that time sufficiently sensible of the great weight which the commons bore in the balance of the constitution. The history of England had never hitherto afforded one instance where any great movement or revolution had proceeded from the lower house; and as their rank, both considered in a body and as individuals, was but the second in the kingdom, nothing less than fatal experience could engage the English princes to pay a due regard to the inclinations of that formidable assembly.

About this time died the earl of Suffolk, chancellor of the university of Cambridge, and Buckingham, though lying under impeachment, was, by means of court-interest, chosen in his place. The commons resented and loudly complained of this affront; and the more to enrage them, the king himself wrote a letter to the university, extolling the duke, and giving them thanks for his election.

The lord keeper, in the king's name, expressly commanded the house not to meddle with his minister and servant, Buckingham; and ordered them to finish, in a few days, the bill which they had begun for the subsidies, and to make some addition to them; otherwise they must not expect to sit any longer. And though these harsh commands were endeavoured to be explained and mollified, a few days after, by a speech of Buckingham's, they failed not to leave a disagreeable impression behind them.

Besides a more stately style, which Charles in general affected to this parliament than to the last, he went so far in a message, as to threaten the commons, that if they did not furnish him with supplies, he should be obliged to try new counsels. This language was sufficiently clear; yet, lest any ambiguity should remain, sir Dudley Carleton, vice-chamberlain, took care to explain it. "I pray you consider," said he, "what these new counsels are or may be. I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all Christian kingdoms, you know that parliaments were in use anciently, by which those kingdoms were governed in a most flourishing manner; until the monarchs began to know their own strength, and seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length they by little and little began to stand on their prerogatives, and at last overthrew the parliaments, throughout Christendom, except here only with us.——Let us be careful then to preserve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth such happiness to this nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between his majesty and the commons; lest we lose the repute of a free people by our turbulency in parliament." These imprudent suggestions rather gave warning than struck terror. A precarious liberty, the commons thought, which was to be preserved by unlimited complaisance, was no liberty at all: and it was necessary, while yet in their power, to secure the constitution by (w) Journ. 27 March, 1626.

(y) His credit with the king had given him such influence, that he had no less than twenty proxies granted him this parliament by so many peers; which occasioned a vote, that no peers should have above two proxies. The earl of Leicester in 1585 had once ten proxies. D'Ewes, p. 314.

such invincible barriers, that no king or minister should ever, for the future, dare to speak such a language to any parliament, or even entertain such a project against them.

Two members of the house, sir Dudley Digges and sir John Elliott, who had been employed as managers of the impeachment against the duke of Buckingham, were thrown into prison. The commons immediately declared, that they would proceed no farther upon business, till they had satisfaction in their privileges. Charles alleged, as the reason for his adopting this measure, certain seditious expressions, which, he said, had, in their accusation of the duke, dropped from these members. Upon inquiry it appeared that no such expressions had been used. The members were released, and the king reaped no other benefit from this attempt than to exasperate the house still farther, and to show some degree of precipitancy and indiscretion.

Moved by this example, the house of peers were roused from their inactivity; and claimed liberty for the earl of Arundel, who had been lately confined in the Tower. After many fruitless evasions, the king, though somewhat ungracefully, was obliged to comply: and in this incident it sufficiently appeared, that the lords, how little so ever inclined to popular courses, were not wanting in a just sense of their own dignity.

The ill humour of the commons, thus wantonly irritated by the court, and finding no gratification in the legal impeachment of Buckingham, sought other objects on which it might exert itself. The never-failing cry of popery here served them instead. They again claimed the execution of the penal laws against Catholics; and they presented to the king a list of persons entrusted with offices, who were either convicted or suspected recusants (z). In this particular, they had, perhaps, some reason to blame the king's conduct. He had promised to the last house of commons a redress of this religious grievance; but he was apt, in imitation of his father, to imagine that the parliament, when they failed of supplying his necessities, had, on their part, freed him from the obligation of a strict performance. A new odium, was likewise attempted to be thrown upon Buckingham. His mother, who had great influence over him, was a professed Catholic; his wife was not free from suspicion; and the indulgence given to Catholics was of course supposed to proceed entirely from his credit and authority.

It is remarkable, that persecution was here chiefly pushed on by laymen; and that the church was willing to have granted more liberty than would be allowed by the commons. The reconciling doctrines likewise of Montague failed not anew to meet with severe censures from that zealous assembly (a).

The next attack made by the commons, had it prevailed, would have proved decisive. They were preparing a remonstrance against the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament. This article, together with the new impositions laid on merchandize by James, constituted nearly half of the crown revenues; and by depriving the king of these resources, they would have reduced him to total subjection and dependence. While they retained such a pledge, besides the supply already promised, they were sure that nothing could be refused them. Though after canvassing the matter nearly three months, they found themselves incapable of fixing any legal crime upon the duke, they regarded him as an unable and perhaps a dangerous minister; and they presented a petition for removing him from his majesty's person and councils.

The king was alarmed at the yoke which he saw prepared for him. Buckingham's sole guilt, he thought, was the being his friend and favourite. All the other complaints against him he looked upon as mere pretences.—He therefore determined immediately to dissolve the parliament. When this resolution was known, the house of peers, whose compliant behaviour intitled them to some authority with him, endeavoured to interpose; and they petitioned him, that he would allow the parliament to sit some time longer. "Not a moment longer," cried the king hastily; and he soon after ended the session by a dissolution.

As this measure was foreseen, the commons finished and dispersed their remonstrance, which they intended as a justification of their conduct to the people. The king, likewise, on his part, published a declaration, on the 15th of June, in which he gave the reasons of his disagreement with the parliament, and of their sudden dissolution, before they had time to conclude any one act. These papers furnished the partizans on both sides with ample matter of apology or of recrimination. But all impartial men judged "That the commons, though they had not as yet violated any law, yet, by their unpliableness and independence, were insensibly changing, perhaps improving, the spirit and genius, while they preserved the forms of the constitution: and that the king was acting altogether without any plan; running on in a road surrounded on all sides with the most dangerous precipices, and concerting no proper measures, either for submitting to the obstinacy of the commons, or for subduing it."

After a breach with the parliament, which seemed so difficult to repair, the only rational council which Charles could pursue, was, immediately to conclude a peace with Spain, and to render himself, as far as possible, independent of his people, who discovered so little inclination to support him, or rather who seem to have formed a determined resolution to abridge his authority. Nothing could be more easy in the execution than this measure, nor more agreeable to his own and to national interest. But, besides the treaties and engagements which he had entered into with Holland and Denmark, the king's thoughts were at this time averse to pacific counsels. There are some circumstances in Charles's character, seemingly incompatible, which attended him during the whole course of his reign, and were in part the cause of his misfortunes: he was extremely obstinate in his purposes; but the means of attaining them he readily received from his ministers and favourites, though not always fortunate in his choice. The violent, impetuous Buckingham, inflamed with a desire of revenge for injuries which himself had committed, and animated with a love of glory which he had not talents to merit, had at this time, notwithstanding his profuse licentious life, acquired an invincible ascendant over the king.

The new counsels, which Charles had mentioned to the parliament, were now to be tried, in order to supply his necessities. Had he possessed any military force, on which he could rely, it is not improbable, that he had at once taken off the mask, and governed without any regard to parliamentary privileges: so high an idea had he received of kingly prerogative, and so contemptible a notion of the rights of those popular assemblies, from which he thought he had met with such ill usage. But his army was new levied, ill paid, and worse disciplined; no-wise superior to the militia, who were much more numerous, and who were in a great measure under the influence of the country gentlemen. It behoved him, therefore, to proceed cautiously, and to cover his designs under the pretence of ancient precedents, which, considering the great authority commonly enjoyed by his predecessors, could not be wanting to him.

A commission was openly granted, to the archbishop of York and others, to compound with the Catholics, and agree for dispensing with the penal laws enacted against them. By this expedient, the king both filled his coffers, and gratified his inclination of giving indulgence to these religionists: but he could not have employed any branch of prerogative, which would have been more disagreeable, or would have appeared more exceptionable, to his Protestant subjects.

From the nobility he desired assistance; from the city he required a loan of one hundred thousand pounds. The former contributed slowly: but the latter, covering themselves under many pretences and excuses, gave him at last a determined refusal.

In order to equip a fleet, a distribution, by order of council (b), was made to all the maritime towns; and each of them was required, with the assistance of the adjacent counties, to arm so many vessels as were appointed them. The city of London was rated at twenty ships. This is the first appearance in Charles's reign, of ship-money; a taxation which had once been imposed by Elizabeth, but which afterwards, when carried some steps farther by Charles, created such violent discontents.

Of some loans were required: to others the way of benevolence was proposed: methods supported by precedent, but always invidious, even in times more submissive and compliant. In the most absolute governments such expedients would be regarded as irregular and unequal (c).

These counsels for supply were conducted with some moderation; till news arrived that a great battle was fought on the 25th of August, between the king of Denmark and count Tilly, the Imperial general; in which the former was totally defeated, with the loss of six thousand men. Money now, more than ever, became necessary, in order to repair so great a breach in the alliance, and to support a prince who was so nearly allied to Charles, and who had been engaged in the war chiefly by the intrigues, solicitations, and promises of the English monarch. After some deliberation, an act of council was passed, importing, that as the urgency of affairs admitted not the way of parliament, the most speedy, equal, and convenient method of supply was by a GENERAL LOAN from the subject, according as every man was assessed in the rolls of the last subsidy. That precise sum was required which each would have paid, had the vote of four subsidies passed into a law; but care was taken to inform the people, that the sums exacted were not to be called subsidies, but loans. Had any doubt remained, whether forced loans, however authorized by precedent, and even by statute, were a violation of liberty, and must, by necessary consequence, render all parliaments superfluous; this was the proper expedient for opening the eyes of the whole nation. The example of Henry VIII. who had once, in his arbitrary reign, practised a like method of levying a regular supply, was generally deemed a very insufficient authority. The commissioners appointed to levy these loans, among other articles of secret instructions, were enjoined, "That they treat apart with every one of those that are to lend, and not in the presence or hearing of any other, unless they see cause to the contrary; and if any shall refuse to lend, and shall make delays and excuses, that they examine such persons upon oath whether they have been dealt withal to refuse to lend, or make an excuse for not lending? who hath dealt so with them? and what speeches he or they have used tending to that purpose? and that they shall also charge every such person, in his majesty's name, upon his allegiance, not to disclose to any other what his answer was. That they endeavour to discover whether any, publicly or underhand, be workers or persuaders of others to dissent from this course, or hinder the good disposition of others; and that, as much as they may, they hinder all discourse about it; and certify to the privy council in writing the names, qualities, and dwelling places of all such refractory persons, with all speed, and especially if they shall discover any combination or confederacy against these proceedings." So violent an inquisitorial power, so impracticable an attempt at secrecy, were the objects of indignation, and even, in some degree, of ridicule.

But that the people might learn to kiss the rod of power with devotion, and, becoming slaves by principle, reverence the yoke, priests were instructed to teach speculative despotism, and graft on religious affections systems of civil tyranny. The following passages are in two sermons that Manwaring, a court chaplain, preached before Charles: "That the king is not bound to observe the laws of the realm concerning the subjects' rights and liberties; but that his royal will and command in imposing loans and taxes, without common consent in parliament, doth oblige the subjects' conscience, upon pain of eternal damnation: that those who refused to pay the required loan offended against the law of God, and the king's supreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, and rebellion: that the authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of aids and subsidies; and that the slow proceedings of such great assemblies are not fitted for the supply of the state's urgent necessities, but would rather produce sundry impediments to the just designs of princes." At the same time Sibthorpe, an officious time-serving ecclesiastic, published a sermon he had preached at Northampton, entitled, "Apostolic Obedience." It breathes a higher strain than those of Manwaring; viz. "That the prince, who is the head, makes his court and council; it is his duty to direct and make laws; he doth whatsoever pleases him, and who may say unto him, What dost thou? If princes command any thing which subjects may not perform, because it is against the laws of God, or of nature, or IMPOSSIBLE, yet subjects are bound to undergo the punishment, without either resistance, or railing, or reviling, and so to yield a passive obedience where they cannot exhibit an active one; and I know no other case, said the preacher, but one of those three wherein a subject may excuse himself with passive obedience; in all others he is bound to active obedience." These sermons were, by the court, industriously spread over the kingdom. Passive obedience was recommended in its full extent, the whole authority of the state was represented as belonging to the king alone, and all limitations of law and a constitution were rejected as seditious and impious. So openly was this doctrine espoused by the court, that archbishop Abbot, a popular and virtuous prelate, was, because he refused to licence Sibthorpe's sermon, suspended from the exercise of his office, banished from his jurisdiction, and confined to one of his country seats in Kent. Abbot's principles of liberty, and his opposition to Buckingham, had always rendered him very ungracious at court, and had acquired him the character of a Puritan. For this party made the privileges of the nation as much a part of their creed, as the church party did the prerogatives of the crown; and nothing tended farther to recommend among the people the whole system and all the principles of that sect. The king soon found, by fatal experience, that this engine of religion, which with so little necessity was introduced into politics, falling under more fortunate management, was played with the most terrible success against him.

While the king, instigated by anger and necessity, employed the whole extent of his prerogative, the spirit of the people was far from being subdued. Throughout England, many refused these loans; some were even active in encouraging their neighbours to insist upon their common rights and privileges. By warrant of the council these were thrown into prison. Most of them with patience submitted to confinement, or applied by petition to the king, who commonly released them. Five gentlemen alone, sir Thomas Darnel, sir John Corbet, sir Walter Earl, sir John Heveningham, and sir Edmond Hambden, had spirit enough, at their own hazard and expence, to defend the public liberties, and to demand releasement, not as a favour from the court, but as their due, by the laws of their country. No particular cause was assigned for their commitment. The special command alone of the king and council was pleaded; and it was asserted, that, by law, this was not sufficient reason for refusing bail or releasement to the prisoners. This question, whether a subject could be confined by the special command of the king, without assigning the cause, was brought to a solemn trial before the king's bench, in November; and the whole kingdom was attentive to the issue of a cause, which was of much greater consequence than the event of many battles. The council for the prisoners were Noy, Selden, Bramston, and Colthorp.

By the debates on this subject it appeared, beyond controversy, to the nation, that their ancestors had been so jealous of personal liberty, as to secure it against arbitrary power in the crown, by six (d) several statutes, and by an article (e) of the GREAT CHARTER itself, the most sacred foundation of the laws and constitution. But the kings of England, who had not been able to prevent the enacting of these laws, had sufficient authority, when the tide of liberty was spent, to obstruct their regular execution; and they deemed it superfluous to attempt the formal repeal of statutes which they found so many expedients and pretences to elude. In turbulent and seditious times, by the genius of the old constitution, the prince, of himself, was accustomed to assume every branch of prerogative, which he thought necessary for the preservation of public peace and his own authority. Expediency at other times would cover itself under the appearance of necessity; and, in proportion as precedents multiplied, the will alone of the sovereign was sufficient to supply the place of expediency, of which he constituted himself the sole judge. Though rebellious subjects had frequently, in the open field, resisted the king's authority; no person had been found so bold, while confined and at mercy, as to set himself in opposition to regal power, and to claim the protection of the constitution against the will of the sovereign. It was not till this age, when the spirit of liberty was universally diffused, when the principles of government were nearly reduced to a system, when the tempers of men, more civilized, seemed less to require those violent exertions of prerogative, that the five gentlemen above mentioned, by a noble effort, ventured, in this national cause, to bring the question to a final determination. And the king was astonished to observe, that a power, exercised by his predecessors, almost without interruption, was found, upon trial, to be directly opposite to the clearest laws, and supported by few undoubted precedents in courts of judicature. These had scarcely, in any instance, refused bail upon commitments by special command of the king; because the persons committed had seldom or never dared to demand it, at least to insist on their demand.

(c) Among other expedients practised by the ministry to raise money, the crown lands were granted to be holden in fee-farm; a measure ruinous to the future interests of the sovereign. But this consideration had no weight with Charles; he had projected schemes to destroy the right of meum and tuum throughout the land, and to subject the whole property of the subjects to the disposal of the crown.

Sir Randolf Carew, chief justice, had been displaced, as unfit for the purposes of the court: sir Nicholas Hyde, esteemed more obsequious, had obtained that high office, in the beginning of 1627: yet the judges, by the king's direction, went no farther than to remand the gentlemen to prison, and refuse the bail which was offered. Heathe, the attorney-general, insisted, that the court, in imitation of the judges in the 34th of Elizabeth, should enter a general judgement, that no bail could be granted, upon a commitment by the king or council. But the judges wisely declined complying. The nation, they saw, was already to the last degree exasperated. In the present disposition of men's minds, universal complaints prevailed, as if the kingdom were reduced to slavery. And the most invidious prerogative of the crown, it was said, that of imprisoning the subject, is here openly and solemnly, and in numerous instances, exercised for the most invidious purpose; in order to extort loans, or rather subsidies, without consent of parliament.

But this was not the only hardship of which the nation then thought they had reason to complain. The army, which had made the fruitless expedition to Cadiz, was dispersed throughout the kingdom; and money was levied upon the counties for the payment of their quarters. The soldiers were billeted upon private houses, contrary to custom, which required that, in all ordinary cases, they should be quartered in inns and public houses. Those who had refused or delayed the loan, were sure to be loaded with a great number of these dangerous and disorderly guests. Many too, of low condition, who had shown a refractory disposition, were pressed into the service, and inlisted in the fleet or army. Sir Peter Hayman, for the same reason, was dispatched on an errand to the Palatinate. Glanville, an eminent lawyer, had been obliged, during the former interval of parliament, to accept of an office in the navy, which obliged him to go on the expedition to Cadiz, to the great detriment of his fortune.

The soldiers, ill paid and undisciplined, committed many crimes and outrages, such as robberies, rapes, and even murders, which much increased the public discontents. To prevent these disorders, martial law was exercised upon the soldiers. By a contradiction, which is natural when the people are exasperated, the outrages of the army were complained of; the remedy was thought still more intolerable. Though the expediency of martial law, had formerly been deemed, of itself, a sufficient ground for establishing it; men, now become more jealous of liberty, and more refined reasoners in questions of government, regarded as illegal and arbitrary, every exercise of authority which was not supported by express statute or uninterrupted precedent.

It may safely be affirmed, that, except a few courtiers or ecclesiastics, the whole nation were displeased with this high exertion of prerogative, and this new spirit of administration. Though ancient precedents were pleaded in favour of the king's measures; a considerable difference, upon comparison, was observed between the cases. Acts of power, however irregular, might casually, and at intervals, be exercised by a prince, for the sake of dispatch or expediency; and yet liberty still subsist in some tolerable degree under his administration. But where all these were reduced into a system, were exerted without interruption, were studiously sought for, in order to supply the place of laws, and subdue the refractory spirit of the nation, it was necessary to find some speedy remedy, or finally to abandon all hopes of preserving the freedom of the constitution. Nor did moderate men esteem the provocation which the king had received sufficient to warrant these violent measures. The commons, as yet, had by no means invaded his authority: they had only exercised, as best pleased them, their own privileges. Was he justifiable, because from one house of parliament he had met with unkind treatment, to make in revenge an invasion on the rights and liberties of the whole nation?

Great was the surprize of all men at this time, when Charles, baffled in every attempt against the Austrian dominions, embroiled with his own subjects, unsupplied with any treasure but what he extorted by the most invidious and most dangerous measures; as if the half of Europe, now his enemy, were not sufficient for the exercise of military prowess; wantonly, in 1627, attacked France, the other great kingdom in his neighbourhood, and engaged at once in war against these two powers, whose interests were hitherto deemed so incompatible, that they could never, it was thought, agree either in the same friendships or enmities. All authentic memoirs, both foreign and domestic, ascribe to Buckingham's counsels this war with France, and represent him as actuated by motives the most despicable, which would appear incredible, were we not acquainted with the violence and temerity of his character.

The three great monarchies of Europe were at this time ruled by young princes, Philip, Louis, and Charles, who were nearly of the same age, and who had resigned the government of themselves, and of their kingdoms, to their creatures and ministers, Olivarez, Richelieu, and Buckingham. The people, whom the moderate temper or narrow genius of their princes would have allowed to remain for ever in tranquillity, were strongly agitated by the emulation and jealousy of the ministers. Above all, the towering spirit of Richelieu, incapable of rest, promised an active age, and gave indications of great revolutions throughout all Europe.

Cardinal Richelieu had no sooner gotten possession of the reins of government, than he formed three mighty projects; to subdue the turbulent spirits of the great, to reduce the rebellious Hugonots, and to curb the encroaching power of the house of Austria. Undaunted and implacable, prudent and active, he braved all the opposition of the French princes and nobles in the prosecution of his plans; he discovered and dissipated all their secret cabals and conspiracies. His sovereign he held in subjection, while he exalted the throne. The people, while they lost their liberties, acquired, by means of his administration, learning, order, discipline, and renown. That confused and inaccurate genius of government, of which France partook in common with other European kingdoms, he changed into a simple monarchy; at the very time when the incapacity of Buckingham encouraged the free spirit of the commons to establish in England a regular system of liberty. However unequal the comparison between these ministers, Buckingham had entertained a mighty jealousy against Richelieu; a jealousy not founded on rivalship of power and politics, but of love and gallantry; in which the duke was as much superior to the cardinal, as he was inferior in every other respect.

At the time when Charles married by proxy the princess Henrietta, the duke of Buckingham had been sent to France, in order to grace the nuptials, and conduct the new queen into England. The eyes of the French court were directed by curiosity towards that man, who had enjoyed the unlimited favour of two successive monarchs, and who, from a private station, had mounted in the earliest youth to the absolute government of three kingdoms. The beauty of his person, the gracefulness of his air, the splendour of his equipage, his fine taste in dress, festivals, and carousals, corresponded to the prepossessions entertained in his favour: the affability of his behaviour, the gaiety of his manners, the magnificence of his expence, increased still farther the general admiration which was paid him. All business being already concerted, the time was entirely spent in mirth and entertainments; and, during those splendid scenes among that gay people; the duke found himself in a situation where he was perfectly qualified to excel. But his great success at Paris proved as fatal as his former failure at Madrid. Encouraged by the smiles of the court, he dared to carry his ambitious addresses even to the queen herself; but the progress of his diabolical intentions during his abode at Paris, was disappointed by the vigilant Richelieu. Having advanced as far as Boulogne with Henrietta Maria, he left her under a slight slight pretence, and returned to Amiens, and paying a visit to the queen, was dismissed with a reproof which he thought savoured more of kindness than of anger.

Some time after, thinking to carry on his amorous designs on the French queen, the duke was making preparations for a new embassy to Paris; but a message was sent him from Louis, informing him, that he must not think of such a journey. In a romantic passion he swore, "That he would see the French queen, in spite of all the power of France;" and, from that moment, he determined to engage England in a war with that kingdom.

He first took advantage of some quarrels excited by the queen of England's attendants; and he persuaded Charles to dismiss at once all her French servants, contrary to the articles of the marriage treaty. He encouraged the English ships of war and privateers to seize vessels belonging to French merchants; and these he forthwith condemned as prizes, by a sentence of the court of admiralty. But finding that all these injuries produced only remonstrances and embassies, or at most reprisals, on the part of France, he resolved to second the intrigues of the duke of Soubize, and to undertake at once a military expedition against that kingdom.

Soubize, who, with his brother the duke of Rohan, was at the head of the Hugonot party, was at that time in London, and strongly solicited Charles to embrace the protection of these distressed religionists. He represented, that after the inhabitants of Rochelle had been repressed by the combined squadrons of England and Holland, after peace was concluded with the French king under Charles's mediation, the ambitious cardinal was still meditating the destruction of the Hugonots; that preparations were silently making in every province of France for the suppression of their religion; that forts were erected in order to bridle Rochelle, the most considerable bulwark of the Protestants; that the reformed in France cast their eyes on Charles as the head of their faith, and considered him as a prince engaged by interest, as well as inclination, to support them; that, so long as their party subsisted, Charles might rely on their attachment as much as that of his own subjects; but if their liberties were once ravished from them, the power of France, freed from this impediment, would soon become formidable to England, and to all the neighbouring nations.

Though Charles probably bore but small favour to the Hugonots, who so much resembled the Puritans in discipline and worship, in religion and politics, he acquiesced in the plan, but not without the solicitations of Buckingham. A fleet of a hundred sail, and an army of seven thousand men, were fitted out for the invasion of France, and both of them entrusted to the command of the duke of Buckingham, who was altogether unacquainted both with land and sea service. The fleet set sail on the 27th of June, 1627, for Rochelle; but so ill-concerted were Buckingham's measures, that the inhabitants of that city shut their gates, and refused to admit allies, of whose coming they were not previously informed. All his military operations showed equal incapacity and inexperience. Instead of attacking Oleron, a fertile island and defenceless, he bent his course to the isle of Rhé, on the 9th of July, which was well garrisoned and fortified: having landed his men, though with some loss, he followed not the blow, but allowed Thyras, the French governor, five days respite; during which St. Martin was victualled and provided for a siege. He left behind him the small fort of Prie, which could at first have made no manner of resistance: though resolved to starve St. Martin, he guarded the sea negligently, and allowed provisions and ammunition to be thrown into it: despairing to reduce it by famine, he attacked it without having made any breach, and rashly threw away the lives of the soldiers: he received a reinforcement from Ireland of sixteen hundred men, and five hundred Rochellers. Having found that a French army had stolen over in small divisions, and had landed at Prie, the fort which he had at first overlooked, he began to think of a retreat; but made it so unskilfully on the 28th of October, that it was equivalent to a total rout: he was the last of the army that embarked; and he returned to England, having lost two-thirds of his land forces; totally discredited both as an admiral and a general; and bringing no praise with him, but the vulgar one of courage and personal bravery.

The duke of Rohan, who had taken arms as soon as Buckingham appeared upon the coast, discovered the dangerous spirit of the sect, without being able to do any mischief: the inhabitants of Rochelle, who had at last been induced to join the English, hastened the vengeance of their master, exhausted their provisions in supplying their allies, and were threatened with an immediate siege. Thus ended the duke of Buckingham's expedition against France. This disgraceful disaster brought a heavy additional load of public odium on the already universally detested minister: but he was received by his fond master with as great acknowledgement for supposed services as if he had brought home the trophies of an important victory (f).

There was now great reason to apprehend some disorder or insurrection from the discontents which prevailed among the people in England. Their liberties they believed were ravished from them; illegal taxes extorted; their commerce, which had met with a severe check from the Spanish, was totally annihilated by the French war; those military honours transmitted to them from their ancestors, had received a grievous stain, by two unsuccessful and ill-conducted expeditions; scarcely an illustrious family but mourned, from the last of them, the loss of a son or brother; greater calamities were dreaded from the war with these powerful monarchies, concurring with the internal disorders under which the nation laboured. And these ills were ascribed, not to the refractory disposition of the two former parliaments, as the king's party would have had it believed, but solely to Charles's obstinacy, in adhering to the counsels of Buckingham; a man nowise intitled, by his birth, age, services, or merit, to that unlimited confidence reposed in him. To be sacrificed to the interest, policy, and ambition of the great, is frequently the lot of the common people; but to be the victim of the frivolous gallantry of a favourite, and of his boyish caprices, was an object of peculiar indignation.

In this situation, it may be imagined, the king and the duke dreaded above all things the assembling of a parliament: but so little foresight had they possessed in their enterprizing schemes, that they found themselves under an absolute necessity of embracing that expedient. The money levied, or rather extorted, under colour of prerogative, had come in very slowly, and had left such ill-humour in the nation, that it appeared dangerous to renew the experiment. The absolute necessity of supply, it was hoped, would engage the commons to forget the injuries they had received; and, having experienced the ill effects of former obstinacy, they would probably assemble with a resolution of making some reasonable compliances. The more to soften them, it was concerted, by sir Robert Cotton's advice, that Buckingham should be the first person that proposed in council the calling of a new parliament. Having laid in this stock of merit, he expected that all his former misdemeanours would be overlooked and forgiven; and that, instead of a tyrant and oppressor, he should be regarded as the first patriot in the nation. Writs were accordingly issued on the 29th of January, 1628 for a parliament to assemble on the 17th of March (g).

The views, however, of the popular leaders were much more judicious and profound. When the commons assembled, they appeared to be men of the same inde-

(f) On the instant that Buckingham's arrival was made known to Charles, he sent him consolatory letters on the occasion of his disgrace, conjuring him, by the sacred ties of friendship, not to make the disaster irrecoverable, by afflicting himself for the faults of others. During the progress of his operations at the isle of Rhe, Charles had sent him many compliments on the report of his military exploits. MSS. in Br. Museum, n. 6988. fol. 3.

(g) Previous to the meeting of this parliament, warrants were sent to all parts to release the prisoners who had been confined on account of the loan. The number of them, all people of fashion or fortune, amounted to seventy-three. These, gentlemen of tried resolution, were many of them chosen members of the ensuing parliament; the people fixing their hopes of redress on patriots whose sufferings for the public cause had given flattering assurances of an incorruptible integrity. Besides this order for a general release, the court thought proper to send writs of summons to the disgraced peers. Abbot, Arundel, Bristol, and the bishop of Lincoln, were all permitted, according to their right, to attend in parliament. Among the gentlemen who were released from prison by the orders of the court were, sir John Strangeways, sir Thomas Grantham, sir William Armyn, sir William Massam, sir William Wilmore, sir Erasmus Draiton, sir Edward Aiscough, sir Nathaniel Bernardiston, sir Robert Poyntz, sir Beachum St. John, sir Oliver Luke, sir Maurice Berkley, sir Thomas Wentworth, sir John Wray, sir W. Constable, sir John Hotham, sir John Pickering, sir Fra. Barrington, sir William Chauncey, sir Walter Earl, sir Thomas Darnel, sir Harbottle Grimston, sir John Corbet, sir John Elliot, sir John Hevingham, knights; W. Anderson, Terringham Norwood, John Trigonwell, Thomas Godfrey, Richard Knightly, Thomas Nicholas, John Hampden, George Ratcliff, John Dutton, Henry Poll, Nath. Conwell, Robert Hatly, Tho. pendent pendent spirit with their predecessors, and possessed of such riches, that their property was computed to surpass three times that of the house of peers; they were deputed by boroughs and counties, enflamed all of them by the late violations of liberty; many of the members themselves had been cast into prison, and had suffered by the measures of the court; yet, notwithstanding these circumstances, which might prompt them to embrace violent resolutions, they entered upon business with perfect temper and decorum. They considered, that the king, disgusted at these popular assemblies, and little prepossessed in favour of their privileges, wanted but a fair pretence for breaking with them, and would seize the first opportunity offered by any incident, or any undutiful behaviour of the members (h). He fairly told them in his first speech that, "if they should not do their duties, in contributing to the necessities of the state, he must, in discharge of his conscience, use other means which God had put into his hands, in order to save that which the follies of some particular men may otherwise put in danger. Take not this for a threatening," added the king, "for I scorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonition from him who, by nature and duty, has most care of your preservation and prosperity." The lord keeper, by the king's direction, subjoined, "This way of parliamentary supplies, as his majesty told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition, and to the desire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, necessity and the sword of the enemy make way for the others. Remember his majesty's admonition; I say, remember it." From these avowed maxims, the commons plainly perceived, that, if the least handle were afforded, the king would immediately dissolve them, and would thenceforth deem himself justified for violating, in a manner still more open, all the ancient forms of the constitution. No remedy could then be looked for, but from insurrections and civil war, of which the issue would be extremely uncertain, and which must, in all events, prove calamitous to the nation. To correct the late disorders in the administration required some new laws, which would, no doubt, appear harsh to a prince so enamoured of his prerogative; and it was requisite to temper, by the decency and moderation of their debates, the rigour which must necessarily attend their determinations. Nothing can give us a higher idea of the capacity of those men who now guided the commons, and of the great authority which they had acquired, than the forming and executing of so judicious and so difficult a plan of operations.

The decency, however, which the popular leaders had prescribed to themselves, and recommended to others, hindered them not from making the most vehement complaints against the grievances under which the nation had lately laboured. We shall give a few extracts from the principal speeches on this occasion, that the reader, in the present day, may see how ardently the members of the house of commons panted for liberty in the time of Charles in opposition to the prerogatives of the crown. Sir Francis Seymour said, "This is the great council of the kingdom, and here with certainty, if not here only, his majesty may see, as in a true glass, the state of the kingdom. We are called hither by his writs, in order to give him faithful counsel; such as may stand with his honour; and this we must do without flattery. We are also sent hither by the people, in order to deliver their just grievances: and this we must do without fear. Let us not act like Cambyses's judges, who, when their approbation was demanded by the prince to some illegal measure, said, that, Though there was a written law, the Persian kings might follow their own will and pleasure. This was base flattery, fitter for our reproof than our imitation; and as fear, so flattery, taketh away the judgement. For my part, I shall shun both; and speak my mind with as much duty as any man to his majesty, without neglecting the public. But how can we express our affections, while we retain our fears; or speak of giving, till we know whether we have any thing to give? For, if his majesty may be persuaded to take what he will, what need we give? That this hath been done, appeareth by the billeting of soldiers, a thing nowise advantageous to the king's service, and a burden to the commonwealth: by the imprisonment of gentlemen for refusing the loan, who, if they had done the contrary for fear, had been as blameable as the projectors of that oppressive measure. To countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached in the pulpit, or rather prated, that All we have is the king's by divine right? But when preachers forsake their own calling, and turn ignorant statesmen; we see how willing they are to exchange a good conscience for a bishopric. He, I must confess, is no good subject, who would not, willingly and cheerfully, lay down his life, when that sacrifice may promote the interests of his sovereign, and the good of the commonwealth. But he is not a good subject, he is a slave, who will allow his goods to be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom. By opposing these practices, we shall but tread in the steps of our forefathers, who still preferred the public before their private interest, nay, before their very lives. It will in us be a wrong done to ourselves, to our posterities, to our consciences, if we forego this claim and pretension (i)."

"I read of a custom," said sir Robert Philips, "among the old Romans, that, once every year, they held a solemn festival in which their slaves had liberty, without exception, to speak what they pleased, in order to ease their afflicted minds; and, on the conclusion of the festival, the slaves severally returned to their former servitudes.

"This institution may, with some distinction, well set forth our present state and condition. After the revolution of some time, and the grievous sufferance of many violent oppressions, we have now, at last, as those slaves, obtained, for a day, some liberty of speech: but shall not, I trust, be hereafter slaves: for we are born free. Yet, what new illegal burdens our estates and persons have groaned under, my heart yearns to think of, my tongue faulters to utter.—The grievances, by which we are oppressed, I draw under two heads; acts of power against law, and the judgements of lawyers against our liberty." Having mentioned three illegal judgements passed within his memory; that by which the Scots, born after James's accession, were admitted to all the privileges of English subjects; that by which the new impositions had been warranted; and the late one, by which arbitrary imprisonments were authorised; he thus proceeded: "I can live, although another, who has no right, be put to live along with me; nay, I can live, although burdened with excises and impositions, beyond what at present I labour under: but to have my liberty, which is the soul of my life, ravished from me by power; to have my person pent up in a jail, without relief by law, and to be so adjudged,——O, improvident ancestors! O, unwise forefathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the same time, to neglect our personal liberty, and let us lie in prison, and that during pleasure, without redress or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourselves with disputes about a constitution, franchises, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person? I am weary of treading these ways; and therefore conclude to have a select committee, in order to frame a petition to his majesty for redress of these grievances. And this petition being read, examined, and approved, may be delivered to the king; of whose gracious answer we have no cause to doubt, our desires being so reasonable, our intentions so loyal, and the manner so dutiful. Neither need we fear, that this is the critical parliament, as has been insinuated; or that this is the way to distraction: but assure ourselves of a happy issue. Then shall the king, as he calls us his great council, find us his true council, and own us his good council (k)."

The same topics were enforced by sir Thomas Wentworth. After mentioning projectors and ill ministers of state, "These," said he, "have introduced a privy-council,
